

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. CASES

DECIDED IN THE Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.

Action for Damages against Improvement Company—

Death of Plaintiff—Case at Bar.—A proceeding has been instituted under the 9th section of the act of February 23d, 1835, Sess. Acts, p. 82, in relation to the Upper Appomattox company, for the purpose of recovering damages to land occasioned by the improvement of the company. The jury have returned their verdict ascertaining the damages; and the company has filed exceptions, and obtained a continuance of the cause; and then the plaintiff dies. HELD:

1. Same—Same—Revival of Suit.—The proceeding may be revived by the proper party against the company.

2. Same—Same—Same—Administrator.—The administrator, and not the heirs of the plaintiff, is the proper party to revive the proceeding.

The case is fully stated in the opinion of Judge Allen.

Steger, for the appellants.

There was no counsel for the appellees.

2 *ALLEN, P. The case of Nash v. Upper Appomattox Co., 5 Gratt. 332, decided that the proprietor, whose lands were injured by the erection of a dam across the river, might sue out the writ of ad quod damnum, authorized by the 9th section of the act of February 23d, 1835, Sess. Acts, p. 82, although no previous writ to condemn land for the abutments and other purposes had been sued out by the company. This was a proceeding under the 9th section of said act, for the purpose of ascertaining and assessing damages alleged by Elizabeth Harding to have been sustained by her in consequence of the erection of a dam by the company, occasioning the water to back up and rise and remain higher along her low grounds on the river, than it would have done but for the dam; whereby she was unable to drain her low grounds; and the water in the creeks, branches and ditches was prevented from passing off freely into the river, occasioning accumulations of sand, whereby said creeks, &c., were more liable to overflow, and the lands thereby rendered more subject to inundation and of less value; and that such damages were never foreseen or estimated by the jury impaneled when the dam was erected; and had never been satisfied, in any way.

An inquisition was taken on the 2d of June 1841, assessing the damages to five hundred dollars; which being returned to the County court, the appellants filed exceptions to the writ and inquest, and moved to quash the same; and the motion was continued at their instance. At a subsequent term, the death of the plaintiff in the writ was suggested; and on motion of George M. Harding, her administrator, a scire facias was awarded to revive the cause in his name, as administrator as aforesaid. At a subsequent term, on the motion of said George M. Harding and others, the heirs of said Elizabeth Harding, it was ordered that the order awarding the writ of scire facias to revive in *the name of said George M. Harding, as administrator, should be set aside; and, on motion of the heirs, a writ was awarded to them to revive the cause in their names. Upon the return of this writ the appellants appeared and demurred thereto. The County court overruled the demurrer; and after hearing the testimony, overruled the motion to quash the writ and inquisition, and entered judgment in favor of the heirs for the damages assessed: The judgment being affirmed by the Circuit court, the appellants have appealed to this court.

Two questions are presented by the appeal: First, Whether the case could be revived at all? And secondly, If it could be revived, whether the revival should be in the name of the personal representative or the heir at law?

If this had been an action on the case for a nuisance to the freehold of the plaintiff below, the rule that actio personalis moritur cum persona, might have applied; for such causes of action died with the person. 1 Wms. Saund. 217, n. 1; Harris v. Crenshaw, 3 Rand. 14. And although the 64th section of the statute, 1 Rev. Code, p. 390, was an extension of the statute de bonis asportatis, 4 Ed. 3, ch. 7, so as to embrace actions brought against, as well as those brought by, executors and administrators, it has not been construed as extending to injuries done to the freehold or to the person. The cause of action in such a case imputes a tort; it arises ex delicto; the plea must be not guilty; and if either party died before verdict, the action could not be revived.

But it seems to me the rules applicable to an action on the case for a nuisance do not apply to this proceeding. The legislature, by the act under consideration, section 2, authorized and required this company to construct dams on the river, from the head of their canal near Petersburg to the town of Farmville, so as *to afford a navigation of two feet depth of water at all seasons of the year. To comply with this requisition it was necessary to take private property in some instances absolutely; and to subject it in other instances to a charge or easement materially impairing its value. By this law, the jus publicum in the navigation of this stream has been conferred on the company for the purpose of improving the navigation; and such being the case, private rights must yield to the public, upon just compensation being made. As was remarked by President Tucker in the Tuckahoe Canal Co. v. Tuckahoe Railroad Co., 11 Leigh 42, 74, "It may be truly said that this jus publicum, this eminent domain, is the law of the existence of every sovereignty;" and "though the sovereignty has granted its land, or its privileges, without any express reservation to take them for public uses, yet that right is necessarily implied." As every proprietor holds subject to this public right, and as the legislature, in the exercise of the right of eminent domain, can alone prescribe the mode of making just compensation, it cannot be said that a wrong is done to the owner when such compensation is reserved for him, and a mode prescribed for ascertaining the amount and securing its payment. So far from assimilating it to a proceeding for a tort, and to be treated like a cause of action which arose ex delicto, it may more properly be likened to a cause of action arising ex contractu; as growing out of the implied obligation to surrender to the public use, upon the engagement of the public to make just compensation.

In the law under consideration, the right is conferred on the company to acquire private property by purchase, and to settle by contract any damages which their works might occasion to adjoining lands; or if they could not agree with the proprietor of the lands necessary for abutments, or which may probably be damaged or affected, the 8th section required them to *take out a writ of ad quod damnum; and upon paying the value of the lands located for abutments, and the damages assessed, and costs, the law declares the company shall become seized in fee simple of the lands used for the abutments, and be authorized to erect the dam. Whether the company adopts this course, or by purchase and agreement with the proprietors acquires the necessary land for abutments, and settles by contract the probable damages, in either event, the 9th section of the act gives a remedy to the proprietor who sustains damages not foreseen, estimated, and satisfied. In this proceeding the right to erect the dam, or the legality of the dam when erected, is not in contest. It cannot be treated as a nuisance; and the whole effect is to ascertain the extent to which the individual has been required to surrender private property for public uses, upon the undertaking of the public to make just compensation; and to fix and assess the amount of such compensation. Under the general law in regard to mills, it was not essential to give judgment for the amount so ascertained before the court could give leave to erect the dam; the leave to erect the mill being valid, though no order was made directing the payment of damages; but the payment of such damages to the persons entitled, is imposed by law as a condition to protect the party against the suit of the person injured. Coleman v. Moody, 4 Hen. & Munf. 1; Anthony v. Lawhorne, 1 Leigh 1. Under the 8th section of the law under consideration, no provision is made requiring the court to give judgment for the value of the lands and damages assessed. The inquest was to be returned and recorded, and upon payment of the sums assessed the company became seized of the lands and was authorized to erect the dam.

The 9th section had reference principally to injuries which were made apparent by the erection of the *dam, and therefore not foreseen by the jury where there had been a jury, or settled by contract with the proprietors. As payment was not necessary to protect the company from the suit of the party injured, as in the case of the damages assessed under the preceding section before proceeding with the works, this section provides that the jury shall enquire of and assess the damages; and thereupon the person suing the writ shall be entitled to the damages and costs; and the court shall enter judgment for the same. The right of the proprietor grows out of the appropriation of his property; and the statute provides a cheap and expeditious mode to ascertain the amount of his compensation, and to enforce the payment. I do not think that the rule in relation to actions ex delicto for injuries to the freehold, applies to this proceeding; but on the contrary, that it may be revived in the name of the representative entitled to the compensation.

But it seems to me the personal representative, and not the heirs, was the party entitled to receive the amount of the compensation assessed, and to revive the proceeding for the purpose of getting judgment and execution.

The property taken or subjected to the easement in favor of the company, belonged to the intestate. Her lands were rendered more liable to inundation, and the permanent value impaired to that extent during her life time. The easement was imposed and the right to compensation arose, as soon as the extent of the reflow was made manifest by the erection of the dam; and from the time that the proprietor provided for in this 9th section evinced a determination to claim the compensation for the loss, by instituting his proceeding under this act to have the amount ascertained, the claim become a personal demand; as much so as it would have been if the damages had been assessed and the inquisition returned and recorded, as provided *for in the 8th section. The act declares that the jury shall assess the damages, and thereupon the person suing the writ shall be entitled to the damages. The damages for permanent injuries, such as those set forth in the writ, can be assessed but once. Having once obtained compensation to the extent that the property has been impaired in value by the easement, he cannot recover again for the continuance of the easement. The heir inherits and holds the land subject to this easement as long as the dam is legally continued; and cannot recover that which never descended upon him. It is like the action on a covenant of seizin for eviction or breach in the lifetime of the ancestor. There the action survives to the personal representative, because, as was said in Lucy v. Levington, 2 Levinz 26, the eviction being to the ancestor, he cannot have an heir to this land.

Nor do I conceive that this can be changed by the action of the administrator. It appears from the recitals in the order of the County court, that he was one of the heirs uniting in the motion to set aside the order awarding the writ of scire facias to revive in the name of the administrator, and awarding the writ to revive in the names of the heirs. The scire facias to revive was intended to continue the action in the name of the representative who legally succeeded to the rights of the intestate. New parties, having no claim to intervene in the controversy, cannot be permitted to take the place of the proper representative to continue the controversy and to collect the money. It would be the institution of a new proceeding instead of a continuance of the old. The heirs as such have no right to the subject; it is assets to be paid out and distributed in the due course of administration. I think, therefore, the demurrer to the scire facias should have been sustained; and that the order made on the 3rd of July 1843, setting aside the previous order awarding a scire facias to the administrator to revive the cause in his name, and awarding a scire facias to the heirs to revive the cause in their name, should be set aside: and leave given to the administrator of said Elizabeth Harding to sue out a scire facias to revive the cause in his name; and for further proceedings.

MONCURE, LEE and SAMUELS, Js., concurred in the opinion of Allen, J.

DANIEL, J., dissented.

Judgment reversed.

April Term, 1854, Richmond.

1. Executors and Administrators—Assent to Legacies—Case at Bar.—Executors or administrators with the will annexed, who are legatees of slaves under the will, agree to a division of the slaves, and each takes possession of those allotted to him. This is an assent to the legacies by the executors or administrators.

2. Same—Same—In Favor of Legatee for Life—Effect upon Contingent Legatee.—To one of these legatees the slaves are given for life, and if he should die without heirs, then over to a grandson of the testator. The assent to the legacy in favor of the first taker is an assent in favor of the contingent legatee over.

3. Suit by Contingent Legatee against Legatee for Life—Evidence—Competency of Witnesses.—In a suit by the contingent legatee against the legatee for life and a purchaser of one of the slaves under an execution against him, the other administrator is a competent witness for the contingent legatee, to prove the division of the slaves, and the assent to the legacies by the administrators.

4. Executors and Administrators—Sale of Property for Debt—Right of Contingent Legatee.—The fact that the slave was sold to satisfy a debt which was originally the debt of the testator, but upon an execution issued on a forfeited forthcoming bond given by the administrator, he having ample assets in hand as administrator to pay it, does not entitle the purchaser to hold the slave in absolute property, free from the claim of the contingent legatee.

5. Equity Practice—Life Estate in Chattels—Right Contingent—Legatee to Have Security for Return of Property.—The purchaser claiming the slave and her increase as his own property, and the legatee for life never having had any children, it is the right of the contingent legatee to apply to a court of equity, and to require the purchaser to give security to have the slave and her increase forthcoming at the death of the legatee for life without issue.

6. Executors—Retracting Assent.—QUARR: When an executor may, and when he may not, retract his assent to a legacy.

Life Tenant in Chattels—Security for Return of Property upon Termination of Life Estate—When May Be Required.—In Houser v. Ruffner, 18 W. Va. 251, it is said: "I know of no law, which requires a life tenant to give security for the return of money or other property upon the termination of the life estate, unless those in remainder or reversion show such special circumstances, as call for the intervention of a court of equity by bill of quia timet. Chisholm v. Starke, 3 Call 25; Holliday et ux. v. Coleman, 2 Munf. 162; Mortimer v. Moffatt et ux., 4 H. & M. 508; Frazer v. Bevill et al., 11 Gratt. 9; Dunbar's Ex'rs v. Woodcock's Ex'rs, 10 Leigh 628; Weeks v. Weeks, 5 N. H. 326; Scott v. Price, 2 Serg. & R. 50."

In Bartlett v. Patton, 33 W. Va. 74, 10 S. E. Rep. 23 the principal case is cited as authority for the proposition that, now, there is no question that a life estate to one with remainder to another in personalty may be given. See, in accord, Madden v. Madden, 2 Leigh 377; Dunbar v. Woodcock, 10 Leigh 628.

Co-executors—Liability—General Rule.—The principal case is cited in Caskie v. Harrison, 76 Va. 97, as authority for the proposition that, one executor cannot be charged with a devastavit of his companion any further than he is known to have been knowing and assenting at the time of the devastavit, and merely permitting his executor to possess the assets without concurring in the misapplication does not render him responsible for receipts of his co-executor.

See monographic note on "Executors and Administrators."

7. Setting Up in Second Suit Claim Inconsistent with First.—QUÆRE: Whether a party may set up in a second suit, pretensions inconsistent with the allegations of his bill and his pretensions in his first suit.

Frederick Reese of the county of Dinwiddie, died in 1829. By his will which was duly admitted to probat, after a legacy of two hundred and fifty dollars to Amy Featherston, he gave to his son Herbert Reese all his land, and one-half of the 10 balance of his estate: *But if he should die without heirs, then at his death the land, with all the other property, should go to his grand son Frederick A. Frazer and his heirs. The testator gave to his daughter Martha Frazer the remaining half of his personal estate. Herbert Reese and Martha Frazer qualified as administrator and administratrix, with the will annexed, and gave separate bonds.

In 1830 a judgment was recovered against the personal representatives of Frederick Reese, which, principal, interest and costs, amounted to one hundred and thirty-six dollars and sixty-six cents; one-half of which was paid by Martha Frazer. Upon the execution which issued upon this judgment Herbert Reese gave a forthcoming bond with Price Pollan as his surety; which bond having been forfeited, an execution was awarded thereon, and was levied on a slave named Eliza found in the possession of Herbert Reese, and which had been a part of the estate of Frederick Reese. This slave was sold by the sheriff under the execution, and was purchased by Archer J. Bevill. At the time of this sale, as appeared by the accounts of the administrators settled by the court of probat, Herbert Reese was a debtor to the estate, after crediting him with the payment of one-half of this judgment, in the sum of two hundred and twenty-eight dollars and forty-two cents, and Martha Bevill was debtor in the sum of sixty-five dollars and eighty-five cents. These accounts showed that the testator was very little indebted at his death.

In 1845 Frederick A. Frazer filed his bill in the Circuit court of Dinwiddie, in which he set out the will of Frederick Reese; and stated that the administrators sold the personal estate except the slaves, which proved more than sufficient to pay the debts; that the slaves were divided, as directed by 11 the will, between Herbert Reese and Martha Frazer, and that *the slave Eliza fell to the share of Herbert Reese; that she had been sold to Bevill and had since had several children. That Bevill claimed a fee simple in said slave and her increase; and had avowed his purpose to use and control, sell and dispose of the said slaves as he thought proper; and claimed an absolute right to them. That plaintiff was apprehensive, and with good reason, that Bevill would send the slaves out of the state, or sell them to a trader to be taken away, so that the plaintiff would be entirely without remedy upon the happening of the contingency upon which his interest depended; a contingency very likely to occur, as Herbert Reese was then, and had ever been, childless. And making Bevill, Herbert Reese and Martha T. Frazer parties defendants, he prayed that Bevill might be restrained from sending the slaves out of the state; that he might be required to give bond and security to have the slaves forthcoming at the death of Herbert Reese; and for general relief.

The bill having been sworn to by the plaintiff, the court made an order restraining Bevill from removing the slaves beyond the jurisdiction of the court, or from anywise disposing of them until the further order of the court: And directed that unless Bevill should enter into bond with good security in the penalty of eight hundred dollars, payable to the plaintiff, and with condition to comply with and perform the decree which the court might make in the cause, the sheriff should take the slaves into his possession, and put or hire them out to the best advantage till the further order of the court.

The bond was given by Bevill; and he then answered the bill. He said that at a sheriff's sale made about the year 1830, he purchased the slave Eliza, then a small girl; that she had since had three children;

12 and that they were all in his possession. That *the slave was sold for the purpose of satisfying debts due from the estate of Frederick Reese; that judgments had been recovered against his personal representatives, executions issued thereon, and the said slave was levied on and publicly sold to satisfy them. That it was most remarkable that the plaintiff had delayed so long to assert his right, if any he ever had; that he had no new cause, for that he must still be postponed, if he could succeed, until the life estate was extinguished. That he was advised and confidently believed, that the plaintiff had no shadow of title to the slaves mentioned in his bill, and then in possession of the defendant; and he considered himself most unnecessarily harrassed by this suit. The other defendants did not answer.

The execution under which the slave Eliza was sold, was filed, and the sheriff's return was, "Levied on one negro girl, held as the property of Herbert Reese." The deposition of the deputy sheriff who levied the execution was taken. He says he levied the execution on a negro girl named Eliza, who he was told by Herbert Reese at the time, was the property of Frederick Reese's estate. He took her from the house and possession of Herbert Reese. That he offered the slave for sale at the June court, but that some of the legatees of Frederick Reese contended that Herbert Reese was bound for the debt himself; and that the negro ought not to be sold, as they would be scattered about at the death of Herbert Reese. That in consequence of these remarks no persons would bid, and he therefore kept her until July court, when she was again put up, and was sold. That Bevill was present at the June court when the objections were made: No objections were made at the July court, and Bevill purchased the slave at one hundred and seventy dollars. That at the sale it

13 was publicly announced that she *was sold to satisfy an execution in favor of Martin Blake against Herbert Reese, administrator of Frederick Reese deceased.

The deposition of Martha T. Frazer, the administratrix, was also taken and filed. She said, that in February 1829 a division of the slaves of Frederick Reese took place; and in that division six slaves, one of which was this slave Eliza, were allotted to Herbert Reese. That this division was made by consent of parties; and each took possession of the slaves allotted to him and her; and that she still had hers. This deposition was objected to by the defendant Bevill, on the ground that the witness was one of the personal representatives of Frederick Reese deceased.

The cause came on to be heard on the 31st of March 1847, when the court, without passing upon the objection to the competency of Mrs. Frazer as a witness for the plaintiff, dissolved the injunction and dismissed the bill. And the plaintiff having died after the decree, his administrator applied to this court for an appeal, which was allowed.

Macfarland and Rhodes, for the appellant.
J. Alfred Jones, for the appellee.

DANIEL, J. I do not think that the exception to the deposition of Martha T. Frazer was well taken. The fact that she was one of the administrators of her father's estate did not, of itself, render her incompetent to testify to the assent of herself and of her coadministrator to the legacy in respect to a portion of which the suit was brought.

In the case of Smith & wife v. Townes' adm'r, 4 Munf. 191, which was an action of detinue brought by a legatee against a stranger, for the purpose of recovering a slave bequeathed to the legatee, this court

14 held that it was competent for the plaintiff to prove by the executor, *(if he had no objection to being examined), his assent to the legacy. I see nothing in the case under consideration to justify us in refusing to apply the same principle to the testimony of Mrs. Frazer. It is true that the recovery of the slaves in controversy from Bevill would be a satisfaction pro tanto of the claims of the appellant against the administrators, for Frederick R. Frazer's share of the estate under his grandfather's will; and Mrs. Frazer's testimony proves one of the important facts upon which the right to recover from Bevill must rest. Still, I do not perceive that Mrs. Frazer has any such interest in the event of the suit as can affect her competency as a witness. For even if the appellant, in the event of his failure to recover the slaves of Bevill, could be permitted to turn round and repudiate the grounds on which he sought that recovery, deny his own allegation of the assent of the administrators to the legacy, and seek to recover of the administrators on the ground of a devastavit or wrong, in improperly permitting a sale of the female slave Eliza, I do not see how Mrs. Frazer (from any fact disclosed in the record), could be subjected to any liability. Apart from her own evidence there is nothing to show that the slave Eliza had ever been in her possession. The other evidence in the cause shows that the debt, in satisfaction of which the slave was sold, was originally a debt due by the estate. That upon the suing out of the original execution she paid one-half of the amount, and charged it to the estate in her administration account. That for the remaining half her brother Herbert Reese gave a delivery bond with Price Pollan as security, and made a like charge in his account. And that the sale was made under an execution which issued on a judgment on the delivery bond. The sheriff's return states that this execution was levied "on one negro girl held as the 15 property of Herbert Reese;" and in his deposition the sheriff states *that the girl "was taken from the house and possession of Herbert Reese, and that he (Reese) stated at the time, that she belonged to his father's estate." And it appears from the separate administration accounts, that there was, at the time of the sale of the slave, a small balance (some sixty-five dollars) in the hands of Mrs. Frazer, and a much larger balance (some two hundred and twenty-eight dollars, after taking credit for the half of the original execution), in the hands of Herbert Reese, arising from sales of the personal estate of the testator. In this state of facts, if there was any devastavit, or wrong, or illegal conduct, in allowing the sale of the slave for which a representative of this estate might be called to account, the liability therefor rested with Herbert Reese alone. He held the possession of the slave, and his office of administrator gave him a right to that possession; and if he permitted it to pass from him, so as illegally and injuriously to affect others, without the knowledge or assent of Mrs. Frazer, no damage or loss arising therefrom can be visited upon her, it being well settled that one administrator cannot be charged with the wrong of his companion, or be made further liable than for the assets which came to his hands. Peter v. Beverley, 10 Peters' R. 532; Morrow's adm'r v. Peyton's adm'r, 8 Leigh 54.

The decision of the suit could therefore neither increase nor diminish her liabilities, let it eventuate as it might, and she stood indifferent between the parties.

She states that in 1829 the slaves belonging to her father's estate were divided between her and her brother; and that, in the division, the slave Eliza was (with others) allotted to her brother Herbert Reese. That the division was made by consent of parties, and that she and her brother each took possession of the slaves allotted to them respectively. In Drayton

v. Drayton, 1 Desau. R. 557, executors who were residuary legatees divided the estate of their testator between *them.

It was held that this was equivalent to payment of the legacies, and that the executors severally held their shares as legatees simply. This is precisely the case here; and the division in 1829 is, I think, equivalent to the most formal assent to the bequests to Herbert Reese and Mrs. Frazer. And it is well settled that an assent to a particular interest is an assent to the bequest over. 2 Lomax on Ex'ors 130; Lynch v. Thomas, 3 Leigh 682. And in the case of Acheson v. McCombs, 3 Ired. Ch. R. 554, it was decided that when by a will personally is given to one, with remainder to another upon the happening of a certain event, and without any trust in the executor, the assent of the executor to the immediate legacy is an assent to the bequest in remainder; and such bequest becomes a legal estate upon the happening of the contingency.

The division of the slaves in 1829 operated then, as I conceive, as an assent by the administrators to the executory limitation in favor of Frederick R. Frazer; and I do not see how his title could be divested by sale under an execution issued, whether against the goods and chattels of Herbert Reese, or against the goods and chattels of the testator Frederick Reese.

It is argued that it is competent for an executor under certain circumstances to retract his assent to a legacy: And that Herbert Reese, by representing to the sheriff when he made the levy, that the slave belonged to his father's estate, and by suffering her to be sold as such, must be taken to have retracted his assent, so far as this slave is concerned, and to have consented that she should be sold as the property of the estate. In a suit brought by Herbert Reese to recover this slave, such an argument would be entitled to much consideration, if indeed it would not be conclusive against his right to recover. To permit him to recover from a bona fide

17 purchaser under such circumstances, *would be to allow him to derive benefit from his own fraud. But the argument, as applied to the rights of Frederick R. Frazer is, I think, without force. It seems to be true, that whilst as a general proposition an assent once given to a legacy can never afterwards be retracted, there are exceptions to the rule: As when the assent has not been completed by payment, in the case of a general legacy, or possession, in that of a specific one, and its recall is not attended with injury to a third person, as to a bona fide purchaser from the legatee on the faith of such assent, it is said, that it is only reasonable, that the executor, under particular circumstances, should have the power of retracting it; as when he assents upon a reasonable ground for considering that the assets are sufficient to meet all demands, but unknown debts are unexpectedly claimed, which occasions a deficiency. 2 Williams on Ex'ors

849. It is obvious, however, that not one of the reasons on which the exception is based exists for applying the exception here, so as to affect the rights of the legatee in remainder. The division of the slaves in 1829, as before stated, was accompanied by immediate possession on the part of Herbert Reese; and that possession enured at once to the benefit of the legatee in remainder. And Herbert Reese, so far from being met by an expected deficiency of assets, in fact held in his own hands a large balance, more than ample to satisfy the execution. No retraxit of his assent to the legacy could, therefore, have divested the title of Frederick R. Frazer. It is to be observed also that whilst from the deposition of the sheriff it would seem that he, at the sale, regarded the execution under which he sold as one against the estate of the testator, and treated the girl as the property of the estate, the execution was, as before stated, in fact against the goods and chattels of Herbert Reese and his surety

18 in the delivery bond, Price Pollan, and the return states *a levy on the girl as the property of Herbert Reese. Whatever may have been the impressions of the sheriff, at the time of the sale, as to the legal effect of the process under which he was acting, or as to the title of the property sold to satisfy it, I think it clear that under the circumstances the purchaser could acquire nothing but the interest of Herbert Reese in the slave: And consequently, that Frederick R. Frazer had such an interest in the slave Eliza and her increase, as to entitle him, upon alleging and showing just cause to apprehend danger of their being eloiigned, so as to jeopard his recovery of them when the time for the enjoyment of his legacy should arrive, to ask and have such orders in chancery as would be likely to insure the forthcoming of the property, on the happening of the contingency provided for in the will.

The counsel for the appellees, whilst he objected here to the jurisdiction, did not seem to lay much stress on the objection, his main argument being directed to the question of title; and all objection to the want of power in the chancellor to act on the case made, is, I think, met and answered by the decision of this court in the case of Chisholm v. Starke, 3 Call 25. In that case, the testator bequeathed his slaves to his wife, remainder to her children. The wife married again, and the second husband sold one of the slaves to a bona fide purchaser, who had no notice of the right of those in remainder; and he, before receiving such notice, sold the slave to another person. The bill filed by the remaindermen in that case did not allege any purpose on the part of Chisholm to remove the slaves out of the state. It simply alleged that Richardson the second husband had frequently endeavored to sell the slaves as his absolute property; that he had sold one of them to Chisholm, who lived at a distance in the state; that he had attempted to sell others; and pre-

19 tended that the increase of the *slaves was his. The chancellor decreed that Richardson should give bond, conditioned for delivering to the plaintiffs the slaves in his possession and their increase, living at the death of his wife, and that Richardson and Chisholm should give bond for delivering the slave which had been purchased by Chisholm. Upon an appeal by Chisholm, this court reversed so much of the decree as required the bond of him, on the ground of his having stated in his answer, which was not disproved, that he was a fair purchaser for valuable consideration, without notice of the title of the appellees, and had sold the slave before suit brought, and before any notice of the appellee's claim to or interest in the said slave; and ordered that the bill should be dismissed as to him, but decreed that Richardson should give bond for the forthcoming of all the slaves. The court evidently regarded the conduct of Richardson, in setting up an absolute title to the slaves, in selling one of them, and threatening and endeavoring to sell others, as ground sufficient to justify the requiring of a bond from him for the delivery of the property on the termination of the life estate; and exonerated Chisholm, on the ground only of his being a purchaser without notice, and of his having sold again before suit or notice of the title of those in remainder. The conduct of Herbert Reese, in permitting the slave to be sold under the circumstances shown in the case, was such, I think, as to have justified the court in requiring a bond from him; and with respect to Bevill, there is an absence of all the circumstances which induced the court, in the case of Chisholm v. Starke, to excuse the purchaser: He does not in his answer deny notice of the division of the slaves, and of the claim of the appellant's intestate: He does not deny having avowed the purpose (as charged in the bill) to use, control and sell and dispose of the slaves as his own absolute property: He does

20 not deny that the appellant *had good ground for believing that he would send the slaves out of the state. In his answer he simply states that the slave Eliza was levied on and sold to satisfy executions against the estate of Frederick Reese, and that he purchased her at the sheriff's sale, and denies that the plaintiff has any title whatever to the slaves; refers to the delay of the plaintiff in asserting his right, and says that he has no new cause, as he must, in any event, still be postponed until the life estate is extinguished. Independent of his failure to deny notice of the claim of the appellant, in his answer, the testimony in the cause renders it highly probable that he did have knowledge of the claim, and he is still in possession asserting right to treat the property as his own, free from all limitation.

I think that the Circuit court erred in dismissing the bill; and that it ought, instead thereof, to have made a decree defining the rights of the appellant in accordance with the foregoing views; and to have made such orders as were necessary to insure the forthcoming of the property on the happening of the contingency provided for in the bill.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Daniel, J.

The decree was as follows:

It appears to the court that in February 1829 the slaves of the testator Frederick Reese were, by consent of the parties, divided between the appellees Herbert Reese and Martha T. Frazer; and that in the division the female slave Eliza was allotted to the said Herbert Reese. And the court is of opinion that said division operated as an assent by the administrators to the bequests in the will, as well in favor of Frederick R. Frazer as of the said Herbert Reese and Martha T. Frazer; and that the 21 facts alleged in the *bill and proved by the evidence, were such as to entitle the said Frederick R. Frazer to ask and have from the appellee the said Herbert Reese, and the appellee Bevill, bond with sufficient security and in a proper penalty, conditioned for the forthcoming of the said slave Eliza and her descendants, on the happening of the contingency in the will of the testator mentioned: And that the Circuit court consequently erred in dismissing the bill. So much of the decree of the 31st day of March 1847, therefore, as dismisses the bill, is reversed with costs, &c. And the cause is remanded for further proceedings in conformity with the principles above declared.

April Term, 1854, Richmond.

1. Forthcoming Bonds—Original Judgment Invalid—Effect.—An award of execution on a forfeited forthcoming bond cannot successfully be objected to on account of the invalidity of the original judgment, unless such judgment is null and void.

Judgments—Collateral Impeachment.—The judgment of a court possessing competent jurisdiction in the proceeding before it and over the person against whom it is rendered, is binding and conclusive; and however irregular or erroneous it may be, yet so long as it remains unreversed, it cannot be drawn in question in a collateral proceeding; nor can any allegation be made against its validity. This proposition, laid down in the principal case by LEE, J., at the beginning of his opinion, seems well established in Virginia. See foot-note to Andrews v. Ivory, 14 Gratt. 229, and foot-notes there referred to.

See generally, monographic note on "Judgments."

†Costs—Liability of Person for Whose Benefit Suit Brought.—See monographic note on "Costs" appended to Jones v. Tatum, 19 Gratt. 720.

The principal case is cited in Wartman v. Yost, 22 Gratt. 606, as authority for the proposition that the act of 1849, Code, p. 706, § 9, to render judgment for costs in favor of the defendant against a person for whose benefit a suit was brought, when the defendant succeeded in the case.

3. Judgments—Construction of.—In a suit brought in the name of one person for the benefit of another, a judgment stating that the parties appeared by their attorneys and by consent the suit was dismissed and judgment for defendant's costs against the person for whose benefit the suit was brought, it must be held that the consent is the consent of the latter, and that the judgment is proper.

At the April term 1848 of the Circuit court of Bedford county, in an action on the case then depending therein in the name of Demarcus Foutz, who sues for the benefit of John D. Pate plaintiff, against Wingfield J. St. Clair defendant, a judgment was rendered in the terms following, viz: This day came the parties, by their attorneys, and by their consent, it is considered by the court that this suit be dismissed; and that the defendant recover against the said John D. Pate, for whose benefit this suit is brought, his cost by him about his defence of this suit expended. On this judgment an execution issued against the goods of Pate; and he executed a forthcoming bond with William H. Pate as his surety: And the bond was forfeited. St. Clair gave a notice to the Pates that he would move for award of execution upon the bond; and when the motion was made, John D. Pate moved the court to quash the bond, upon the ground that the original judgment was null and void. The court overruled the motion, and awarded execution upon the bond: And thereupon the Pates applied to this court for a supersedeas, which was awarded.

LEE, J. The judgment of a court possessing competent jurisdiction in the proceeding before it and over the person against whom it is rendered, is binding and conclusive; and however irregular or erroneous it may be, yet so long as it remains unreversed, it cannot be drawn in question in a collateral proceeding; nor can any allegation be made against its validity. Horsy v. Daniel, 2 Levinz R. 161; Hayward v. Ribbans, 4 East's R. 311; Prince v. Nicholson, 1 Marsh. R. 280; 1 Chit. Pl. 100, Virginia courts look to the real, and not the nominal parties to a suit.

In Davis v. Noll, 38 W. Va. 70, 17 S. E. Rep. 792, it was said: "No man can give away negotiable securities, to the detriment of existing creditors, any more than he can give away his horse or house. In such cases the law, avoiding the illegal transfer, treats the fraudulent holder as the agent or trustee secretly suing for the benefit of his principal, and allows all just offsets against such principal. 2 Daniel, Neg. Inst. p. 451; Pates v. St. Clair, 11 Gratt. 24; Smith v. Lawson, 18 W. Va. 240."

320. So that the only ground on which the plaintiffs in error, in any view, can be permitted to contest the validity of the original judgment in this proceeding is, that it was ipso facto void, and furnished no foundation for the execution upon which the forthcoming bond given by them was taken. But surely, this cannot be affirmed of a judgment for the defendant's costs against a party for whose benefit an action is brought in the name of another, and so expressed to be upon the record. Nor do I think the judgment in this case should be held to be irregular or erroneous. Courts of law will for many purposes take notice of the person for whose benefit a suit is brought, though in the name of another. Thus they will not permit the nominal plaintiff to dismiss the suit or release the action. Per Judge Green, Garland v. Richeson, 4 Rand. 266, 268; 1 Tuck. Comm. 347. See also opinion of Judge Buller in Masters v. Miller, 4 T. R. 320, 339. So a receipt given by the nominal plaintiff may be avoided by proof that it was given after the assignment. Henderson v. Wild, 2 Camp. R. 561. And admissions made by him after assignment will not be admitted *in support of demands set up against the claim by way of setoff. Frear v. Evertson, 20 John. R. 142. So though the nominal plaintiff have become bankrupt, the action may be maintained in his name. Winch v. Keeley, 1 T. R. 619. And where a bond was given, payable to the nominal plaintiff, but which was in fact for the use and benefit of another, a claim against that other was allowed by way of setoff. Bottomley v. Brooke, cited 1 T. R. 621. And it seems that it makes no difference that the party was not originally interested in the claim, as in the case last cited: for whether he was merely a trustee originally, or became so by a subsequent assignment of the claim, the court equally takes notice of the rights and relations of the parties. Winch v. Keeley, above cited. So in an action for a balance due on account in the name of the original creditor, for the benefit of a third party to whom it had been assigned with the defendant's consent, the defendant was allowed to offset claims he held against the assignee. Winchester v. Hackley, 2 Cranch R. 342.

Where a party, then, brings a suit for his own benefit, though in the name of another, and afterwards abandons his action, no reason is perceived why the court might not (even prior to the Code of 1849) properly render a judgment for the defendant's costs directly against him, thus noticing him for the purpose of holding him to a just responsibility, as well as for the purpose of protecting him against the acts or admissions of the nominal plaintiff, or any collusion between him and the defendant. Indeed we see that where a suit has been brought in a fictitious name, or in the name of a person without his privity and consent, or of a deceased person, the court will interfere in a summary way, and will hold the party by whom the suit was prompted, or even the attorney in the case, responsible for costs. Gynn v. Kirby, 1 Stra. R. 402; The People v. Bradt, 7 John. R. 539; *Ketcham v. Clark, 4 John. R. 484; Howard v. Rawson, 2 Leigh 733, and authorities there cited.

By the Code of 1849 (p. 706, § 9), it is expressly provided that where there shall be judgment for the defendant's costs in a suit brought in the name of one person for the benefit of another, such judgment shall be against that other. And in the case of Devers v. Ross, 10 Gratt. 252, this court, on reversing the judgment of the Circuit court, rendered the judgment for costs against Flowers, for whose benefit the suit had been brought, although the case had been decided in the Circuit court, and brought to this court by supersedeas before the Code of 1849 was enacted. Indeed, prior to the enactment of that Code, it was the practice of some of the Circuit courts to render the judgment for the defendant's costs (where such a judgment was to be given) against the beneficial party on the record; and considering the extent to which the courts have gone in noticing him for certain purposes, I can perceive no well founded objection to it.

But if the propriety of such a judgment in a general way were more questionable than I think it is, certainly any court may notice the beneficial party on the record for the purpose of receiving his consent to such a judgment. Here, the plaintiff in error John D. Pate, for whose benefit the suit was brought, was the active party by whom it was prompted and dismissed. The attorney in the cause was his attorney, and the consent given to the dismissal of the case and to the judgment for costs, may be fairly referred to him, and should be construed as his consent.

I am of opinion to affirm the judgment. The other judges concurred in the opinion of Lee, J.

April Term, 1854, Richmond.

Statute of Limitations—Departure from State—Case at Bar.*—A debt, if it had any existence, was contracted in 1819, when the debtor lived in Virginia, and was by parol. He shortly afterwards removed from the state, and remained out of it until his death in 1826. In 1840 a proceeding by foreign attachment was instituted to recover the debt. HOLD: The statute of limitations is a good defence to the proceeding.

The case is fully stated in the opinion of Judge Samuels.

Baxter, for the appellants.
Cocke, for the appellee.

SAMUELS, J. This cause is brought here by appeal from a decree of the Circuit superior court of law and chancery for Bedford county, in a suit wherein John Hancock, administrator of Mary Burch, was complainant, and John Markle, Nicholas Robertson, administrator of Charles Markle deceased, and others were defendants. The suit was originally brought, in the County court of Bedford county, by Mary Burch in her lifetime, and afterwards taken to the said Circuit court, and, on the death of complainant, revived in the name of her administrator. The subpoena instituting the suit issued November 14th, 1820, against John Markle and John Fizee, with an endorsement thereon in these words:

“Memo.—This suit is against John Fizee, to recover of him money due to the other defendants, and said John Fizee is hereby forbid to pay away or out of his hands the sum of two hundred dollars, if so much he *owes said John Markle, until the final decision of this suit, or until the order of Bedford court.

Complainant's bill was filed May 14th, 1823; and although the allegations therein are somewhat equivocal, yet it must be held to assert that John Markle, the absent defendant, was indebted to complainant; and to seek to apply a debt alleged to be due from John Fizee the home defendant, to said absent defendant, in satisfaction of complainant's demand. The bill alleged that complainant Mary Burch was tenant for life of a small tract of land, the reversion whereof belonged to Charles Markle; that in the year 1818 Charles Markle and his son John Markle being about to remove to the state of Missouri, John Markle, who transacted his father's business, and sold his property at pleasure, was anxious to sell said tract of land, but found some difficulty in selling it with the incumbrance of complainant's life estate thereon. That complainant was induced to sell and convey her life estate to John Fizee, for a consideration promised to her by John Markle. Charles Markle is named as defendant in the bill, but not in the process; nor is there any distinct allegation of fact which could subject him to any demand of complainant. From the want of precision in stating the terms on which complainant sold her property, it is doubtful what consideration she was to receive. It is clear enough, however, that whatever it was, it was to be paid by John Markle. It is not alleged that Charles Markle made any contract whatever in regard to the purchase of complainant's life estate. It appears clearly, moreover, that Fizee's bonds for the price of the land were made payable to John Markle; and that the money due on these bonds was the subject attached in this suit. It is quite probable, perhaps certain, upon the record on the original bill, *that Charles Markle permitted his son to sell the reversion for the son's own benefit. Certain proceedings were had upon the original bill up to the August term of the County court in 1823, the result of which was, that one William R. Porter, who claimed the fund attached, was permitted to receive it upon giving bond with condition to comply with any future order or decree in the cause.

No step whatever appears to have been taken in the cause from October 1823 until November 1840, when leave was granted to complainant to amend her bill, making new parties.

In the amended bill complainant changes the ground taken in the original bill. She now alleged that John Markle's action on the subject of the purchase was only as agent for Charles Markle; that the price to be paid in money was a debt due from Charles Markle, and accordingly sought to subject his property to the payment thereof. The parol evidence taken when the cause was pending on the original bill was strong to show that John Markle was the debtor; the evidence of the same witnesses, taken pending the amended bill, tends to show that Charles Markle was the debtor; the evidence in writing to wit, John Markle's stipulation to pay, Charles Markle's deed, the bonds of Fizee executed to John Markle, shows, satisfactorily, that John Markle was dealing with complainant on his own account, and that the purchase money for the life estate was due from him to complainant, as alleged in the original bill. The decree subjected Charles Markle's estate to complainant's debt; and from this decree this appeal is taken.

After an acquiescence of seventeen years in the allegations of the original bill, sustained by the written evidence, it would require much stronger evidence than complainant offered to sustain her amended bill, especially after Charles Markle's death.

29 If the complainant had established a debt against Charles Markle, it must have originated in 1819, when the deed to Fizee was executed, and when Charles Markle was in Virginia. The first attempt to subject Charles Markle's estate was made in 1840; and the defendants rely upon the statute of limitations. There is nothing in the pleadings or proofs to prevent the operation of the statute, if the debt ever existed. In Wilkinson, &c. v. Holloway, 7 Leigh 277, four of the five judges who decided that case, held that the debt due to the attaching creditors was a bond debt, and that therefore the statute was no bar to the recovery. The debt in this case, if any, is upon simple contract merely.

I am of opinion to reverse the decree and dismiss the bill, with costs of both courts to the appellants.

*Note by Reporter.—Charles Markle removed to Missouri a short time after the contract was made, and remained there until his death in 1828.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Samuels, J.

Decree reversed.

April Term, 1854, Richmond.

1. Bonds—Assignment—Subrogation—Case at Bar.—W, administrator of G, assigns the bond of T to the executors of H, in discharge of a debt due from G to H. The executors of H sue T, and recover a judgment upon the bond; and he thereupon enjoins it on the ground that G was indebted to him for a legacy left by R, of whom G had been executor: And this injunction is afterwards perpetuated. HELD: That the executors of H are entitled to be substituted to the rights of T against G's estate; and are not confined to their remedy upon the assignment of W.

2. Injunction—Consent to Perpetuation—Case at Bar.—In this injunction suit the executors of H and W and the administrator de bonis non of G, are parties, and they consent to the decree perpetuating the injunction; and also to a decree directing the executor of W, and the administrator de bonis non, to settle their accounts of administration upon G's estate. HELD:

1. *Same—Same—Decree between Co-defendants.—That it is a case in which there may be a decree between co-defendants in favor of the executors of H against G's estate.

2. Same—Same—Account.—That to ascertain whether there were assets of G's estate to pay the debt, the court might direct the accounts.

3. Same—Same—Same.—If the propriety of a decree against the assets of G's estate was otherwise doubtful, the consent of the representatives of W and G clearly authorized it.

3. Same—Same—Binding—Case at Bar.—Though upon a hearing it might have been improper to perpetuate the injunction, yet the administrator de bonis non of G having consented to the decree; and all the parties appearing to have acted in good faith, the executors of H are not thereby deprived of their remedy over against G's estate in the hands of a subsequent administrator de bonis non of G.

4. Same—Same—Case at Bar.—Ten years after the perpetuation of the injunction, the second administrator de bonis non of G entered into an agreement under seal, with the executors of H, to pay the debt out of the assets of G's estate, when they should be received; and the executors agreed to wait with him twelve months, and to release their costs in the injunction suit, and dismiss it as far as they were concerned. But the administrator was not to be bound personally; and the executors were at liberty, if the money was not paid at the end of the year, to cancel the agreement, and proceed to enforce any of their existing legal remedies. The administrator did not collect assets

31 *within the year; and the executors afterwards sued upon this agreement. HELD:

1. Same—Same—Statute of Limitations—Case at Bar.—That though the right of the executors of H to proceed against G's estate accrued when the injunction was perpetuated, yet the pendency of the injunction suit carried on for their benefit.

*See Glenn v. Clark, 21 Gratt. 35, and foot-note.

2. Executors and Administrators—Promise to Pay Debts Out of Estate.—That although it is generally true, that an executor or administrator cannot create a new cause of action against the estate, yet he may make a valid promise to pay a debt not barred by the statute of limitations, out of the assets of the estate, upon which a suit may be maintained.

3. Same—Same—Consideration.—That there was a sufficient consideration in this case to sustain the agreement made by the administrator de bonis non of G; and suit could be maintained upon it by the executors of H against the administrator for satisfaction out of the assets.

4. Equity Practice—Marshaling Assets—Case at Bar.—That it was proper to sue in equity to have an account of or marshaling of assets; and this especially as the agreement being under seal. It was doubtful whether an action at law could be maintained upon it.

The following statement of the case is made by Judge Moncure:

In 1810, Benjamin Harrison being a creditor to a large amount of the estate of Philip L. Grymes, Robert West, the administrator of Grymes, paid the debt by an assignment of bonds taken at the sale of the personal estate; and in the settlement of the administration account the estate was credited with the amount of the bonds, and debited with the amount of the debt. Among the bonds assigned was one of Morgan Tomkies. In due time after this bond became due in October 1810, Harrison's executors brought suit upon it, and obtained judgment in October 1812. A forthcoming bond was given, on which judgment was obtained in May 1813. In October following, Tomkies enjoined the judgment in the †Executors and Administrators—Promise to Pay Debt Out of Estate.—The proposition laid down in the principal case, that an executor or administrator cannot create a new cause of action against the estate, yet he may make a valid promise to pay a debt not barred by the statute of limitations, out of the assets of the estate, upon which a suit may be maintained, is approved in Switzer v. Noffsinger, 82 Va. 524.

Death of Executor—Administrator d. b. n.—Revival of Suits.—In Jones v. Reid, 12 W. Superior court of chancery at Williamsburg; stating in his bill, that as administrator of Catharine Wyatt and guardian of her only child, he had become entitled to a legacy of three *hundred pounds, given to her by her father John Robinson, of whom Grymes was executor; that no part of the legacy had been paid, though considerable estate of Robinson had come to the hands of Grymes. That he, Tomkies, had instituted a suit which was then pending in said court, for the recovery of the legacy. That he had been induced to become a purchaser at the sale of Grymes' estate, and to become bound for the purchases of his ward at the sale, by the promise of West not to transfer the bond until the claim for the legacy should be ascertained; and by an understanding with him that the amount of the bond, or so much of it as might be necessary, should be set off against the legacy, or the balance which might be ascertained in the said suit to be due thereon; and that West, in violation of his said promise and agreement, had assigned the bond to Harrison's executors, who had recovered judgment and sued out execution thereon: and praying for an injunction of the judgment until the report of the commissioner in the suit brought for the recovery of the legacy as aforesaid, and for general relief. Harrison's executors, and West, administrator of Grymes, were made defendants. In April 1814, Harrison's executors filed their answer, stating that their testator was a creditor by bond of Grymes for a considerable amount; that one of them attended the sale for the purpose of obtaining payment; that the negroes were sold on credit, and nothing better could be done than to receive bonds executed by purchasers at the sale to the amount of the debt; and that he accordingly received by assignment from West, administrator as aforesaid, several bonds, among which was that of Tomkies. They profess ignorance of the facts stated in the bill on which the complainant's claim to relief was founded. In June following, West, administrator of Grymes, filed his answer, positively denying all the grounds of equity *contained in the bill, and expressing a belief that nothing was due on account of the legacy. In October following, a motion was made to dissolve the injunction. But the court overruled the motion, and ordered that unless the parties were satisfied with a certain report mentioned in the order, and would consent to a copy of that report being evidence in the case subject to exceptions, a commissioner should take an account of Grymes' administration of Robinson's estate, and ascertain the balance due on the said legacy, and make report to the court. In September 1815, the death of the plaintiff Tomkies was suggested, and a scire facias awarded to revive the suit in the name of his executor. In June 1818, the suit was revived by consent in the name of Robins, administrator of the plaintiff, against George West, executor of Robert West, who was administrator of Grymes, who was executor of Robinson, and George Healy, administrator of Grymes; and thereupon the cause coming on by consent to be heard on the bill, answers, exhibits and depositions, the defendants consenting that a copy of the accounts filed in the case of Chowning & wife v. West, adm'r of Grymes, settling the transactions of Grymes on the estate of Robinson, might be taken as the account in the case; the court, on consideration thereof, and with the consent of the parties, perpetuated the injunction; and, with the like consent, decreed that the defendant George West should settle the administration account of his intestate on the estate of Grymes, and the defendant Healy should settle his administration account on the same estate, before a commissioner of the court, who was directed to state, settle and report the same. Sundry proceedings were afterwards had without effect, to compel George West to settle the account directed to be settled by him as aforesaid. From a 34 report filed in the case it appears that his reason for failing to do so *was, that the vouchers relative to Robert West's administration of Grymes' estate were in the hands of Commissioner Ladd for a settlement of the account in another case, and could not be given up until he had reported on them. In July 1823, the suit was transferred to the Superior court of chancery for the Richmond district. In April 1827, George West being dead, and Healy no longer administrator of Grymes, a scire facias was awarded to revive the suit against Price Perkins, administrator de bonis non of Robert West, and Carter Braxton, administrator de bonis non of Grymes.

In this state of the case of Tomkies v. West, an agreement of compromise was entered into between John F. May, acting for the surviving executor of Harrison, and Braxton. Mr. May, it seems, had been retained by Harrison's executor to prosecute the suit after its removal to Richmond; and in December 1826 wrote a letter to Braxton, stating his views of the case, and of the liability both of West's and Grymes' estates to Harrison, and proposing, as Harrison's executor was old and averse to trouble and litigation, that bond with security should be given for the payment of the debt at some future time, when it might be expected that it could in a legal course be recovered. This letter commenced a negotiation which terminated in the agreement aforesaid, bearing date the 31st of January 1828. That agreement, which is under the hands and seals of the parties, states that they had compromised the matters in difference between Grymes' administrator and Harrison's executor in the suit of Tomkies v. West, in which they were both parties; by which compromise it was agreed that Braxton, or his successor, should pay to Harrison's executor the amount of the original judgment against Tomkies on his bond assigned to Harrison's executors as aforesaid, out of the assets of Grymes, so soon 35 as *Braxton should have a sufficiency to pay the same in his hands. That he should have twelve months in which to make such payment; that, upon its being made, George E. and William B. Harrison, legatees of Benjamin Harrison, would execute a bond with good security, to refund to Braxton the amount so paid, provided any debt of superior dignity should be legally established against Grymes' estate, and there should not be assets sufficient for the payment thereof; that after such payment Harrison's executor would renounce all costs of the suit of Tomkies v. West, and give a discharge for the same, and, as far as he was concerned in the suit, enter a dismissal thereof; that if the said debt should not be fully paid at the termination of the stipulated period, Harrison's executor should be at liberty to resort to any legal means for the recovery thereof; and that nothing contained in the agreement should be construed to bind Braxton in any other capacity than that of representative of Grymes. At the foot of the agreement is a memoranda signed by Braxton, by which it was further agreed that if Harrison's executor should at the end of six months see fit to cancel the agreement, he might do so upon requiring Braxton to cancel the duplicate thereof in his possession.

In November 1828, Braxton wrote a letter to George E. Harrison, in answer to one received from him, in which letter this language is used: "In answer, I have to remark that the arrangement made between Mr. May and myself, relative to the debt due from Mr. Grymes' estate to your father, was done with the intent to end a perplexed and disagreeable law suit. On my part, as the present representative of Mr. Grymes, I was fully convinced of the justness of the claim, and wished for no other litigation. At the time this arrangement was entered into, I expected to obtain an immediate decree in favor of Mr. Grymes'

36 *estate against one of the former administrators for a considerable amount. Under this expectation, I only wanted time to enable me to realize the money arising from that claim." The writer then states that his expectation had been disappointed; and after referring to other sources of payment, including Mr. Grymes' land, which he says he would sell and pay the debt if he could, he uses this language: "Had the decree been obtained in January last, you should have had the money before this. Whenever the money is made, the debt to your father's estate shall be forthwith settled."

In October 1829, Braxton wrote another letter to Harrison, in which this language is used: "I expect a decree at the next chancery term for the Richmond district, against the preceding administrator on Mr. Grymes' estate, and his securities, who are very ample, for a very large amount, between sixteen and seventeen thousand dollars. There are other very large claims due the estate of Mr. Grymes; but these are the first that I expect will be tangible.

Now, out of the first money collected you will be wholly, or for the greater part of your claim, satisfied."—"The compromise between Judge May and myself terminated a source of litigation that would have consumed as much time and expense as any one with which I have become acquainted, considering the number and distance of the various parties. That compromise bound the parties to settle on specified terms, and if they did not do so in twelve months, then the representatives of your father's estate were to be at liberty to pursue their original remedy. Now, I hardly imagine that it would possibly be expected a suit of the complex nature of the one that the compromise ended could be matured, sooner than the expectations I have mentioned will be realized. I hope, however,

37 your necessities may not press you before payment can be made. *The personal estate of Mr. G. in my hands is very inconsiderable. If a judgment was now had, before satisfaction of it could be obtained it would be necessary to bring a suit to subject the lands of Mr. G."

Braxton having failed to pay the debt to Harrison's executor, the latter, in April 1833, in conjunction with George E. and William B. Harrison, sons and distributees of Benjamin Harrison, filed their bill in the Circuit court of Middlesex, for the purpose of enforcing the execution of the agreement aforesaid; setting out the material facts in relation to the agreement, and the debt for the payment of which it was entered into; charging that personal estate of Grymes to a considerable amount had come to the hands of Braxton as his administrator; that a large amount of real estate was then held by Braxton and wife in her right as sole heir and devisee of Grymes; that the estate of Grymes, both real and personal, was bound for the payment of the said debt, of which no part had been paid, and that the said George and William B. Harrison were then entitled to the whole of the said debt by the consent of Harrison's executor; making Braxton, administrator de bonis non with the will annexed of Grymes, and Braxton and wife defendants to the bill; and praying for suitable relief. The agreement and said two letters of Braxton were filed as exhibits. And a bond was executed by the said George E. and William B. Harrison and a surety, in the terms prescribed by the agreement, and filed with the bill.

In July 1833, Braxton as administrator, and also for himself and wife, filed an answer. He sets out the substance of the letter received by him from Mr. May in December 1826; says that at no time prior to the agreement had he ever examined the suit of Tomkies v. West, nor did he at the time of the agreement have any knowledge of that suit derived from any other source

38 than the letter; and that, entertaining no doubt *that the facts of the case were truly stated by Mr. May, and that his opinion as to the law arising on the facts was sound and correct, he consented to execute, and did execute, the agreement. He says that according to his understanding of the agreement, if the debt should not be paid in twelve months from its date, Harrison's executor was to be at liberty to resort to any legal means for the recovery of the debt which he might have used if the agreement had never been made: in other words, might go on with the suit of Tomkies v. West. And he insists, that without any further enquiry this suit ought to be dismissed, and the plaintiffs turned over to that suit for any relief to which they might be entitled. But if that course should not be taken, he says the court will have to determine how far he was bound, anterior to the agreement, as the representative of Grymes' estate: in other words, whether the plaintiffs have any equitable claim against that estate. He then sets out the facts in regard to the assignment of Tomkies' bond, the proceedings at law upon it, and the proceedings in the injunction suit; and insists that when Harrison's executors delivered up to West, as administrator of Grymes, the evidence of debt which they held, and gave a receipt in full for the debt, the estate of Grymes became entirely exonerated. The claim henceforth was a claim on the bond against the obligors; or, if it could not be collected of them by due diligence, on the contract of assignment against West individually, and not as administrator of Grymes; as no administrator can make any new contract binding upon his decedent's estate. He further insists that it is manifest from the record in the suit of Tomkies v. West, that the injunction never would have been perpetuated, if the executors of Harrison had not consented to it. He then says that since March 1830 he has discovered most material 39 testimony in the record of a suit in the *County court of Middlesex, in which Wyatt and wife were plaintiffs, and Grymes, executor of Robinson, defendant, commenced in 1797, and abated by the death of Grymes in 1805; which suit was brought for the recovery of the same legacy claimed by Tomkies in the injunction suit. The tendency of that testimony is to show that Wyatt had given Philip Samson an order on Grymes for the legacy, and that Samson had received the amount of it, in whole or in part. Other matters are stated in the answer, but need not be here further referred to. The letter of May to Braxton was filed as an exhibit.

In July 1846, the deposition of May was returned and filed by the plaintiffs. He makes the following, among other statements: "There had been some communications, perhaps verbal as well as written, between Mr. Braxton and myself; and some time after them Mr. B. met me in this city, and we examined together the chancery papers in the old suit of Tomkies v. West, and finally entered into the agreement manifested by that paper. I recollect the circumstances of our having the papers before us, because at that time I discovered, first, according to my present recollection, that the decree perpetuating the injunction purported to have been made by the consent of Harrison's executors as well as Grymes' executor, which Mr. Braxton and myself both concluded to have been a mistake in the draft of the note for a decree."—"The papers in that suit were certainly before us at the time that agreement was entered into, and the subject of the consent order was then mentioned in our conversation; and my recollection is that Mr. Braxton and myself examined the papers, on at least two different days during his then visit to Richmond before we entered into the agreement."

In June 1847, the cause coming on to be heard in the Superior court of chancery for the Richmond circuit, *(to which it had been transferred,) on the bill, &c., and upon the original record of the case of Tomkies v. West, pending in the same court, including the record of the case of Wyatt & wife v. Robinson's ex'or, filed therein as an exhibit on the 28th of January 1831, the court was of opinion, and decided, that the estate of Grymes was justly indebted to the estate of Harrison in the sum of one thousand and seventy-seven dollars and twenty cents, with interest from the 11th of October 1810 till paid, and nine dollars and fifty-one cents costs, according to the stipulations of the agreement aforesaid. But as no decree could be rendered for the payment of the money without a settlement of the accounts of Braxton as administrator of Grymes, the court decreed, that unless the defendant Braxton should admit assets in his hands of the estate of Grymes sufficient to satisfy the said claim, then the said defendant should render, before one of the commissioners of the court, an account of his administration of the said estate. And the said commissioner was directed to ascertain and report to the court what real estate and its value was left by Grymes at his death and passed to his heirs or devisees.

It is probable that Harrison was a creditor of Philip L. Grymes. This debt West the administrator of Grymes paid, took a receipt for the payment, and has received a credit for it in his administration of Grymes' estate. The debt was then discharged; and if any liability exists on that account, it must arise out of a new contract. This debt of Harrison was paid in part by the assignment by West to Harrison's executors of the bond of Tomkies; and any existing liability to Harrison's executors must arise out of that assignment. If Harrison's executors used due diligence to recover the money from Tomkies and failed, then West was *liable on his assignment. Harrison's executors did sue Tomkies, and obtain a judgment against him, which he then enjoined on the ground that as administrator of Wyatt he held a claim against Grymes' estate. To this suit Harrison's executors and West were parties; and the injunction was perpetuated by their consent. This result, it is most obvious from an inspection of the record, could not have occurred but by the consent of Harrison's executors; and therefore they might have obtained their money from Tomkies. And if West's consent bound him, still Grymes' estate should not have been subjected; and as West was only liable as assignor, the action against him was barred in five years, and in fact no action was ever instituted against him. Nor could the decree for an account in that cause have the effect to prevent the bar of the statute; because there could be no decree upon that bill between codefendants. 2 Rob. Pr. 397-8; Yerby v. Grigsby, 9 Leigh 387; Crawford v. McDaniel, 1 Rob. R. 448; Eccleston v. Lord Skelmersdale, 1 Beav. R. 396, 17 Eng. Ch. R. 396; Goodwin v. Clewley, 2 Beav. R. 30, 17 Eng. Ch. R. 30.

When the decree perpetuating the injunction was made, Harrison's executors should have been left to their action on the assignment. This right of action arose in 1818, more than nine years before the suit was revived against Braxton as representative of Grymes; and it was then irregularly revived, because in fact there was no case to revive. Tomkies had obtained all he asked, and he could not amend a bill to set up a claim of Harrison's executors against Grymes' estate.

Such was the condition of things as to Braxton and Grymes' estate when May wrote his letter to Braxton; a letter which, whatever was the purpose of the writer, did mislead Braxton; and he was misled when he executed the agreement, as is plainly shown both on the face of the agreement and the letters filed. We *do not insist that the action of May was fraudulent; but parties coming into equity for relief, the court must apply to them the principles applicable to other cases of the specific execution of contract. For these principles the court is referred to 2 Rob. Pr. 169, 170; 1 Story's Equ. Jur. § 750. Certainly equity will not execute an agreement where there is neither a meritorious nor valuable consideration; nor will it even aid a defective conveyance. Darlington v. McCoole, 1 Leigh 36. Here, though this agreement is called a compromise, yet it is all on one side, and is without consideration. The whole amount of the claim of Harrison's executors is their judgment against Tomkies, and that is to be paid in full. As to the costs, they were not coming to Harrison's executors, but to Tomkies, and the executors had no control over them. But moreover, the agreement expresses on its face, that Braxton did not bind himself further than he was bound before. Is this then a contract which a court of equity will enforce? There must be mutuality in the contract, and for that reason the contracts of infants will not be enforced even at their suit. Flight v. Bolland, 3 Cond. Eng. Ch. R. 675. Does anybody imagine that an action at law could be maintained against Braxton upon this agreement, in his individual character? And if not, certainly an action could not be maintained upon it against him as administrator. If an action against him as administrator could be maintained, then probably there might be a bill to enforce it, and for an account of assets. But if such an action cannot be maintained upon it, then there cannot be a bill in equity founded upon it.

In fact, the bill in this case is not based upon the agreement, but upon the case as it existed before the agreement was made. The plaintiffs claim as assignees and upon the doctrine of subrogation. The first 43 ground cannot be good against Grymes' estate if not *good against the assignor West: And we have already shown that the statute bars the claim against him. Then as to the right of subrogation. The bond due to Harrison has been paid, and paid out of Grymes' estate. Whatever right exists must arise as before said, out of the assignment. When that right is barred, any right arising out of it must be at an end. But if Harrison's executors are entitled to be subrogated to West, they can only have the same rights which West has against Grymes' estate. But West has no such right, because he assented to the decree perpetuating the injunction; or if he had any, certainly he was only entitled to a credit in his account of administration for the amount.

I take it to be clear law, that where a bond is assigned as the bond in this case was, and it is not a valid bond, it is no payment, but there is a failure of consideration, and the assignee has a right to come back upon his debtor upon the foot of his original debt. In such a case the assignment of the bond is not a payment.

There is nothing in the record of Tomkies v. Haxall which shows negligence in the prosecution of the claim by Harrison's executors against Tomkies. The counsel for the appellant has argued the cause without reference to the fact that Grymes' administrator was a party in that cause, and a party consenting to the perpetuation of the injunction in that cause. And it cannot be successfully maintained, that when the assignor and assignee are united in the defence, and the assignor assents to the defeat of the claim, the assignee shall be precluded from his remedy against him. But in fact there was no proof in the cause which would have authorized the dissolution of the injunction. There was proof that 44 Wyatt's legacy due from Grymes had *been assigned to Tomkies, and there was no proof that it had been paid. The old case of Tomkies v. Grymes was not discovered for twelve years after the consent decree. There is no proof that its existence was known to Harrison's executors; and it was not even known to Braxton when he filed his first answer in the case of Tomkies v. Haxall.

But it is insisted that the statute of limitations bars the claim of Harrison's executors; and this because there could be no decree between codefendants in Tomkies against Haxall. The authorities cited by the counsel on the other side are against him. The whole question in controversy in that case was, whether the bond of Tomkies assigned by West to Harrison's executors was due. In this question the interest of Harrison's executors and Grymes' administrator was the same; and when it was held that the bond was not due, everything was ascertained which was necessary to entitle Harrison's executors to a decree over against Grymes' administrator.

But the present suit is upon the agreement between May on behalf of Harrison's executors and Braxton. This agreement is under seal, and relates to a matter of which Braxton was fully informed. If, therefore, the case of Tomkies v. Haxall is at an end, and the claim arising out of it is barred by the statute, Grymes' estate is bound by this new agreement, because it admits the debt as still due. But it is said there is no mutuality in the contract. Braxton only bound himself to pay what he admitted to be due out of the assets of the estate. He obtained a delay of twelve months, which he deemed of material advantage to him, and was discharged from the costs of the suit; and he settled a protracted controversy.

It is argued that we claim through West, and that he is not entitled to recover against Grymes' estate: And this is the vice 45 of the argument on the other side. *We do not claim through West. We say that the bond of Tomkies not being a valid debt, the assignment of that bond to Harrison's executors was not a payment; but that so much of our original debt due by bond, is a still subsisting debt, which we are entitled to have paid out of the estate of Grymes the debtor.

Robinson, for the appellant, in reply:

It is argued by the counsel for the appellees, that the debt due from Grymes to Harrison had never been paid. It has been taken in receipted as paid, and the administrator of Grymes has been allowed a credit for its payment. It was paid in part by Morgan Tomkies' bond; and whatever rights the plaintiffs have in this case must arise out of that contract of assignment. They may have taken it without recourse, and in that case they must certainly lose it. It is, therefore, this contract which is the origin of their rights. It may be that in the case of a forged bond the payment might be treated as a nullity; but here was a valid bond, proved to be so by the judgment upon it. When then West passed this bond to Harrison's executors, he passed to them value. But if it is said it was a forged bond, or that it was subject to setoff, then this is to be proved. Here West in his answer says a part of this setoff, and he believes all of it, had been paid. Then is it enough for Harrison's executors to consent to the decree, and to use it to prove their claim against Grymes' estate.

If any question of law is settled, it is settled law that Harrison's executors have no claim upon the foundation of the original debt. Thacher v. Dinsmore, 5 Mass. R. 299; Bank of St. Albans v. Gilliland, 23 Wend. R. 311; Shore v. Shore, 22 Eng. Ch. R. 378. If there had been a surety in the original bond, could his liability be revived? This subject is well treated in Wiseman v. Lyman*, 7 Mass. R. 286. Then when West transferred Tomkies' bond in discharge of Grymes' debt, the remedy of Harrison's executors is upon his undertaking whether express or implied upon the transfer. In a transfer of a forged note there is an implied warranty of its genuineness; but there is no such warranty that the parties are solvent. Edmunds v. Digges, 1 Gratt. 359. If, therefore, West had paid the amount in bank notes, Harrison's executors would have had no remedy either upon the original bond or the notes. And in Mays v. Callison, 6 Leigh 230, it is said that it might be submitted to the jury whether upon all the facts there was a warranty that the bond had not been paid: That was an action by an assignee against his assignor. The liabilities of an assignor are stated in Turneys v. Hunt, 8 B. Monr. 401. In all such cases, where the bond assigned is a valid instrument, as was the bond in this case, the question of the assignor's liability resolves itself into a question of due diligence; and upon that question there can be no doubt in this case, unless the injunction concludes it; which it does not. McClung v. Arbuckle, 6 Munf. 315. It is clear that if due diligence had been used the injunction would not have been perpetuated: For certainly West had a right to enforce the payment by Tomkies of his bond. White v. Banister, 1 Wash. 166; Pulliam v. Winston, 5 Leigh 324. This would have been the case if West had sued Tomkies; and the case is still stronger when the suit is by an assignee; as no equity could be set up against the bond unless there had been notice of it before the assignment. Here there was no such equity; for West denies expressly the equity set up in the bill; and there was no proof of it in the cause. Then it was the fault of Harrison's executors that the injunction was perpetuated; and they therefore can have no equity to compel Grymes' estate to pay the debt.

47 *There is but one answer to this argument: That is, that Grymes owed Tomkies. This is necessary to their recovery, and they must prove it. The proofs we think ought to satisfy the court that Tomkies had no valid claim against Grymes' estate; but whether or not this be so, Harrison's executors do not prove that he had. They attempt to obviate this objection by the concurrent consent of West's and Grymes' administrators. But this does not excuse Harrison's executors, unless they show that Grymes' estate has not been injured by the perpetuation of the injunction.

But if Harrison's executors had a right to recover from Grymes' estate the amount of Tomkies' bond, that recovery was to be had either in the suit of Tomkies v. Haxall, or by a new action. If they could not recover in that suit, then their claim was barred after five years from the perpetuation of the injunction. If they could have recovered in that suit, then this suit was improperly instituted: And this objection is distinctly taken in the answer of Braxton. This conclusion is inevitable if the case of Heywood v. Covington, 4 Leigh 373, is to be respected.

But the agreement between May acting for Harrison's executors and Braxton is relied on to sustain this claim. If this new agreement is to alter the rights and liabilities of the parties, then Braxton was misled. The letters show that he derived his information from May. There was, moreover, no consideration for the agreement. It is said Braxton obtained a year's indulgence. But this is no consideration. Forbearance to an executor is only a consideration where he binds himself; and this he expressly declined to do. There were in fact no assets in his hands at the time; and if there were assets, it was not the interest of the estate that indulgence should be given. As to the dismissal of the suit, that was not within the control of Harrison's *executors; and in fact it is not yet dismissed: And the same may be said of the costs.

It is argued that the agreement and letters dispense with the proof of due diligence, and that the debt was just. It would be most unjust that these papers should have this effect. Braxton knew the facts or he did not. If he did not, then he could not be bound. If he did know, a court of equity will not permit an executor to injure the estate by his admissions. Since the statute, Code, p. 548, § 6, his admissions could not affect Grymes' estate. According to the weight of authority, no executor can preclude the estate from setting up any defence by his admissions. Thompson v. Peter, 12 Wheat. R. 565; Tullock v. Dunn, 21 Eng. C. L. 478; Scholey v. Walton, 12 Mees. & Welsb. 510; Fritz v. Thomas, 1 Whart. R. 66; Reynolds v. Hamilton, 7 Watts' R. 420. If the claim was not just without the agreement and letters, it is not just with them. This agreement then gives no strength to the plaintiffs' claim either to the right or to the remedy; and therefore the bill should be dismissed.

MONCURE, J., after stating the case, proceeded:

It was contended by the counsel for the appellants in this case, that conceding that the bond of Tomkies was assigned by West to Harrison's executors in payment of a debt due by Grymes to them, and that they used due diligence to recover the amount of the bond, but failed to do so by reason of its being satisfied by a debt due by Grymes to Tomkies; still they would have no claim to relief, even in equity, against Grymes' estate; and would have to rely alone on the recourse which his contract of assignment might give them against West individually.

It will be a sufficient answer to the above proposition to say, that if the bond 49 of Tomkies was satisfied *by a debt due by Grymes to Tomkies, it was a debt of the highest dignity; being due by Grymes, who was executor of John Robinson, to Tomkies, as assignee of a legacy given by said Robinson to his daughter Mrs. Wyatt. This debt was not charged to the estate of Grymes in the administration account of West; and having, in effect, been paid by Harrison's executors, they are entitled to be substituted in equity to the place of the creditor, and to have the debt, to the extent to which they are entitled to it, paid out of the estate of Grymes.

It was further contended, that if Harrison's executors could have had any recourse against the estate of Grymes for the amount of Tomkies' bond, it could only have been on the terms of using due diligence to collect the bond; and that they did not use due diligence, in as much as they consented to the decree perpetuating the injunction of the judgment on the bond, without which consent the injunction would not have been perpetuated.

It is not pretended that there was any want of diligence on the part of Harrison's executors, except in giving their consent to the decree of perpetuation. They seem to have been prompt, not only in asserting their claim against Grymes' estate on the day of sale, but in suing on the bond of Tomkies shortly after it became due, and obtaining a judgment at law, and then a judgment on a forthcoming bond, when they were enjoined from further proceedings. They promptly filed their answer to the bill of injunction, and moved to dissolve it; but their motion was overruled, and an account was ordered. Afterwards, by consent of parties, the cause came on to be heard, the same account settled in another case was taken as the account in the injunction suit, and the injunction was dissolved. Whether it would have been dissolved but for such consent, it is impossible to say, and unnecessary to 50 *decide. There was filed with the bill an affidavit of Wyatt, the only child and distributee at law of the legatee Mrs. Wyatt, sustaining its allegation; to the reading of which affidavit as evidence no exception was taken. The record of the suit of Wyatt & wife v. Grymes, in the County court of Middlesex, was not an exhibit in the injunction suit, and had not then been discovered. It is true the answer of West denied the equity of the bill, and was sustained in part by a deposition. In the condition in which the case was, the injunction should, I think, have been dissolved. But the court did not think so, and overruled the motion for that purpose, and ordered the account. This was an indication of the opinion of the court, that if upon taking the account, Grymes should be found to owe as much on account of the legacy as the amount of the judgment, the injunction should be perpetuated. And when afterwards the same account was taken in another suit of another legatee of Robinson, and it was thereby ascertained that Grymes had received ample estate of Robinson to pay all his legacies, the representatives of West and of Grymes, who were defendants in the injunction suit, doubtless wishing to save the trouble and expense of retaking the same account, and believing that there was at least as much due on the legacy to Mrs. Wyatt as was equal to the amount of the judgment against Tomkies, consented to the perpetuation of the injunction. There was nothing then in the case to show that any part of the legacy had been paid. West had said in his answer that he had a voucher for the payment of one hundred pounds, and that it was probable nothing was due on account of the legacy; but there was no proof to sustain these allegations.

And when the cause came on to be heard, it presented but one difficulty; and that was in regard to the right of Tomkies
51 to have his bond set off against *the legacy. So far as Grymes' estate was concerned, it was simply a question whether so much of the legacy as was equal to the amount of the bond should be paid to Harrison's executors or some other person. If the injunction should be perpetuated, it would be due to Harrison's executors: If dissolved, to Tomkies, or some other person. It was, therefore, of no consequence to Grymes' estate whether it was perpetuated or dissolved. It was desirable of course to end the litigation; and it could best be ended by a consent decree; to which, it seems from the record, the consent of Harrison's executors was obtained. The representatives of West and of Grymes seem, therefore, to have acted in good faith in consenting to the decree. Certainly there is nothing to impugn the good faith of Harrison's executors in giving their consent, if in fact they did give it; as must be taken to be the fact, since it so appears by the record. They might lose, but could not gain, by giving their consent. By doing so, they gave up all claim against Tomkies, and consented to retain only their recourse against Grymes' estate. They could safely do this if they chose, with the consent of the representatives of West and of Grymes. An assignee may safely be governed by the instructions of the assignor in the management of the assigned claim: and ordinarily he could not disregard them without endangering his recourse against the assignor. When an obligor in an assigned bond enjoins a judgment on the bond on the ground of some equity existing between himself and the assignor, the assignee is generally ignorant of the facts, and leaves them to be litigated between the obligor and assignor. He has a right to require strict proof of the facts, because he has a right to enforce the bond if due, as well as to have his recourse against the assignor. But he may, if he choose, waive the former right and retain the latter, if the assignor admit the ground of 52 equity and consent *to a decree of perpetuation. The consent of the assignee to the decree has no other effect than as a waiver of his right to proceed further on the bond, and cannot affect his recourse against the assignor, who also consented. Nothing would be plainer than this in a case in which an assignor is acting in his own right, and there can be no difference in a case in which he is acting as administrator; supposing him to act in good faith, or that the assignee has no notice or reason to believe that he is acting otherwise. An administrator has an undoubted right to confess a judgment, or consent to a decree, if he believes that the interest of the estate he represents requires it. Whether, therefore, the injunction would have been perpetuated or not without the consent of Harrison's executors, yet as West's and Grymes' representatives also consented, and as all parties seem to have acted in good faith in the matter, Harrison's executors did not thereby forfeit their recourse against the estate of Grymes, but became entitled, by the perpetuation of the injunction, to demand of that estate the amount of the judgment against Tomkies.

It was further contended, that the right of Harrison's executors, if any, to have recourse against Grymes' estate, accrued at the time of the perpetuation of the injunction in 1818, and could not be enforced in the injunction suit, but only by a new and independent suit; so that when the agreement of compromise was made in 1828, on which this suit was brought, the claim of Harrison's executors was barred by the act of limitations.

It is true that the right of Harrison's executors to have recourse against Grymes' estate accrued at the time of the perpetuation of the injunction; but it is not, I think, true that such right could not be enforced in the injunction suit. I think the case

53 came within the reason and operation of the rule, that "where a *case is made out between defendants by evidence arising from pleadings and proofs between plaintiffs and defendants, a court of equity has a right and often is bound to make a decree between the defendants." See 2 Rob. Pr. 397, and the cases cited; Fox v. Taliaferro, 4 Munf. 243; Dades' adm'r v. Madison, 5 Leigh 401. Though a suit be disposed of as to the plaintiff, it may be retained until proper accounts can be taken, in order to render to one of the defendants the relief to which he may be entitled against the other. Morris, &c. v. Terrell, 2 Rand. 6. A defendant may in some cases object to a decree against him in favor of his co-defendant, on the ground that there is no issue made up between them, and their peculiar matters of difference have not been ascertained and settled. But the party entitled to make such objection may certainly waive it, and consent to a decree against him; and it may often be his interest to do so. In this case both West's administrator and Grymes' administrator (Healy) consented, not only to the perpetuation of the injunction, but to a decree, "that the defendant George West settle the transactions of his intestate on the estate of Philip L. Grymes, and that the defendant George Healy also settle his transactions on the estate of the said Philip L. Grymes, before one of the commissioners" of the court, who was directed to settle, state and report the same. This decree could only have been made on the admission of the administrators of West and Grymes, that the estate of Grymes was liable to Harrison's executors for the amount of the enjoined judgment, and by a decree in that suit, so soon as it could be ascertained, by a settlement of the accounts, that there were sufficient assets to meet the liability. It is a mistake to suppose that the injunction suit was brought, not only to enjoin the judgment, but also to recover the balance of the legacy claimed by Tomkies. A suit had been brought 54 by *Tomkies for that legacy, and was pending when the injunction suit was brought. And the only object of the latter suit was to enjoin the judgment on the assigned bond until a decree could be obtained in the other suit, and to obtain relief to the extent of that judgment. When the injunction was perpetuated, Tomkies obtained all the relief which he sought, or to which he was entitled, in the injunction suit. Its further prosecution, therefore, could only have been for the benefit of Harrison's executors. This suit was pending for the benefit of Harrison's executors when the agreement of compromise was made in 1828, and their claim was not then barred by the act of limitations.

It was further contended, that the agreement of 1828 is of no effect: 1. Because an administrator can create no new cause of action, nor revive an old one, against his decedent's estate. 2. Because the agreement was made on the mere representation of the counsel of Harrison's executors, which, though not fraudulent, yet tended to mislead and did mislead the administrator of Grymes; and in ignorance of the fact that the decree of perpetuation was by their consent, and of the existence of the record of the suit of Wyatt & wife v. Grymes in Middlesex county court. 3. Because it was founded on no consideration, and was intended to give no new remedy to Harrison's executors, in case it should not be performed by Braxton, but leave them to resort to such remedies as they had, if any, when the agreement was entered into.

As to the first objection, it is certainly true, as a general rule, that an administrator can create no new cause of action against his decedent's estate. But he has all the powers which are necessary to a proper discharge of the duties of his office. He may make settlements and compromises with creditors of the estate, and give them confessions of judgment; and 55 *though he may thereby render himself liable for a devastavit, yet they will be entitled to the benefit of his acts, if they deal with him in good faith. He may submit to arbitration matters in dispute in respect of the personal estate, and render it liable for the performance of the award. 1 Lomax on Ex'ors 356. As was said by Judge Cabell in Wheatley v. Martin's adm'r, 6 Leigh 62, 71, "It is competent to an executor or administrator to submit to arbitration any controversy concerning the estate, whether the estate claims to be a debtor or creditor. This results, necessarily, from the full dominion which the law gives him over the assets, and the full discretion which it vests in him for the settlement and liquidation of all claims due to or from the estate. And although a mere submission to arbitration will not bind the executor or administrator personally, to pay the sum awarded out of his own estate, yet the award is binding on him in his fiduciary character, and consequently on the assets of the estate which he represents. Pearson v. Henry, 5 T. R. 6; Lyle v. Rodgers, 5 Wheat. R. 394." An executor or administrator may be sued as such, on promises to pay a debt of the estate. A count, on an account stated by a defendant as executor respecting moneys due from the testator, or from the defendant as executor, may be supported, and joined with counts on promises by the testator. Chitty on Contr. 275; 1 Chitty's Plead. 205; Secar v. Atkinson, 1 H. Bl. 102; 2 Saund. 117 e, note 2; Whitaker v. Whitaker, 6 John. R. 112; Carter v. Phelps' adm'r, 8 Id. 343. This doctrine has been fully recognized in Virginia. Epes' adm'r v. Dudley, adm'r, 5 Rand. 437; Bishop v. Harrison's adm'r, 2 Leigh 532. In the latter case Judge Cabell said, "It is perfectly clear that in an action against an executor or administrator, such counts," that is, counts on promises by the 56 executor as such, and counts on promises by the testator, "may be *joined; and that that is the proper mode of declaring against executors or administrators to save the statute of limitations." See also 2 Lomax on Ex'ors 419. Whether before the Code took effect, an executor or administrator might have revived a debt barred by the act of limitations, is a question which may admit of controversy, and about which there is some conflict of authority. The cases of Peck v. Botsford, 7 Conn. R. 172; Fritz v. Thomas, 1 Whart. R. 66; and possibly Thompson v. Peter, 12 Wheat. R. 565, decide or assume that he could not. In all these cases the debt had been long barred when the promise was made; and vague and loose admissions were relied on as evidence of a promise, which might not have been sufficient even if made by the party who owed the debt. The observations of the court should be taken in reference to the cases in which they were made. Chief Justice Marshall, in saying, in Thompson v. Peter, that "declarations against him," the executor or administrator, "have never been held to take the promise of a testator or intestate out of the act; indeed the contrary has been held;" surely did not mean to say that an executor or administrator could not be sued on his promise to pay a debt of his testator or intestate not barred at the time of making the promise, and that such promise would not prevent the operation of the act; for he knew that the law was well settled otherwise. He probably only intended to say that mere declarations, such as were proved in that case, and as contradistinguished from a promise of an executor, had never been held to take the promise of the testator out of the act. Chief Justice Gibson did not mean to say so in Fritz v. Thomas, for he had expressly said otherwise in Collins v. Weiser, 12 Serg. & Raw. 97, in which he held that an administratrix was liable as such on an implied promise for money paid, laid out and expended. His remarks

57 in Fritz v. Thomas, in regard to *the danger of making an estate liable on vague and indefinite admissions and promises of the executor or administrator, who is often ignorant of the transaction, are certainly very just; and courts and juries should be cautious in weighing the evidence of such admissions and promises. Admissions which would have been held sufficient to take a debt due by the person making them out of the statute, have been held insufficient for that purpose when made by an executor or administrator.

In Tullock v. Dunn, 21 Eng. C. L. R. 478, Chief Justice Abbott said, "As against an executor, an acknowledgment merely is not sufficient to take a case out of the statute, there must be an express promise." 2 Lomax on Ex'ors 418. But that an executor or administrator might be sued as such on his promise to pay a debt of his testator or intestate not barred at the time of making the promise, is too well settled to admit of controversy. In this case, when the agreement was made there was, as I have attempted to show, a debt due by Grymes' estate to Harrison's executors, not barred by the act of limitations, but in a course of continued prosecution from the instant of the accrual of the cause of action. By the decree perpetuating the injunction and directing a settlement of the administration of Grymes' estate, that estate was rendered liable, in whosoever hands it might come, for the claim of Harrison's executors. A judgment against an administrator, even though it be confessed by him, may be revived against an administrator de bonis non. A suit may be brought against the latter on a promise made by the former to pay a debt of his intestate. Bishop v. Harrison's adm'r, 2 Leigh 532. "It is clearly competent to an executor," says Judge Cabell in that case, "by his promise to pay a debt of the testator, to exempt the case from the operation of the statute of limitations; and it is no devastavit 58 *in him to do so. If the executor die or be removed before he has paid the debt, it still remains a debt due from the testator; and the obligation to pay it devolves on the administrator de bonis non, who comes in the place of the executor, and is the representative of the testator."

When, therefore, Healy, by whose consent the decree had been rendered, was removed from the administration, and Braxton was appointed administrator de bonis non, Harrison's executors had a right to have the suit revived against the latter, and accordingly sued out a scire facias for the purpose. In this state of things Braxton, who was suing Healy and his securities for the assets in his hands, and was expecting soon to recover them, and who also, in right of his wife, was sole residuary devisee and legatee of Grymes, agreed, on certain terms, to pay the debt to Harrison's executors out of the assets when recovered. I think the agreement is clearly binding upon him as administrator of Grymes, unless it is invalid on the second and third objections made to it, or either of them.

As to the second objection, that the agreement was made on the mere representation of the counsel of Harrison's executors, and in ignorance of the fact that the decree of perpetuation was made by their consent, and of the existence of the record of the suit of Wyatt & wife v. Grymes. May, the counsel of Harrison's executors, was guilty of no fraud or misrepresentation, and Braxton was not taken by surprise, in making the agreement. After the suit of Tomkies v. West had been removed from Williamsburg to Richmond, May was retained to prosecute it as counsel for Harrison's executors. He examined the case, and wrote to Braxton in December 1826, stating his views of it, and proposing an agreement, saying that his client was "old and averse to trouble and litigation." The

59 about a year thereafter. *In the letter, nothing was said about the consent of Harrison's executors to the decree of perpetuation. I have attempted to show that such consent, given without fraud, which is not imputed to them, did not affect their right to recourse against Grymes' estate. It is probable that May had not adverted to the fact, or did not deem it material, when he wrote the letter. But the fact was known to Braxton before he entered into the agreement, as is proved in May's deposition. Braxton had ample time and opportunity to make himself acquainted with all the facts. He appears to have done so, at least so far as to examine the record in Tomkies v. West, which was the only source from which May professed to derive his information. May proves that Braxton and himself examined the papers, on at least two different days, before they entered into the agreement.

In Braxton's letters to Harrison, written in November 1828 and October 1829, nearly one and two years after the date of the agreement, the former expresses his satisfaction therewith, and his desire and intention to perform it on his part. It is needless to enquire how far the record of the suit of Wyatt & wife v. Grymes tends to show that the legacy or any part of it had been paid by Grymes in his lifetime, or what would have been its effect, had a copy of it been filed as evidence in the suit of Tomkies v. West when the consent decree was rendered. When that record was discovered by Braxton, more than ten years had elapsed since the decree of perpetuation, and several years since the date of the agreement; and it was then too late to give it any effect on either. It would have been too late to affect the agreement, even if it had been a compromise of a doubtful claim. The compromise of a doubtful title, when procured without such deceit as would vitiate any other contract, concludes the parties, though ignorant of the extent of their 60 *rights. Per Gibson, chief justice, in Hoge v. Hoge, 1 Watts' R. 163, 216. As was said by the master of the rolls in Pickering v. Pickering, 2 Beav. R. 31, 17 Eng. Ch. R. 31, "When parties whose rights are questionable have equal knowledge of facts, and equal means of ascertaining what their rights really are, and they fairly endeavor to settle their respective claims among themselves, every court feels disposed to support the conclusions or agreements to which they may fairly come at the time, and that, notwithstanding the subsequent discovery of common error."

As to the third and last objection, that the agreement was founded on no consideration, and was intended to give no new remedy to Harrison's executors in case it should not be performed by Braxton, but leave them to resort to such remedies as they had, if any, when the agreement was entered into. If, at the date of the agreement, Grymes' estate was already liable to Harrison's executors for the amount of the judgment against Tomkies, as I have before endeavored to show, then the existence of that liability was of itself a sufficient consideration for the agreement; it being in effect an account stated by an administrator of a debt due by his testator, and a promise to pay the amount out of the assets; which, we have seen, is a good cause of action against an administrator in his representative character. But even if that liability had been doubtful, it was at least a subject of controversy in a pending suit at the time the agreement was entered into, and was a good consideration for a compromise. "There can be no doubt that the resignation of a colorable claim, conflicting with that of another person, and the settlement of the dispute between the parties without suit, constitute a good consideration;" and "in these cases, inequality of consideration does not, of itself, form any objection." Chitty on Contr. 26. But it is said there was in effect no consideration

61 *in this case, the promise being to pay the entire debt claimed by Harrison's executors. The promise, it will be observed, was not to pay the debt out of the proper estate of Braxton, but out of the assets of his testator when enough for the purpose should come to his hands. And, out of abundant caution, it was further expressly declared in the agreement that nothing therein contained should be construed to bind the administrator of Grymes in any other than his representative capacity. What would be a reasonable compromise for the administrator to make on account of his testator's estate, was a question which depended upon all the circumstances. If Harrison's executors had confidence in their claim, they could not be expected to give much, if any of it, up; or to do more for the sake of ending litigation than give a little more time for payment; especially as the security of the debt was not to be increased. And if Grymes' administrator had good reason to apprehend that the whole debt would be recovered of his testator's estate (and he says in one of his letters that when he entered into the agreement he was fully convinced of the justness of the claim), he might well be willing to end the litigation by agreeing to pay the debt in a limited time, and out of the assets when in hand. Such a compromise, under such circumstances, could not be said to be without a sufficient consideration to sustain it. If, under such circumstances, Grymes' administrator had confessed a decree when assets for the whole amount of the debt, the decree would have bound the estate; and there is at least as much reason in its being bound by his agreement to pay the debt when assets and after a limited period. - Harrison's executors had obtained a decree in the suit of Tomkies v. West for the settlement of Healy's administration account on Grymes' estate. Healy had been removed and Braxton appointed administrator in his place; and the suit *had been revived against the latter. Braxton was prosecuting a suit, and expecting very soon to obtain a decree, against Healy and his sureties, for a large amount of the assets of Grymes. He was fully convinced of the justness of the claim of Harrison's executors, and wished to end the litigation in Tomkies v. West, and to have sufficient time to obtain his expected decree, and realize the amount, or at least enough to pay the claim.

In this state of things, the agreement was made, and the objects which Braxton seems to have had in view were thereby secured. It stipulated that Braxton should have at least twelve months for the payment of the debt, and then should only be bound to pay it as administrator, and out of the assets when received; that upon the payment of the money a bond of indemnity should be executed by Harrison's legatees to Braxton; and Harrison's executors would dismiss the suit of Tomkies v. West, as far as they were concerned, and relinquish the costs. That suit was, in effect, their suit after the decree of 1818, and the further prosecution of it was at their costs. Morris, &c. v. Terrell, 2 Rand. 6. They had a right, therefore, to stipulate for its dismissal, even absolutely; and for the relinquishment of the costs. I think these stipulations constituted a sufficient legal consideration for the agreement on the part of Grymes' administrator. The memorandum annexed to the agreement giving Harrison's executors the right to cancel the agreement at the end of six months, upon requiring Braxton to cancel the duplicate thereof in his possession, does not alter the case. It is not pretended that the agreement was ever in fact canceled. On the contrary, it appears that it was not, and that for nearly two years thereafter, Harrison's executors were urging, and Braxton was promising, a compliance therewith on his part. I also think that the agreement gives, and was intended *to give, a new remedy thereon to Harrison's executors for the nonperformance thereof by Grymes' administrator, and does not leave them to resort to their old, as their only, remedy. Being a valid agreement, a remedy thereon for a breach of it would seem to follow as a necessary consequence. An intention to preclude such a remedy, if it would not be wholly repugnant and void, ought at least to be plainly indicated, to have any legal effect. There is nothing in the agreement in question to indicate such an intention: though in reserving liberty to Harrison's executors, in case of nonpayment of the debt at the termination of the period stipulated, to resort to any legal means for the recovery thereof, it was doubtless intended not to extinguish the old remedy, but to give them a right to resort to the old or new at their election. The stipulation that nothing contained in the agreement should be construed to bind the administrator in any other than his representative capacity, plainly assumes that it was intended to bind him in that.

It was further contended, that no action at law could be sustained upon the agreement; that in coming into a court of equity for relief, the plaintiffs must be subjected to those principles which are applicable to a suit for specific performance; and that according to them Harrison's executors were not entitled to relief.

It is unnecessary to decide in this case, whether an action at law could have been sustained upon the agreement. If it could, the counsel for the appellant seemed to admit that a suit in equity might have been proper to obtain an account of the assets, and have them marshaled, if necessary. But conceding that it could not, that fact would seem to strengthen, rather than weaken, the right of Harrison's executors to come into equity for relief. It was expressly declared by the agreement that the estate of Grymes should be *bound for the debt, and not the administrator personally: And if, by reason of the seals annexed to the agreement, the debt could not be recovered of the estate at law, surely a court of equity, which looks to substance and not form, ought, for that very cause if no other, to afford relief; unless there be something to prevent it, in the latter part of the proposition above stated. I do not think that there is. Whatever equity Grymes' administrator may have against Tomkies, or even against West or Healy, he can have none against Harrison's executors. They have acted in good faith, and ask for nothing to which they are not in conscience entitled. They are bona fide creditors of Grymes, whose estate is ample for the payment of the debt; and yet they have been endeavoring in vain to obtain payment, for nearly fifty years since the death of Grymes, and nearly twenty-five since the date of the agreement. They have performed their part of the agreement, so far as it was to be performed before the payment of the debt; and are ready to perform the residue upon such payment. And they now ask that it may be performed on the other side. I know of no principle of equity on which relief can be denied them.

Lastly, it was contended that if Harrison's executors were entitled to obtain relief, for the breach of the agreement, by a further prosecution of the suit of Tomkies v. West, they could obtain it only in that way, and not by a new suit on the agreement; on the principle of the case of Heywood v. Covington's heirs, 4 Leigh 373. I do not think that principle applies to this case. There, a suit was brought in the County court for a sale and partition of real estate of an intestate among his heirs. A sale was accordingly made under a decree in the suit; and the purchaser refused to complete his purchase. Pending the suit in the County court, the heirs brought a suit against the *purchaser in the Superior court for specific execution.

This court decided that the Superior court could not entertain the bill pending the suit in the County court. There the sale was made, not by the heirs by an agreement in pais; but by a commissioner of the court; in effect by the court; in a pending cause. The purchaser, by buying under a decree, had subjected himself to the orders of the court in that cause: and the appropriate and only remedy against him, at least during the pendency of the cause, was by some proceeding therein. But here, the parties to a pending cause, or some of them, enter into an agreement out of court; the main object of which is, not to prosecute the suit further, but to put an end to it. And though liberty is reserved to Harrison's executors, in a certain event, to resort to their original remedy, yet that was intended as a benefit to them, and not to deprive them of the right, at their election, to sue upon the agreement. I think they had not only a right to bring such a suit, but that it was a more suitable remedy, under all the circumstances, than a further prosecution of the old suit of Tomkies v. West. By the terms of the agreement that suit is to be dismissed, and the costs of Harrison's executors therein relinquished, when the debt is paid. The court below can provide for the performance of this part of the agreement, if necessary, in the final decree which may be made in this case.

Upon the whole, I think the decree is right, and ought to be affirmed.

SAMUELS, J., was of opinion that the decree should be reversed, and the bill dismissed without prejudice to the appellee's remedy in the case of Tomkies' adm'r v. West's adm'r & others.

LEE, J., was of opinion that Harrison's executors *were bound to show that it was proper to perpetuate the injunction in the case of Tomkies' adm'r v. West's adm'r & others. That their remedy was in that suit. That the statute of limitations applied to this case. That moreover the agreement between Braxton and May as the agent of Harrison's executors, afforded no foundation for a suit; and if it did, the circumstances under which it was made forbade a court of equity to be active in its execution: There was no consideration for the agreement, as all the debt was to be paid, and Harrison's executors could not release the costs of the plaintiff in Tomkies' adm'r v. West's adm'r & others.

ALLEN and DANIEL, Js., concurred in the opinion of Moncure, J.

Decree affirmed.

1. Wills—Construction of—Words of Survivorship.*—In a devise or bequest over to survivors at the death of a devisee or legatee for life, in the absence of the expression of a particular intent on the part of the testator, the survivorship has relation to the death of the testator.
2. Same—Same—Same—Case at Bar.—Testator gives all his estate, real and personal, to his wife, for and during her widowhood: And he directs that at her death all his estate shall be sold and equally divided between all his surviving children or their heirs. HELD: That the children living at the death of the testator took a vested interest in the estate.

*Wills—Construction of—Words of Survivorship.—In Cheatham v. Gower, 94 Va. 383, 26 S. E. Rep. 853, it was said, at p. 388: "It is unquestionably a settled rule of construction in this state, that after a bequest or devise of an estate for the life of the first taker, words of survivorship in a will are always to be referred to the period of the testator's death, when no special intent appears to the contrary." Hansford v. Elliott, 9 Leigh 79; Martin, Adm'r, v. Kirby, &c., 11 Gratt. 67; Stone v. Lewis, 84 Va. 474, 5 S. E. Rep. 282; Sellers' Ex'or v. Reed et als., 88 Va. 377, 13 S. E. Rep. 754; Gish v. Moomaw, 89 Va. 347, 15 S. E. Rep. 868; Chapman v. Chapman, 90 Va. 409, 18 S. E. Rep. 913; Crews v. Hatcher, 91 Va. 382, 21 S. E. Rep. 811; and Stanley v. Stanley, 92 Va. 534 (24 S. E. Rep. 229)." The principal case was also cited as authorizing this proposition in Stone v. Nicholson, 27 Gratt. 1, 18, and foot-note; Brown v. Brown, 31 Gratt. 511, 515; Cowan v. Epes, 2 P. & H. 526; Stone v. Lewis, 84 Va. 476, 5 S. E. Rep. 282; Gish v. Moomaw, 89 Va. 359, 15 S. E. Rep. 868 (a history of the Virginia cases on this subject is given here).

Same—Vesting of Estate.—The construction above grows naturally out of the familiar principle that the law favors the vesting of estates, and where a legacy is given, which is not to be enjoyed in pos-

This was a bill filed by John T. Martin, administrator de bonis non with the will annexed of John Piggott deceased, to obtain a construction of the will of said Piggott, and directions in the distribution of the estate. John Piggott died in 1809. By his will, after directing the payment of his debts, he gave to his wife Hannah Piggott, for and during her widowhood, all his estate, real and personal: But if she should die before his youngest son Robert came of age, his executor should make provision out of his estate, sufficient to board and school him until he arrived at the age of sixteen years; at which time he was to be bound out to a trade. He gave to his grand son John Cowles one hundred dollars when he arrived at the age of twenty-one years: And then came this clause:

"And lastly, my will and desire is, that my whole estate shall be sold at the death of my wife, and equally divided between all my surviving children or their heirs."

The testator had lost one child (Mrs. Cowles) before he made his will; and at his death he left a widow and seven children.

The executor paid off the debts
68 *and put Mrs. Piggott into possession of the estate, which consisted of both real and personal property; and she retained possession until her death in 1844. In the mean time all the children had died, some of them leaving children, others intestate and without children, and one had in his life time conveyed his interest in his father's estate in trust to secure a debt.

After the death of the widow, John T. Martin qualified as administrator de bonis non with the will annexed of John Piggott; and having sold all the property, he applied to the court to give a construction of the will, and direct the distribution of the fund. When the cause came on to be heard, the court below held that all the children of John Piggott who survived him, took vested interests under the will, and decreed distribution accordingly. And from this decree Martin applied to this court for an appeal, which was allowed.

LEE, J. Where a devise or testamentary gift is made to several, with words of survivorship annexed, or where the gift is to such of a class as shall survive, it becomes important to ascertain to what period the words of survivorship are intended to refer.

session until some future period or event, it will, where no special intent to the contrary is manifested in the will, be held to be vested in interest immediately on the death of the testator rather than contingent upon the state of the things that may happen to exist at the period of payment or distribution. As authority for this proposition, see the principal case cited in Brent v. Washington, 18 Gratt. 526, 529, and foot-note; Corbin v. Mills, 19 Gratt. 438, 472, and foot-notes; Talliaferro v. Day, 82 Va. 91; Stokes v. Van Wyck, 83 Va. 733, 3 S. E. Rep. 387; Chapman v. Chapman, 90 Va. 410, 18 S. E. Rep. 913.

Where no previous particular estate is interposed, but the gift is to take effect in possession immediately on the death of the testator, the established rule of construction is, to refer the words of survivorship to that event, and to regard them as designed to provide against the contingency of the death of the objects of the testator's bounty in his life time. Where, however, the gift is not to take effect in possession immediately upon the death of the testator, but a

69 previous estate for life, or other particular estate, is interposed, *there is much greater difficulty in determining the construction by which the period of the survivorship is to be ascertained. The cases on the subject are numerous, and would seem not to be by any means all accordant. Indeed there would seem to have been a marked change in the current of the English decisions bearing upon it. In the earlier cases, almost without an exception, it will be found that the words of survivorship have been held to refer to the period of the testator's death. Wilson v. Bayly, 3 Bro. Par. Cas. 195; Stringer v. Phillips, 1 Eq. Cas. Ab. 293; Rose v. Hill, 3 Burr. R. 1881; Roebuck v. Dean, 2 Ves. jun. R. 265; Perry v. Woods, 3 Ves. R. 204; Maberly v. Strode, 3 Ves. R. 450; Brown v. Bigg, 7 Ves. R. 279; Garland v. Thomas, 4 Bos. & Pul. 82; Edwards v. Symonds, 6 Taunt. R. 213; Long's lessee v. Prigg, 8 Barn. & Cress. 231, 15 Eng. C. L. 206. On the other hand, numerous cases are to be found, affirming a different rule, and referring the words of survivorship to the death of the tenant for life, or other prior particular estate. Such are the cases of Brograve v. Winder, 2 Ves. jun. R. 634; Newton v. Ayscough, 19 Ves. R. 534; Hoghton v. Whitgreave, 1 Jac. & Walk. 146; Daniell v. Daniell, 6 Ves. R. 297; Wordsworth v. Wood, 2 Beav. R. 25, 17 Eng. Ch. R. 26; Cripps v. Walcott, 4 Madd. R. 11; Pope v. Whitcombe, 3 Russ. R. 124, 3 Cond. Eng. Ch. R. 323; Gibbs v. Tait, 8 Sim. R. 132, 11 Cond. Eng. Ch. R. 359; Browne v. Lord Kenyon, 3 Madd. R. 410; Neathway v. Reed, 17 Eng. Law & Eq. R. 150. It is true, Judge Parker, in delivering his opinion in Hansford v. Elliott, 9 Leigh 79, seems to think that most of the cases may be explained upon the particular circumstances attending them, and that they are not irreconcilable with those which refer the period of survivorship to the death of the testator; and that at all events the weight of authority is in favor of that doctrine. I 70 confess my *examination of the English cases had brought my mind to a different conclusion. It seemed to me that many of the two classes of cases were directly conflicting and irreconcilable; and that whatever might be the safest and soundest construction, and that best adapted to promote the intention of the testator, the preponderance of the English authorities was in favor of the rule making the words of survivorship relate to the expiration of the previous particular estate, being the period of the distribution of the subject of the gift, rather than to the death of the testator.

It may admit of very grave question whether this is a subject upon which anything like a fixed rule of construction can be established. The question, and the only legitimate enquiry, is, what is the intention of the testator. As was said by Sir William Grant, in Newton v. Ayscough, 19 Ves. R. 534, the period to which the survivorship relates depends not upon any technical words, but upon the apparent intention of the testator collected from the particular disposition or the general context of the will. Lord Alvanley expressed the same opinion in effect in Russel v. Long, 4 Ves. R. 551. And in Cripps v. Walcott, 4 Madd. R. 11, Sir J. Leach, speaking of the construction which refers the survivorship to the period of division, evidently considers it as only applying in the absence of a manifestation of a special intent. Where that appears it must prevail and control the construction. What may be the true intention of the testator in any case is best deduced from the terms and provisions of the will when viewed in the light of the surrounding circumstances which attended the execution. To seek to determine it by applying arbitrary rules and technical principles, with which testators, and those who write their wills, are, in a very large majority of cases, utterly unacquainted, would be most unprofitable and hazardous.

71 *This subject came under review in this court in the case of Hansford v. Elliott, above cited; and whatever may be the rule of the English courts, this court would seem to have adopted that which refers the words of survivorship to the death of the testator; and this is declared to be (in cases in which no special intent to the contrary is manifested), the safest and soundest construction, that most consonant to the intention of the testator, and best supported by the authorities. The bequest in that case was of the whole of the testator's personal estate to his wife during her widowhood, with a provision that if she again married, her interest was to be reduced to one-third, to be held for her life: and at her death the personal estate was to be equally divided among the surviving children of the testator thereafter named, &c. The court (four judges concurring) held that the word "surviving" referred to the death of the testator, and not to that of the tenant for life: and so the children of the testator who survived him, but died before the death of the tenant for life, took vested estates in remainder.

It is true that Judge Parker, in delivering his opinion (in which three of the other judges concurred), says that if the rule were otherwise than as he had maintained it to be, he should still be of opinion that the words of the will in that case sufficiently showed a special intent that the interest should vest at the death of the testator. But he enters fully into the general question, and upon a review of the authorities, concludes that the true rule is that of the earlier English cases which have been hereinbefore referred to. This case must therefore be regarded as authority in cases in which no special intent appears in the will, and as ruling such as are not essentially distinguishable from it.

The counsel for the appellant insists that this case is so distinguishable from 72 Hansford v. Elliott, that the *doctrine of that case cannot be applied to this. It is true the terms of the will in that case are in some respects different from those of the will under consideration; but I have been unable to perceive how the difference is so essential as to withdraw this case from the influence of the reasoning and the conclusions which were adopted in that. In Hansford v. Elliott, the bequest was of personal property: here, it is a gift of real and personal property; but it is first to be converted into money by sale, and in that form divided. In that, the limitation was to individuals by name: here, it is to the surviving children as a class. But from the case of Long's lessee v. Prigg, 8 Barn. & Cress. 231, which was a case of a devise to surviving children as a class, we see that no difference in the result will flow from this distinction; the same doctrine being held applicable to devises to individuals nominatim and as a class. In Hansford v. Elliott the property is given for the comfort and support of the wife and children, and this is supposed to indicate an intention to vest the estate in the children to be supported. The inference is of little cogency at best; but a similar feature may be traced in the present case; for from the provision in favor of his son Robert in the event of the death of his wife before he should be old enough to be bound as an apprentice, the testator would seem to intend that the mother should make provision out of the means left to her, for the wants of such of the children as needed her assistance. That no disposition is made by the will in this case of the whole or any part of the property given to the wife during her widowhood, in case of her second marriage, is a circumstance of little weight as tending to evince the intention of the testator. He may have used the expression "during her widowhood" in the sense of "during her life," not anticipating the contingency of a second marriage; and this would seem not improbable

73 *from the fact that the provision for Robert which immediately follows in the same sentence of the will, is only in the event of the wife's death before he attained the age of sixteen years, no allusion being made to the possibility of her second marriage; whereas there would seem to have been exactly the same reason for such a provision in the latter event as in the former. Such, I incline to think, is the meaning which should be given to the words "during her widowhood;" but if they are to be construed according to their literal import, so that the estate given to the widow would be held to be determined upon a second marriage, I think no such embarrassment would result as the counsel seems to suppose. The remainder being vested would not be void, but the effect would be to hasten the period of distribution by substituting that of the second marriage of the wife for that of her decease.

The argument drawn from the consideration that in Hansford v. Elliott, if none of the children had survived the tenant for life, a total intestacy would have been the consequence (a result which the testator could not be supposed to have intended), while in this case the construction contended for by the counsel would not be attended with such a result, can have little force or effect to withdraw this case from the influence of the reasoning in the former. It is a sufficient answer to it to remark, that such an intestacy would not be the result of either construction contended for in this case. Indeed one of the reasons which suggests itself for the preference of the rule which refers words of survivorship to the death of the testator to that which looks to the death of the tenant for life, is, that in a large majority of cases, the former will be less likely than the latter to occasion a total intestacy, and thus bring about a state of things which the testator manifestly did not intend to exist.

74 *It is true that in the cases of Brograve v. Winder, Hoghton v. Whitgreave, and Newton v. Ayscough, as in the present case, the property was directed to be sold and the proceeds divided at the death of the tenant for life. But I can perceive no particular significance in this circumstance as bearing upon the question who were the objects of the testator's bounty. All that is fairly to be deduced from it is, that the testator chose that the property should be kept together, and his wife continue to use it in the same condition in which he should leave it, and in which she with him had been previously accustomed to enjoy it. But whatever weight might be attached to it where the property consisted of consols or other stocks, as in the cases of Newton v. Ayscough and Neathway v. Reed, I think it can have little force in a case like the present, where the property consisted of land and negroes and other articles of personal property. That a testator, after giving such property to his wife during her life, should direct it to be sold at her death, and the proceeds divided among his surviving children, does not, in my judgment, furnish any indication that his meaning was to restrict his bounty to those of them who should chance to be then still living, to the disinherison of the families of such of them as should have died before the death of the tenant for life.

It will be seen, in a learned work on the subject of wills (2 Jarm. on Wills 647), the author regards such a provision in a will as furnishing no real distinction between it and the cases in which the words of survivorship had been referred to the death of the testator. And he attributes to Sir William Grant probable disapprobation both of the reasoning which led to the adoption of the rule in those cases, and of this distinction (without a difference) which had been engrafted upon it by Lord Loughborough. The case to which he refers as evincing the view probably entertained by Sir William Grant, is Daniell v. Daniell, 6 Ves. R. 297.

75 *I think, therefore, the circumstances relied on fail to show any special intent on the part of the testator in this case in the use of the words "surviving children," to refer them to the death of the tenant for life; and that the case cannot be distinguished, in any essential particular, from Hansford v. Elliott. I think, too, the rule prescribed in that case (so far as any rule can be applied to a subject of this character), is perhaps the soundest and safest rule, and best adapted, in a large majority of cases, to promote the intention of testators. But whatever might be my opinion as to this, I think it should be adhered to as the settled doctrine of this court, notwithstanding the different result of the recent English cases.

In the case of Hansford v. Elliott, President Tucker dissented from the opinion of the other judges upon this question. But it will be observed upon examining the opinion delivered by him, that had that case contained a particular feature which is found to exist in this, he would have concurred in the judgment of the court. He said that if it had appeared the testator had lost a child before the date of his will, the natural construction of the word "surviving" would be to refer it to that event. In this case, it does appear that the testator had lost a daughter, Mrs. Cowles, before the making of his will, and that circumstance was doubtless in his mind at that time, because he makes a bequest of one hundred dollars to her son. And according to the opinion of Judge Tucker, the expression "surviving children" should be construed to mean those who were living at the date of the will; who would thus take a vested interest at the death of the testator. In the case of Neathway v. Reed, Lord Justice Knight Bruce seems disposed to give the same construction to the words of survivorship which is given by Judge Tucker in the case supposed by him, and which is the actual case here. It is 76 unnecessary, *however, to consider the case in this view any farther, because it does not appear that any change took place in the condition of the testator's family between the date of his will and his death, so that the same persons would be designated by the words "surviving children," whether they be referred to the one period or to the other.

In conclusion, I would remark that the particular bequest under consideration cannot be read in the sense given to it by the construction contended for by the appellant's counsel, without a plain departure from the literal import of the terms employed. Those terms are "between all my surviving children, or their heirs." Heirs of whom? Certainly not of any child or children that might be living at the death of the tenant for life. Nemo est hæres viventis. The appellant's counsel says the terms used are not to be understood according to their literal import, and that the true meaning is that the property is to be divided between such of the children as should be living at the death of the tenant for life and the heirs or descendants of such as should have died; the latter to take per stirpes, unless all the testator's children should then be dead; in which event, the grand children would take per capita. But this construction would embrace exactly the same persons as participants in the testator's bounty as if he had said, "to my children and their heirs," entirely omitting the word "surviving," and changing "or" into "and." Yet some effect must be given to this word "surviving," because some meaning must if possible be assigned to every word in the will. Turner, lord justice, in Neathway v. Reed. I take it, that where some meaning can be given to a word, it must receive it, unless it will occasion some incurable repugnance between different parts of the will, or violate the plain intention of the testator. And 77 although it may be admissible to replace the disjunctive with *the conjunctive, if necessary to effectuate the testator's intent, such necessity must first be clearly shown to exist. According to the appellant's reading of the will, the word "surviving" does not serve to designate the persons who are to take in remainder, which is its natural and proper function; but if it have any effect, it is to convert what would otherwise be a vested interest into a contingent remainder, against the known preference of the law to construe an estate to be the former rather than the latter. On the other hand, if we will suppose that the testator, in using the words "my surviving children, or their heirs," could not have had in mind only those of his children who should be living at the death of the tenant for life, but must have intended to provide for the children or descendants of such of them as, though then surviving at the date of the will, or who might be surviving at his decease, might yet die in the lifetime of the tenant for life, all difficulty is avoided, and the natural and literal import of all the words used is preserved: and the effect is to confer a vested interest upon all the children who were living at the death of the testator.

I am of opinion to affirm the decree.

§Wills—Estates Tail—Effect of Statute.—In the principal case, the testator, in 1799, lent to his son a tract of land during his natural life, and if he should die without lawful issue, he gave the land to his grandson, and his heirs forever; and it was further provided that if the son should leave lawful issue, he may dispose of the said land, to such of his issue, as son B leave lawful issue, my will and desire is that he may dispose of said land to such of his issue as he may think fit. HELD: That B took an estate tail in the land, which by the statute was converted into a fee.

This was an action of ejectment in the Circuit court of Gloucester county, by the lessee of Kemp and others against James Callis and others. The declaration claimed four several tracts of land, one of which is described as containing five hundred acres, more or less, known as Summers' or Seymour's, formerly Damold's, and it also claimed a water grist mill known by the name of Burton's mill, and land attached thereto, containing twenty-four acres.

On the trial the jury found generally for the plaintiffs twelve undivided thirteenths of three of the tracts described in the declaration; and they found for the plaintiffs twelve-thirteenths of one-half of the grist mill and the land attached thereto. They further found that Philip H. Burton, under whom the plaintiffs claimed, at the time of his death, was an infant under the age of twenty-one years, and possessed of and entitled to one other tract of land in the plaintiffs' declaration mentioned, and described as containing five hundred acres, more or less, known as Summers' or Seymour's formerly Damold's, and the remaining half of the grist mill known as Burton's mill, and the remaining half of the tract of land thereto attached, being about twelve acres. That the said tract of five hundred acres known, &c., and the said last mentioned half part of the mill and land thereto attached were devised by Henry H. B. Burton, who was the grand father of the said Philip H. in the year 1799 in manner and form following:

I lend to my son Henry Burton the tract of land which I purchased, which was a part of the late Dr. Summers' estate (formerly Damold's) during his natural life; and if he should die without lawful issue, I give and devise the said tract of land to my grand son Henry Burton, to him and his heirs forever: But should my son Henry leave lawful issue, my will and desire is that he

he may think fit. And it was held that the son took an estate tail in the land, which by the statute was converted into a fee.

may dispose of said land to such of his issue as he may think fit. I likewise lend to my son Henry Burton, during his natural life, my half of the mill that was purchased of Captain Charles Tomkies; and if he should die without lawful issue, I give my half of the above said mill to my son Simon Burton's sons, Charles and Henry, to them and their heirs forever: But should my son Henry leave lawful issue, it is my will and desire that he shall have the power to dispose of his part of the above said mill to any of his issue he shall think fit. The jury find further that said Henry Burton took possession of said tract of land known as Summers', &c., and half of the said mill called Burton's, under the will of his father Henry *H. B. Burton, and remained in possession thereof until his death; and they set out his will in hæc verba; by which, after a legacy of three slaves, all his stock and household furniture to his wife, he gives the residue of his estate, real and personal, to his son Philip H. Burton; and expresses it as his wish that his wife shall keep the whole of his estate together until his son arrived at the age of maturity, for their support and his education. The jury further found that Mrs. Burton died before the institution of this suit; that Philip H. Burton was the legitimate child of Henry Burton, and that he died an infant before this suit was instituted. And they found that if the law be, under the foregoing facts, that Philip H. Burton derived title to the said tract of land known as Summers', &c., and the last mentioned half of the mill and tract of land, under the will of his father Henry Burton, then they found for the plaintiffs twelve-thirteenths of the undivided tract called Summers', and twelve-thirteenths of the last mentioned one-half of the said mill and land thereto attached: But if the law be that Philip H. Burton derived his title to this land and half of the mill and land thereto attached by virtue of the will of his grand father Henry H. B. Burton, then as to the tract known as Summers', and the last mentioned half of the mill and the land thereto attached, they found for the defendants.

Upon this verdict the court below rendered a judgment for the plaintiffs; and the defendants applied to this court for a superseas, which was awarded.

R. T. Daniel, for the appellants, insisted:

1st. That the special verdict was too uncertain and defective to warrant any judgment thereon. It is found that Philip H. Burton died an infant, seized of the property in controversy, having derived the same from his father's or his grand father's will, according *to the construction of these instruments. The verdict does not find the relationship of the lessors of the plaintiff to Philip H. Burton, which will entitle them to take under the 11th section of the statute of descents; but simply that they claim under Philip H. Burton. If the lessors of the plaintiff are descendants of Henry H. B. Burton's, the grand father, brothers or sisters, and not of Henry Burton's, the father, brothers or sisters, then they are not the class of persons described in the statute entitled to take in exclusion of the kindred on the part of the mother of Philip H. Burton the infant; which kindred the defendants may be; although that matter is also omitted from the finding of the jury. If the lessors are not the persons described in the 11th section of the statute of descents, then it is wholly unimportant whence Philip H. Burton the infant intestate, derived the property; for it will go as if he had died an adult, viz: to the defendants, supposing them to be brethren of the half blood ex parte materna, and the lessors to be only grand uncles and aunts or their descendants ex parte paterna. The consanguinity of the lessors and the defendants should have been found by the jury. A special verdict leaves no room for presumption. Bolling v. The Mayor of Petersburg, 3 Rand. 563. No material fact can be supplied by intendment. Tunnell v. Watson, 2 Munf. 283. And though a verdict may find generally for either party, dependent upon a particular point of law, and such verdict is not strictly a special verdict, McMichen v. Amos, 4 Rand. 134, yet the facts on which the question depends must be so stated as to enable the court clearly to resolve the question. This is a special verdict, not a general verdict with a point of law reserved.

2d. That the special verdict finds no possession in the defendants. Cropper v. Carlton, 6 Munf. 277.

3d. That the finding was defective in awarding *twelve-thirteenths of the property, the whole being demanded, and not finding as to the other thirteenth, or who held it.

4th. That under the true construction of the clauses of the will of Henry H. B. Burton, the grand father of the infant intestate, in regard to the estates therein referred to, executory limitations are created in favor of the issue of Henry Burton the son, and not estates tail in Henry Burton, turned into a fee by the statute. The estate is given for life to Henry Burton, with remainder over to others by name, in the event that Henry Burton did not by will leave the property to some of his issue. The language of the will shows plainly that the term issue is not used as indicating persons who were intended to take under the will absolutely; but only as persons among whom Henry Burton might exercise the power of appointment vested in him by the will. That power he exercised in favor of his son Philip H. Burton, who therefore took not from his father but from his grand father.

Upon the first and second points made by the counsel for the appellants, he insisted that the verdict was not a special verdict; but was absolute as to some parts of the subject; and as to another part submits a single question to the judgment of the court. That the principle was similar to that in McMichen v. Amos, 4 Rand. 134. On the third point made, he referred to 1 Rob. Pr. 461.

On the fourth point made by the counsel for the appellants, he insisted, that although the devise was to Henry Burton for life, yet the estate was given after his death to his issue; and by the rule in Shelley's case this is the same as if given to him and his issue: 2 Jarm. on Wills 335: And that clearly creates an estate tail. Id. 236; 83 2 Lomax Dig. 225; 3 Lomax *Dig. 203, 4; Id. 207, pl. 11. That it was clear under these authorities that Henry Burton took an estate tail: And this was converted into a fee by the statute.

ALLEN, P. In the errors assigned in the petition and the argument of counsel, an objection was taken to the verdict as being too uncertain and defective. The finding is a general one for the plaintiff, unless upon a single point of law reserved, the court should be of opinion that the law is for the defendants in respect to a portion of the land claimed in the declaration and described in the verdict. Such a verdict was held to be regular and proper in the case of McMichen v. Amos, 4 Rand. 134. The question was directly presented in that case, and decided; and the character of the suit, a pauper case for freedom, in which form is disregarded, had no influence on the decision of this point. Judge Cabell, in giving the opinion in which the other judges concurred, says that such a verdict is a "conclusion drawn by the jury from the facts, in favor of one or the other party: subject, however, to the opinion of the court on the case specially stated by the jury. Such a general conclusion for one party, necessarily carries with it the idea that that party must prevail unless the law upon the special case referred to the court, shall be against him. All facts not found in the special case are excluded from the consideration of the court, or negatived by the general finding in his favor." In this case the jury has found for the plaintiffs if Philip H. Burton took under his father's will, and for the defendants if his title was derived under his grand father's will. The title of Philip H. Burton, as derived from one or the other source, is to be regarded as an established fact; and it being further found that the said Philip H. Burton died an infant, the verdict also necessarily establishes that the lessors of the plaintiff stood in such 84 relation *to him as that under the act of descents of 1819, they were entitled to succeed to him if he took under the devise of his father; and the wills of the grand father and father are both set forth in the verdict. All the facts, therefore, to enable the court to determine this question, are set forth with precision.

And so as to the second error assigned, that the special verdict finds no possession in the defendants. By the general finding all facts necessary to entitle the plaintiff to a verdict are to be considered as found, subject to the opinion of the court on the case specially stated.

As to the objection that the verdict is defective in finding for the plaintiff twelve-thirteenths of the property, the whole being demanded in the declaration, and containing no finding as to the other thirteenth: It is not necessary that the plaintiff in ejectment should recover all that is demanded in the declaration. He may recover less; Clay v. White, 1 Munf. 162; Ablett v. Skinner, 1 Siderfin 229; Burgess' lessee v. Purvis, 1 Burr. R. 326; Lewis' lessee v. McFarland, 9 Cranch's R. 151; and though where less is recovered than was demanded, the boundaries of the part recovered should be designated, where as in this case, the verdict was for an undivided interest, no boundaries could be designated; but there is no uncertainty as to the interest recovered. The sheriff would under the execution give possession of the undivided interests recovered, leaving the defendants in possession of the residue. Roe ex dem. Saul v. Dawson, 3 Wils. R. 49.

On the merits it is maintained that upon the will of Henry H. B. Burton the grand father, and under what it is argued amounts to an appointment to Philip, in the will of Henry the son, Philip took under the will of his grand father a fee simple estate: The person taking under a power, deriving his estate not from the person executing the power, but under the original 85 *devise creating the power. The grand father by his will lent the land in controversy to his son during his natural life. The case referred to of Williamson v. Ledbetter, 2 Munf. 521, decides that the use of the word lend is not of itself sufficient to confine the limitation to the period of the devisee's death. For whether the word lend or give is used, an estate for life is vested in the first taker. The will contains no express devise to the heirs or heirs of the body, nor is any estate given directly to the issue: the issue must take by implication.

The will provides that if the son should die without lawful issue, he gave the lands to his grand son, to him and his heirs forever. The testator intended to give something by this clause to the grand son; but the interest so intended to be given was made to depend on the son's dying without issue. Taking these words alone, it is clear the testator intended that his son should take such an estate for life in the first instance as would be transmissible to his issue; and to effectuate that intent, the words "die without issue," have always been construed as controlling the previous devise for life, and as enlarging the estate from an estate for life to an estate tail. The testator, although he gave but a life estate to the son, clearly intended that the grand son should not take whilst there was any issue of the son; and there being nothing to limit the devise to the issue living at the testator's death, the words must be referred to an indefinite failure of issue.

The words "should his son leave lawful issue, he might dispose of his land to such of his issue as he may think fit," do not of themselves show an intention to restrict the previous words to a failure of issue at the death of the first taker. In case of personal property, words of that description may have been received as evidence of an intention to restrict the words "dying without issue" to a failure of issue at 86 *the death; but such construction of the words has not been extended to real property, as it would defeat the leading intent to provide for the issue so long as there should be any issue. Blackborn v. Edgley, 1 P. Wms. 605; Soullé v. Gerard, Cro. Eliz. 525; King v. Melling, 1 Vent. 230; S. C. 2 Levinz 58; Atkinson v. Hutchinson, 3 P. Wms. 258; Forth v. Chapman, 1 P. Wms. 663.

That the power of disposing to such of his issue as he should think fit would not operate to restrict the general words, is shown, by the case of Ball v. Payne, 6 Rand. 73, where a similar power of disposing amongst or to either of the heirs of the body, was contained in the devise; but the tenant for life was held to take an estate tail which by our statute was converted into an estate in fee simple. Upon the whole, it seems to me that according to the cases of Bells v. Gillespie, 5 Rand. 273; Broadbush v. Turner, 5 Rand. 308; Jiggetts v. Davis, 1 Leigh 368; and the cases there referred to, the son in this case took an estate tail by implication, which by the statute was enlarged into a fee; and that the estate so vested in Henry Burton, passed by his will to his son Philip H. Burton, who thus derived title under the will of his father, and not under the will of his grand father, by the supposed appointment in the will of his father.

I think the judgment should be affirmed.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Allen, J.

Judgment affirmed.

April Term, 1854, Richmond.

1. Instructions—Erroneous—Effect.*—An instruction given by the court, which upon the statement of the evidence given by the party excepting, could not be injurious to him, is no ground for reversing the judgment.

*Instructions—Erroneous—Effect.—Perfect harmony of opinion does not exist either in Virginia or West Virginia in regard to the rule of action of the court in reversing judgment on account of erroneous instruction; though the proposition laid down in the first headnote of the principal case, as far as it goes, seems in accord with great weight of authority in both states.

In the case of Wiley v. Glvens, 6 Gratt. 277, it was held that where the instruction given to the jury is erroneous, the appellate court cannot undertake to determine that the verdict, notwithstanding the

2. Deeds of Trust—Statute of Limitations—Case at Bar.†—A deed of trust given to secure a debt provides that the grantor shall hold possession of the property until a certain day. Before that day the grantor makes an agreement under seal with a third person, by which he agrees to take a certain price for the property; and if the money with its interest was not returned within twelve months, the agreement was to stand as a bill of sale; and he delivers possession of the property. The trustee who has had no notice of this agreement, takes possession of the property and sells it, within five years from the time to which the grantor was entitled to hold it, and within five years of the time which the agreement gave the grantor to return the purchase money; but not within five years of the time of the sale and delivery of the property to the party under the agreement. HELD: The title of the purchaser of the grantor was not protected by the lapse of time, and the trustee was entitled to take possession and sell under the trust deed.

This was an action of assumpsit in the Circuit court of the county of Rappahannock, brought by James M. Colvin against Alexander F. Menefee. The object of the suit was to recover the price of a slave named Milley, which had been sold by Menefee as trustee in a deed, and which Colvin claimed to have been his property.

On the trial of the cause the defendant asked for an instruction, which was given by the court; and the plaintiff excepted.

The bill of exceptions showed, that by a deed bearing date the 5th of August 1837, erroneous instruction, is right upon the evidence and therefore affirmed the judgment; but the judgment must be reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial. Pasley v. English, 10 Gratt. 243, 244, seems to approve this statement of the rule, though the exact question was not before the court in that case. But, in Rea v. Trotter, 26 Gratt. 585, 600, Wiley v. Givens is cited and expressly approved as laying down the correct rule upon the subject.

On the other hand, in the principal case, JUDGE LEE says: "The party asking the reversal of the judgment on the score of an erroneous instruction on the trial, must at least show that he has probably sustained injury thereby." See also, Preston v. Harvey, 2 H. & M. 55.

Again, many cases, citing the principal case, hold it to be a settled rule that, though there has been an erroneous instruction, if the court can see from the whole record that even under correct instructions a different verdict could not have been rightly found, or that the acceptant could not have been prejudiced by the erroneous instruction, it will not for such error reverse it. See Bell v. Alexander, 21 Gratt. 9; Larue v. Cloud, 22 Gratt. 513, 518; Edmunds v. Harper, 31 Gratt. 645; Brighthope Ry. Co. v. Rogers, 76 Va. 451; *Snouffer v. William Harmons conveyed to Menefee certain real and personal property, of which the slave Milley was a part, in trust to secure certain debts therein specified; *and the deed provided that Harmons should be permitted to retain possession of the property until the 1st of August 1839. This deed was duly recorded in the clerk's office of the County court of Madison, where Harmons then lived and held the said slave in his possession. On the 16th of October 1838 Harmons entered into a written agreement under seal with Colvin, by which he agreed to take two hundred and fifty dollars for the slave Milley: And if the money with its interest was not returned to Colvin within twelve months, the agreement was to stand as a bill of sale, clear of all incumbrance. This agreement was made at the house of Colvin in the county of Culpeper, at which time the slave was in the county of Madison in the possession of Harmons or Milton Kirtley, under a temporary pledge for the loan of money from Kirtley to Harmons. Within three or four days thereafter, Harmons sent the slave Milley to Colvin, to be held by him under the contract aforesaid of the 16th of October 1838; and Colvin held possession of her in the county of Culpeper until the end of the year 1842, when he removed from Culpeper to Madison county, and carried the slave with him, and retained possession of her until the end of the year 1843, holding and claiming title to her under the said contract. Some time in the year 1843 Harmons

In Danville Bank v. Waddill, 27 Gratt. 448, after reviewing what is said in Wiley v. Givens, and Rea v. Trotter—cited above in the first paragraph—the court lays down the converse of the above proposition as settled law, saying: "Whatever may be said of the ruling in these two cases, it will not be disputed, that whenever an erroneous instruction is given, or what is the same thing, a correct one refused, the judgment will be reversed, unless the appellate court can see from the whole record, that even under correct instructions a different verdict could not have been rightly found, or unless it is able to perceive that the erroneous ruling of the trying court could not have influenced the jury." In this case, the court further held that the onus is upon the appellee to show that the error did not and could not affect the merit. See, in accord with this proposition, Kimball v. Borden, 95 Va. 207, 28 S. E. Rep. 207. And see also, the late case of Jackson v. Com., 97 Va. 763, 33 S. E. Rep. 547, in which JUDGE KERTH, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "All error is presumed to be prejudicial, and while it (the court of appeals) has approved verdicts rendered upon erroneous instructions, it does so with great caution, and only where it clearly appears that no injury could have resulted from the error." This is in harmony with the proposition laid down in

removed from Madison to Culpeper county; and some time in the year 1844, before the 13th of March of that year, the slave Milley was found in the possession of Harmons in Culpeper, and was taken possession of by the defendant, who sold her under the deed of trust aforesaid, on that day, for the price of four hundred and eighty-one dollars; for the recovery of which this suit was brought. Upon this state of facts the court on the motion of the defendant instructed the jury, that if they believed these facts, the said Colvin was to be regarded as having constructive notice of the 89 *deed to Menefee, of the 5th of August 1837; and that it was not necessary for the protection of Menefee's title to have the said deed recorded in Culpeper at all. And if the jury should believe that the plaintiff held possession of the slave Milley under the said contract, his possession, so far as Menefee was concerned, was the same as the possession of Harmons up to the 16th of October 1839; and that the statute of limitations did not commence to run against the said Menefee until the 16th of October 1839: The statute runs only in cases where the possession is adverse. In this case the possession was not adverse until the expiration of one year from the date of said contract.

Under this instruction the jury found a verdict for the defendant, upon which the court rendered a judgment. And thereupon Colvin applied to this court for a superseas, which was awarded.

Danville Bank v. Waddill, 27 Gratt. 448, and, with its converse laid down in the last preceding paragraph, is supported by the great weight of authority in Virginia.

In West Virginia also, there is some conflict on this question, though the great majority of decisions accord with the weight of authority in Virginia.

In Strader v. Goff, 6 W. Va. 264, it was said: "When an instruction given and excepted to, is apparently erroneous, the judgment must be reversed, though it be not shown whether it prejudiced the party who excepted, or not. Chapman & Co. v. Wilson & Co., 1 Rob. 267." This proposition was approved in Dinges v. Branson, 14 W. Va. 104.

But in Beaty v. B. & O. R. Co., 6 W. Va. 395, the court, citing and approving the principal case, held that the party excepting must exhibit facts disclosing an error material to the issue, and operating to his prejudice, and showing how he has probably sustained injury thereby in order to have the judgment reversed. In this case, since the court could not see how the party excepting had been injured by the erroneous instruction, it refused to reverse the judgment of the lower court. See also, in accord, Newlin v. Beard, 6 W. Va. 126, citing the principal case.

In Corder v. Talbott, 14 W. Va. 284, it was said: "It is true, as shown by the decisions in Virginia and in this state, that the court will not reverse a judgment, merely because the court misinstructed the jury, when all the facts proven in the case are in the record, and it appears thereby that the appellant could not have been injured by the misinstruction. See Insurance Company v. Hendren, 24 Gratt. 536; Colvin v. Menefee, 11 Gratt. 87; Pitman v. Breck-

Morson, for the appellant:

This case comes upon an instruction given by the court below, that in as much as the conditional sale allowed one year for the repayment of the purchase money of the slave, that this time is not to be taken into account in considering the bar of the statute of limitations. It cannot be said that there was not a conflict between the sale and the trust deed. The grantor assumed a power not given him by the deed; and the purchaser took in conflict with it: And if this be so, the plaintiff is entitled to recover in this action. The adverse holding which is contemplated is a holding with a claim of right, and with a different title from the other side; and where there is such an adverse holding the statute runs. Bradstreet v. Huntington, 5 Peters' R. 401.

Under the decisions of our courts it is not necessary to plead the statute of limitations in an action of detinue, and five years' peaceable possession of slaves *gives title. Newby's adm'rs v. Blakey, 3 Hen. & Munf. 57; Brent v. Chapman, 5 Cranch's R. 358; Shelby v. Guy, 11 Wheat. R. 361; Elam v. Bass' ex'ors, 4 Munf. 301; Garland v. Enos, 4 Munf. 504. The court is also referred to the case of Sheppards v. Turpin, 3 Gratt. 373, the facts of which resemble in a considerable degree the facts of this case.

Here was a deed of trust duly recorded,

enridge, 8 Gratt. 127; Clay v. Robinson, 7 W. Va. 350."

In Mason v. Bridge Co., 20 W. Va. 224, 229, the proposition as laid down in Danville Bank v. Waddill—and set forth above—was approved. The court said at p. 239: "The case of Dinges v. Branson, 14 W. Va. 100 (see third preceding paragraph), belongs to a class of cases in entire harmony with those cited. The record then before the appellate court did not show that the instructions if erroneous could have affected the verdict; and the rule is the judgment will be reversed unless it affirmatively and clearly appears, that the erroneous instruction could not have mislead the jury; the failure of showing, that the exception could not have been prejudicial, rests upon the party, at whose instance the erroneous instruction is granted."

In accord with Mason v. Bridge Co., see also, Nicholas v. Kershner, 20 W. Va. 253, 263; Osborne v. Francis, 38 W. Va. 323, 18 S. E. Rep. 595, both cases citing the principal case as authority. And see State v. Douglass, 28 W. Va. 302.

In Osborne v. Francis, 38 W. Va. 323, 18 S. E. Rep. 595, it was said: "Hence the rule has long been settled that when the court can clearly see affirmatively that the error has worked no harm to the party appealing it will be disregarded (Gilmer v. Higley, 110 U. S. 47, 3 Sup. Ct. 471); and the judgment ought not to be reversed on the ground that the court below admitted illegal evidence, or gave an erroneous instruction to the jury, unless it appears that some injury could possibly have resulted therefrom to the party appealing (Preston v. Harvey, 2 Hen. & M. 55); for the appellant must make it manifest from the record in some way that the

which was a lien upon the property against all persons claiming under the grantor; and of which they were bound to take notice. Colvin then took no title at the time of his purchase; and he relies upon his length of possession as giving it.

The possession of the grantor in the deed was consistent with it; and so was the possession of a purchaser from him. Rose v. Burgess, 10 Leigh 186. That was a stronger case than the present, because in this by the deed the grantor was allowed to remain in possession. The trustee was not authorized to sell until August 1839; and he did take possession and sell within five years from that time.

The possession of Harmons the grantor was in trust for us; and no act of limitations could run in his favor against us. The possession of his assignee must be viewed in the same light, as he was bound to know the existence of the trust. And as Harmons had the right of possession to August 1839 and until the trustee should take possession and sell, it must be presumed that the assignee holds in the same way until by some public notorious act he sets up some other title. If a grantor in a deed may make a private sale so as to bar the trustee, then is it a very ready means to destroy trusts. But the law proceeds on the ground that a person claiming under the grantor stands in his position until he publicly disavows such possession.

91 *When he does this, and is allowed to remain in possession for five years, then he may protect himself by the statute. He is like one coming in place of a tenant; for a grantor or mortgagor, after the time for taking possession under the deed, is a tenant at will. Chambers v. Pleak, 6 Dana's R. 430. And like principles are announced in the case of a trustee in Hendrick v. Robinson, 7 Dana's R. 165.

The doctrine above stated is conclusive of the case, without reference to the terms of the contract. But under the contract the time did not run until the end of twelve months. The purchaser could not bona fide claim title until that period; and without this the possession did not vest title. Kitty v. Fitzhugh, 4 Rand. 600. The instruction given was in fact too favorable to the plaintiff. He proved no adverse possession either before or after October 1839; and therefore he was not entitled to the instruction that there was adverse possession at that time. It is said there was a conflict between the trust deed and the purchaser. But he must bring home knowledge of the contract to the trustee; and there is no pretence of such knowledge. The law presumes that the grantor was acting as he was authorized to do, and not as he was not authorized to do.

sion at that time. It is said there was a conflict between the trust deed and the purchaser. But he must bring home knowledge of the contract to the trustee; and there is no pretence of such knowledge. The law presumes that the grantor was acting as he was authorized to do, and not as he was not authorized to do.

The case of Sheppards v. Turpin, 3 Gratt. 373, is in strict conformity to the principles which have been stated. There the property was not sold by the grantor in the deed, but by a public officer, who had taken it under an execution, and sold it at public auction.

Morson, for the appellant, in reply:

The authorities cited by the counsel for the appellee belong to a class of cases essentially different from that before the court. They relate to the relation of landlord and tenant or trustees. This is 92 of a wholly different *character.

Here there is no privity between Colvin and the trustee. The title he takes is an adverse title in its inception. This was not an agreement to vest the title at the end of the year if the money was not repaid; but it vested the title at once, and only vested in Harmons the right to repurchase within a year. Harmons alone had the right to do this: Colvin could not compel him to do it.

It is true that the claim of title must be open and proved: And the bill of exceptions states that the possession was held from within three days of the day of sale under a claim of title. One of the canons of the law as to personal property is, that possession is indicative of title; and here there was this possession with a conveyance of the property by deed. To constitute an adversary possession, it is only necessary that it shall be with claim of title; not that the title claimed shall be good. Shanks v. Lancaster, 5 Gratt. 110. And with reference to the statute of limitations, courts do not enquire when the rights of the plaintiff were acquired, but when the defendant's possession accrued. If the party in possession has held five years, that protects him; for if his possession is tortious, there must be some party entitled to seek redress for it.

DANIEL, J. The counsel for the defendant insists, that though the instructions of the Circuit court may have been erroneous, yet this court ought not therefore to reverse; in as much as the supposed error could not have been prejudicial to the plaintiff. He refers to that provision of the deed by which Harmons is permitted to retain possession of the slave till the 1st day of August 1839; and says that the trustee had no right to sell under the deed, and was not bound to institute any action to recover the possession of the slave, until the day last mentioned; and that as 93 he *obtained the possession and made the sale within five years thereafter, the possession of the plaintiff had not, at ruling against him is wrong. But, that being done, it is taken to be to his prejudice until the contrary is made to appear, and it must appear so clearly as to be beyond all fair ground of questioning that the error did not and could not with any reasonable degree of likelihood have prejudiced the party's rights. See Deery v. Cray, 5 Wall. 795, 807."

The court then gives a long list of Virginia and West Virginia cases on this subject. See especially what is said in this case concerning the decision in Wiley v. Givens, 6 Gratt. 277. See further, on this subject, monographic note on "Instructions" appended to Womack v. Circle, 29 Gratt. 192; 2 Barton's Law Pr. (2d Ed.) 1338-1342, and notes.

the date of the sale, matured into a title to the slave, or the proceeds of her sale.

I do not think that this view of the case has been successfully met.

It is true that the bill of exceptions does not purport to set out all the evidence in the cause; and it is also true, that it is not necessary for a party excepting to instructions to state any facts except such as are necessary to present the precise point ruled against him and excepted to; and that it thence follows that the action of the appellate court is properly restricted, (as a general proposition,) to the consideration of the question of law so raised by the facts, and alleged by the party excepting, to have been erroneously decided against him in the court below. Yet I apprehend it is equally true that the fact thus exhibited must disclose an error material to the issue, and operating to the prejudice of the party excepting; that the party asking the reversal of a judgment on the score of an erroneous instruction on the trial, must at least, show that he had probably sustained injury thereby.

Now, I do not perceive in what regard the plaintiff could have been injured by the instructions. The injury, which he imputes to them, is, that they cut him off from making a case on his five years' possession. But the facts which he sets out for the purpose of exhibiting the supposed error of the court, show at the same time, that the fate of his case, as resting on that foundation, must have been the same, though the instructions had not been given. For there is no proof that the trustee had any notice of the transaction between Harmons and the plaintiff, or of the removal of the slave from the county of Madison; and Harmons having, by the express terms of the deed, a right to retain the possession till the 1st of August 1839, I *hold it to be clear that the statute of limitations could not begin to run against the trustee till that period. Joyner v. Vincent, 4 Dev. & Bat. 512.

The plaintiff consequently could not have been prejudiced by the decision of the point ruled against him: For whether we refer the commencement of the running of the limitation to the period fixed by the instructions, on the 16th of October 1839, one year after the date of the agreement between Harmons and Colvin, or to the 1st of August 1839, the result is the same. The sale by the trustee in the spring of 1844 was, in either aspect, before he had lost his right to maintain an action for the recovery of the possession of the slave. The plaintiff's own statement of his case thus showing that his possession and claim of title had not, by lapse of time, ripened into a perfect right to the property, as against the trustee, at the time of the sale, his claim, to recover the proceeds of her sale, as founded on his adversary possession, must consequently have failed, though the instructions had not been given.

As this view of the case disposes of it, it becomes unnecessary to consider other questions discussed at the bar.

I am for affirming the judgment.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Daniel, J.

Judgment affirmed.

*Williams v. Williams & als.

April Term, 1854, Richmond.

Administrators—Right to Have Proceeds of Land Applied to Debt—Case at Bar.*—W, who is a creditor of T, qualifies as his administrator, and exhausts the personal estate in payment of debts, leaving himself still a creditor. The heirs of T file a bill in the County court for the sale of his land, and the same is sold upon a credit, and a part of it is purchased by W, who executes his bond for the purchase money. W then files his bill in the Circuit court to enjoin the payment of the purchase money of the land to the heirs, claiming that he is entitled to have it applied in satisfaction of his debt. Held:

1. Same—Same—Same.—That W is entitled to have the proceeds of the land applied to the payment of his debt.
2. Same—Same—Enjoining Payment of Purchase Money to Heirs.—That the injunction should only go to restrain the payment of the purchase money to the heirs of T; and should not restrain the collection of the money by the County court.
3. Same—Same—Same—Where Petition Should Have Been Filed.—Although it would have been more regular for W to connect himself by petition or bill, with the proceedings in the County court, in which the fund had been realized, yet there is no serious objection to the mode of proceeding adopted by him. The County court, instead of directing the money to be paid to the heirs, may direct it to be paid to such person as may be appointed to receive it by the Circuit court: Or one of the suits may be removed to the court in which the other is pending.

In August 1847 Francis Williams filed his bill in the Circuit court of Pittsylvania, in which he charged that Thomas & Robert W. Williams, who were partners, made their negotiable note for six thousand dollars, payable to John McAlister, which was endorsed by McAlister and the plaintiff for the accommodation of the makers, and was discounted for them by the Farmers Bank of Virginia at Danville. That the note not being paid at maturity, was duly protested, and was paid by the plaintiff. That Administrators—Right to Have Proceeds of Land Applied to Debt.—In the principal case, it was held that an administrator, who was also a creditor and who had, out of the assets of the estate, paid the debts, could enjoin the payment of the purchase money of the land to the heirs and have it applied to the payment of his debt. This was practically followed in Easley v. Barksdale, 75 Va. 286.

The principal case is cited in Saddler v. Kennedy, 26 W. Va. 642, but shown not to be relevant to that case.

See monographic note on "Executors and Administrators."

soon thereafter Robert W. Williams and Mc-Alister became insolvent, and Thomas Williams died. That the plaintiff
96 qualified *as administrator of Thomas Williams, and had disbursed the whole personal estate in the payment of debts; and that there was yet due to him upon said note, as was shown by his administration account which had been settled by commissioners of the court of probat, the sum of two thousand five hundred and seventy-eight dollars and eight-four cents of principal and one hundred and fifty-eight dollars and ninety-seven cents of interest. He further charged that Thomas Williams owned at his death certain real estate which he specified. That the heirs of Williams, with a full knowledge that the personal estate of their ancestor was exhausted, and that a large balance was still due to the plaintiff, had filed a bill in the County court of Pittsylvania for the sale of the said real estate; that the same had been sold under the decree of that court. That at that sale the plaintiff had become the purchaser of one lot at the price of one hundred and seven dollars, and had executed his bond with security to the commissioner; and that the other real estate had been sold to Lewis Hall, for one hundred and ninety-one dollars, who had likewise executed his bond for the amount to the commissioner. That the said commissioner had since died, and there was no representative of his estate. That the said heirs had little or no estate of their own; and notwithstanding the large debt due to the plaintiff, they threatened to enforce payment of the purchase money for the lot purchased by him, and also to collect the amount due from Hall. That he was advised that he was entitled to have the proceeds of the real estate of Thomas Williams applied to the satisfaction of the debt due him. And making the heirs of Thomas Williams and Hall and his surety parties defendants, the plaintiff asked that the heirs might be enjoined from collecting the said purchase money, and that Hall and his surety might be enjoined from 97 paying to them; and that the *proceeds of said real estate might be applied in part satisfaction of the debt due to him; and for general relief.

The injunction was granted: But on the motion of the defendants without filing an answer, the court dissolved the injunction.
And thereupon the plaintiff applied to this court for an appeal, which was allowed.

Stanard and Bouldin, for the appellant.
There was no counsel for the appellees.

MONCURE, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The court is of opinion that the appellant's bill makes out a good case for equitable relief, and entitled him to an injunction to prevent the widow and heirs of the intestate Thomas Williams from receiving the purchase money of his real estate, but not to prevent the collection of the money under the order of the County court.

The suit in that court was instituted before the appellant's suit in the Circuit court; and the latter should not interfere with the former suit, except to prevent the payment of the money to the widow and heirs until the appellant's claim can be adjudicated.
It would perhaps have been more regular if the appellant, instead of bringing his suit in the Circuit court, had connected himself, by petition or bill, with the proceedings in the County court in which the fund had been realized. But the course which he has pursued is free from serious objection, and need not occasion any conflict of jurisdiction between the two courts;
as the County court, instead of directing the money to be paid to the widow and heirs, can direct it to be paid to such person as may be appointed to receive it by the Circuit court. Or if it be more convenient to have both suits in the same court, that object can be effected by a removal of one of them into the court in which the 98 other is pending. *Code, ch. 174, p.
657. The court is therefore of opinion that the court below erred in dissolving the injunction in toto, without plea or answer, instead of dissolving it in part and over-ruling the motion as to the residue, according to the principles above indicated. It is therefore decreed and ordered, that so much of the order of the court below as is above declared to be erroneous, be reversed, and the residue thereof affirmed, with costs to the appellant against the appellees, who are heirs of the said Thomas Williams; and the cause is remanded for further proceedings.

99 *B. Staton v. Pittman, Sheriff.
Pittman, Sheriff, v. R. Staton.

April Term, 1854, Richmond.

Case at Bar—Fraud against Creditors.*—Judgments had been recovered against N, and executions sued out thereon had been returned "no effects." In this state of things, slaves sold at public auction on a credit were cried out to N, and he induced T to take them and give his bond for the price, upon the understanding that N would afterwards take them and pay T the price; and he told T he was indebted to his sister R for washing, mending, &c., and owed her a good deal of money, and he wished to give the slaves to her as compensation for what he owed her. T kept the slaves about three months, and then N paid T the price of the slaves, and T gave N a receipt in the name of R; and a day or two afterwards T sent the slaves to the house of B the father of R, where R then lived, she being about fourteen years old; and the slaves and R both remained there, she claiming them as hers, but it not appearing that B set up any claim to them. Whilst the slaves were thus at the house of B, the sheriff attempted to levy upon them as the property of N, but when he came in sight, the doors of the servants' houses were shut. Afterwards N was taken on a ca. sa. and took the insolvent debtors' oath; and then the sheriff brought separate actions of detinue against B and R to recover the slaves. Held:

1. Same—Same.—The arrangement by N was fraudulent as to his creditors.
2. Same—Same.—Though N never had possession of the slaves, yet as he paid the purchase money to T, they became the property of N, upon which his creditors would have been entitled to levy their executions; and the subsequent transfer of the possession to R without consideration, and upon a fraudulent arrangement between N and R, did not bar the action of the sheriff for the slaves.
3. Same—Infants—Judgment.—Though R was an infant when the action was instituted, yet as she did not set up her infancy to defeat the action, and as it may be reasonably inferred from the evidence that she was of full age when the cause was heard upon a demurrer to evidence, and appeared and defended herself by counsel, she is bound by the judgment.
4. Same.—Though the slaves were sent to and remained on the premises of B, yet as his daughter R also lived there, and R claimed 100 *the slaves, but it did not appear that B ever claimed them, the action cannot be maintained against B.
5. Same—Evidence—Receipts on Bond.—Upon the trial R, to prove that she gave a valuable consideration for the slaves, introduced a bond executed by N to B, and assigned by B to R, before N's purchase of the slaves. On this bond there were several receipts, the last of which, for the balance of the bond, was dated before the purchase of the slaves by N, and to this receipt there were four subscribing witnesses, none of whom were introduced upon the trial. R having introduced the bond with the receipts upon it, these receipts were in evidence for the benefit of the plaintiff, without his calling a subscribing witness to prove them. And it was for R to show that there was an error in the date of the receipt.

These were two actions of detinue brought in the Circuit court of Buckingham county, one by Thomas Pittman, sheriff, who sued for the benefit of Wardsworth, Williams & Co. against Benjamin Staton; and the other by the same plaintiff for the same parties, against Rosetta Staton. The object of both suits was to recover the same two slaves.

The two cases were tried together, and the jury found verdicts for the plaintiff, subject to demurrers to the evidence by the defendants.

It appears from the evidence of the plaintiff that three judgments had been recovered against Nicholas Staton, the son of the defendant Benjamin, and the brother of Rosetta Staton, in September 1841, upon which executions had soon after been issued and had been returned "no effects." One of these was at the suit of Wardsworth,

Williams & Co. Afterwards in 1844, executions had been issued against the body of Nicholas Staton, upon which he was taken in custody, and took the benefit of the act for the relief of insolvent debtors, and was discharged, having surrendered a few trifling articles in his schedule. Previous to this last period, viz: on the 12th of September 1842, at a public sale made at Buckingham court-house, by W. P. Bocock as commissioner, the two slaves in contro-
101 versy were bid off to Nicholas *Staton at two hundred and twenty-two dollars; and on the same day he informed William Tapscott of his purchase and requested him to take them, saying that he would afterwards take them and pay Tapscott for them; and at the same time he told Tapscott that he was indebted to his sister Rosetta Staton for washing, mending, &c. and that he owed her a good deal of money, and wished to buy this woman and child and give them to her as compensation for what he owed her. Tapscott took the negroes and gave his bond to Bocock for the price, and kept them about three months, when Nicholas Staton paid him the purchase money, and Tapscott gave a receipt to Nicholas in the name of Rosetta Staton; and a day or two afterwards sent the slaves to the house of Benjamin Staton. The slaves continued at the house of Benjamin Staton, where Rosetta Staton also lived; she being at the time of this purchase by Nicholas Staton about fourteen years old. At that time Tapscott considered Nicholas Staton very good for the amount of the purchase money of the slaves, and he was always punctual in every transaction he had with him. After the slaves went to the house of Benjamin Staton, the sheriff went there to levy upon them, but after he arrived in sight of the house, the doors of the out-houses were closed, and the entry of the officer prevented.

The defendants introduced Nicholas Staton as a witness, who testified that he first wanted to buy the slaves for his sister Rosetta Staton; that she authorized him to buy them for her; that he owed her a bond, and she told him to buy them and she would give him credit for them; that he did so, and paid off the whole bond. That he owed Benjamin Staton for the hire of negroes, for which he gave the bond to him. That the bond was assigned to Rosetta Staton by Benjamin, before the negroes were purchased; and that the bond had been 102 paid off by the purchase of *the negroes, and a balance paid in money. That he owed Rosetta Staton on other accounts; that she had wove for him and done some sewing for him. He had never heard Benjamin Staton claim the negroes; but that Rosetta Staton had always claimed them as hers, and still did so. The bond referred to by the witness was produced, and there was no question that it was genuine, and had been given for the hire of slaves. It was dated the 1st of January 1840, and payable on the 1st of January 1841, and was for four hundred and fifty dollars. The assignment by Benjamin to his daughter Rosetta Staton is dated the 1st of January 1842, and purports to be a gift. There are four credits on the bond, the two first of which amount to two hundred dollars, and are not dated. The third bears date the 7th of July 1842, for a due bill on A. Long for one hundred dollars; and the fourth, purporting to be the receipt of the balance of the bond in cash, bears date the 10th of August 1842, and is attested by four witnesses, none of whom were introduced on the trial.

The court rendered a judgment upon the demurrer to evidence against Benjamin Staton, and in favor of Rosetta Staton; and Benjamin Staton in the first case, and the sheriff in the second, applied to this court for a supersedeas, which was awarded.

Stanard and Bouldin, for Benjamin Staton.

Morson, for the sheriff.

Irving, for Rosetta Staton.

LEE, J. It is not to be questioned that if Nicholas Staton was the legal owner of the slaves in controversy, and made the transfer to his sister Rosetta for the purpose of hindering, delaying and defrauding his creditors, the transfer was as to them utterly void; and upon his taking 103 the oath of an insolvent debtor, *the sheriff became entitled to recover the slaves for the benefit of the creditors, from any one unlawfully detaining the possession of them. Upon this subject the cases of Shirley v. Long, 6 Rand. 735, and Clough v. Thompson, 7 Gratt. 26, may be regarded as decisive. And I think the facts proven by the evidence in these causes, and the inferences which a jury legitimately might and should make from them, are such as to present a case which cannot be satisfactorily explained, except upon the hypothesis of fraud on the part of Nicholas Staton in the transaction in question. At the time of the sale made by Commissioner Bocock, he was much embarrassed with debts, there being unsatisfied judgments to a considerable amount standing against him, the executions upon which had been returned "no effects." The slaves are struck off to him as the highest bidder; but being unwilling, for a reason which we are at no loss to understand, to complete the purchase by giving the requisite bond in his own name, he gets Tapscott to take his place as ostensible purchaser, and give his bond to the commissioner for the purchase money, and receive possession of the slaves, stating that he owed his sister Rosetta for washing, mending, &c., and that he wished to give her the slaves to compensate her. That he could have given the bond and the security required, in his own name, if he had chosen, may be fairly inferred from what Tapscott states: for he says he regarded N. Staton as perfectly good for the amount of the purchase money, and he had always found him remarkably punctual in meeting his engagements with him; and no doubt he would have been as willing to become his security if Nicholas Staton had chosen to give his own bond on the credit of the sale, as he was to make himself the convenient instrument in the arrangement which Nicholas Staton preferred to adopt.

104 Tapscott retains possession for about three months, and Nicholas *Staton then pays over the amount of the purchase to him, taking a receipt in the name of Rosetta Staton, who was at that time about fourteen or fifteen years of age; and in a day or two after, Tapscott sends the slaves to the house of Benjamin Staton, the father of Rosetta, with whom she then lived. Now it does not appear whether at this time the credit of the commissioner's sale had expired, or whether Tapscott had paid for the negroes or not; but from his silence on this point, and from the questionable position which he occupies in relation to this affair, it might not be unwarrantable to infer that he had not then paid for the negroes, and that the payment, when made, was with the funds provided by Nicholas Staton himself.

As to the pretended consideration for the transfer of the slaves by Nicholas Staton to his sister Rosetta, I think it comes in too questionable a shape to afford any sufficient support to the transaction. She was at the time a mere child, and it would seem very improbable that he could owe her any considerable sum for washing and mending. He is introduced as a witness indeed on the part of the defendant in the action, in each case, and he states that he purchased the negroes by the direction of this young girl, and with them paid off the balance of the bond which had been assigned to her by her father. And though he does say that he owed her on other accounts for personal services, yet this is rather auxiliary and cumulative, and the stress of the consideration is placed on the balance due on the bond. But upon the demurrer to evidence, his evidence, so far as it conflicts with that of the plaintiff in the action, is, of course, to be disregarded; and if it were even to be taken into consideration, I think it entitled to not the slightest weight. It is true, the fairness of the bond executed by Nicholas Staton to his father for the hire of the watermen, or of the assignment of 105 it by the father to Rosetta Staton, is not impeached *by the plaintiff, nor do I perceive anything in the evidence upon which either could be successfully assailed. The evidence of Tapscott proves that the hiring of the three negroes for the year 1840, was a real transaction between Benjamin Staton and Nicholas Staton; and the bond of the latter, produced by himself on his examination as a witness, shows that it was given for the amount of their hire. This bond Benjamin Staton had a perfect right to give to his daughter, if he chose so to do; nor is there any one here questioning or entitled to question the validity of such a gift. But when Nicholas Staton spoke of his indebtedness to his sister at the time he procured Tapscott to take his place as ostensible purchaser of the slaves, and to hold them subject to his disposal, he made no allusion to any bond held by Rosetta upon him, but intimated that what he owed her was for washing, mending, &c.; and upon examining the bond produced by Nicholas Staton, it would seem that the balance due upon it had been paid off in cash, on the 10th of August 1842, before the purchase by Nicholas Staton at the commissioner's sale, and some four months before he paid over the money to Tapscott. So that however justly he may have been indebted to Rosetta on account of that bond previously to the sale, he had at that time ceased to be so, having paid off the balance, and no doubt then having the bond in his own possession.

But it is said that the receipt endorsed on the bond is not proven, and that although there are four attesting witnesses, not one was called to testify concerning it. But what need of proof on the part of the plaintiff in the action? The bond, with the receipt endorsed upon it, is produced by the defendants and their witness, and the plaintiff certainly had the right to take it as they exhibited it. And if there was a mistake in the date of that receipt, as 106 it is suggested *by the counsel there may be, it was for the defendants to show it, I apprehend, not for the plaintiff to show there was none.

I think the indicia furnished by the evidence, of the true character of this transaction, are such as fully to warrant a jury in finding that it was a fraudulent arrangement made by Nicholas Staton for the purpose of screening the slaves from the creditors who then held unsatisfied judgments against him, by holding them out to the world as the property of Rosetta Staton; and that she was but a too willing instrument in his hands to effect his fraudulent purpose. But whether a willing or an innocent instrument, I conceive no substantial or valid consideration is shown for the transfer of the slaves to her, and that she can take no benefit from an arrangement tainted with the fraud too justly imputed to Nicholas Staton.

But it is said Nicholas Staton never had title to these slaves: that even if there was no debt due from him to Rosetta, and the money paid to Tapscott for them was his own money and not that of Rosetta, still he never had the possession of the slaves, because they were delivered by the commissioner to Tapscott, and by him directly to Rosetta Staton; and that the most that can be made of the case is that it is one of a resulting trust in the slaves for the benefit of the creditors, which they can only enforce in equity, but of which they cannot have the benefit in an action at law for the slaves themselves, in the name of the sheriff, for want of a sufficient legal title upon which to base such an action and recovery. A purchase alone, it is argued, of the slaves without delivery of possession, will not pass a title to the purchaser.

This view in my judgment cannot be maintained. As already intimated, I look upon Tapscott as but the ostensible, while I regard Nicholas Staton as the real purchaser of the slaves: and Tapscott's possession, if *(as I think a not unwarrantable inference), the slaves were actually paid for with the money provided by Nicholas Staton, might be regarded as his possession, so far as creditors were concerned, subject at most to Tapscott's right to be indemnified against the bond which he had given. But if this were going too far, clearly I think after Nicholas Staton had paid over the purchase money to Tapscott, the possession of the latter during the interval between the payment and the delivery of the negroes to Rosetta Staton, was the possession of Nicholas Staton, and whether Tapscott had yet paid the amount of his bond to the commissioner or not, an execution against Nicholas Staton might properly have been levied upon the slaves during that interval while yet in the hands of Tapscott. To this Tapscott could not object, for having received the money, his interest in the slaves had ceased by his own act and consent. Rosetta Staton could have no right to object: the money paid for the slaves was not hers, and she had not yet acquired the possession of them. So that there was no one who could successfully interpose to arrest a creditor in the pursuit of this property during that period, nor could his right to subject it to his debt be defeated by a subsequent transfer, except upon sufficient consideration, and untainted by the fraudulent purpose reprobated by the law.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the plaintiff did show a sufficient right to recover the slaves for the benefit of the creditors at whose suit Nicholas Staton took the oath of insolvency, against any and all persons unlawfully detaining them; and as Rosetta Staton claims both title and possession, and wholly denies any right in the plaintiff, she is clearly liable in the action against her. Nor do I think that her infancy at the time of suit brought and plea pleaded can protect her from a judgment against her upon the demurrer to evidence. It is undoubtedly true that an infant cannot 108 not *appoint an attorney, nor appear or plead otherwise than by guardian; but waiving the question whether the point can be made in this form, or whether the court must take notice of the infancy of the defendant whenever and however it is brought to its knowledge, it is equally true that the disability of infancy is a privilege personal to the party, and which, after he attain his age, he may well waive if he please: And such a waiver must be intended in this case. For taking the evidence most strongly, as it must be taken, against the demurrant, it may be inferred that at the time of the argument of the demurrer and the rendition of the judgment in April 1848, Rosetta Staton had then attained her full age, and as she then proceeded by her attorney to the argument of the demurrer without making the objection of her previous infancy, it is to be considered that she waived her privilege, and sought the judgment of the court upon the merits of the case.

As it respects Benjamin Staton, however, I can perceive no just ground upon which he should be subjected to a recovery in the action against him. As I have already intimated, there is no impeachment of the fairness of the bond executed to him by Nicholas Staton, or of the assignment of the same by him to his daughter Rosetta. He is not proven to have had any connection whatever with the purchase of the slaves, or with the transfer of them to Rosetta. He has set up no claim to them in any form, nor exercised any act of ownership over them. Nor can he be said in any just sense to have had possession of them or to have detained them from the plaintiff. That he suffered his daughter to keep the slaves that she claimed as hers, at his house where she still lived, is a circumstance too slight and equivocal of itself to charge him with the grave responsibilities of an unlawful detainer from the right owner. It is not incompatible, but strictly consistent with perfect freedom from 109 any participation *in the fraudulent arrangement between the brother and sister, and with entire ignorance of its true character. What more natural than that a father would permit his young daughter to keep slaves, that she claimed as hers by purchase or gift from her brother, upon his premises while she continued a member of his family? He might be totally ignorant of any vice in the arrangement between them; or if a doubt had suggested itself, he might be neither able nor willing to take upon himself the unpleasant task of resolving it. The circumstance alluded to by the witness Haskins of the closing of the doors of the out-houses when he approached with the sheriff for the purpose of levying on the slaves, is left in too much uncertainty to constitute a sufficient ground on which to charge Benjamin Staton. It is not shown to have been done by his authority or with his knowledge, privity or consent. It does not appear that he was even at home at the time. Nothing is shown by which he can be fairly connected with it. That the premises were his cannot make him responsible for what might be done upon them without his authority; and for aught that appears, this closing of the doors might have been the act of the negroes themselves. The plaintiff might have readily placed Benjamin Staton in his true position by demanding to know if the slaves were withheld by his authority, and might then treat him as the nature of his response should direct. He made no such call, however, upon him; and under such circumstances, to charge Benjamin Staton with the consequences of an illegal detainer of these slaves, would be, as it seems to me, to convict a man upon bare suspicion of being privy to and participant in the unlawful act of others, although remaining passive throughout, or at most, doing what perhaps almost any other father might do in similar circumstances, in permitting a child to keep property that she 110 claimed, *upon his premises whilst she was herself a member of his family. The injustice in this case would be gross and manifest. For if the plaintiff in the action should enforce his judgment against Benjamin Staton, by compelling payment of the alternative value and damages found by the jury, and the costs, he will be without indemnity of any kind. Thus he is compelled to pay a large sum towards a debt of Nicholas Staton, for which he was never in any form responsible, for which he has received nothing in the form of an equivalent, nor can claim anything in the way of indemnity; and this for a transaction in which he is in no manner implicated, and without any proof that he has in any manner obstructed the plaintiff in the pursuit of his remedies against those who were justly responsible to him.

I am of opinion, therefore, to reverse the judgment in each case; and in the case of Rosetta Staton, to render judgment against her on the demurrer to evidence, and in that of Benjamin Staton, to render judgment for the defendant.

ALLEN and SAMUELS, Js., concurred in the opinion of Lee, J.

DANIEL and MONCURE, Js., concurred in the opinion of Lee, J., as to Rosetta Staton; but they thought that the judgment against Benjamin Staton was correct.

Both judgments reversed.

[22 Am. Dec. 640.]

1. Guardians—Power over Bond of Ward—Case at Bar.
—A bond executed to an executor is transferred by him to a guardian as part of the ward's estate.

Guardians—Control over Ward's Estate.—The principal case is cited in Ware v. Ware, 28 Gratt. 674, upon the question of the control of the guardian over his ward's estate.

Same—Conversion of Assets—Liability.—The proposition laid down in the principal case that a guardian violates his trust when he sells or transfers the property of his ward to pay his own debt, is approved and followed in Burwell v. Burwell, 78 Va. 582, citing the principal case, and in Wernick v. McMurdo, 5 Rand. 90; Miller v. Jeffress, 4 Gratt. 477; Tabb v. Cabell, 17 Gratt. 173; Asberry v. Asberry, 33 Gratt. 469. The principal case is also cited and followed in Dobyns v. Rawley, 76 Va. 542.

Same—Sale of Ward's Property—Fraud of Guardian—Purchaser.—In Mills v. Mills, 28 Gratt. 501, and note, it is said, that the principle upon which a party dealing with a fiduciary is held responsible, is, that he has co-operated in the fraud of the fiduciary, citing Hunter v. Lawrence, 11 Gratt. 111. The principal case is also cited and approved in Jones v. Clark, 25 Gratt. 667, and note; Brockenbrough v. Turner, 78 Va. 455, 456.

See monographic note on "Guardian and Ward" appended to Barnum v. Frost, 17 Gratt. 398.

Whatever interest the ward has in the bond is subject to the control of the guardian, who may receive the money due thereon if voluntarily paid; may sue for it in a common law court in the name of the executor, for his own use as guardian, and cannot be prevented by the executor; or he may sell and transfer the bond.

2. Same—Power over Personal Estate.—As a general rule, a guardian has the legal title of the ward's personal estate; and has the power and authority to sell it.

3. Same—Selling Property to Pay Individual Debts.—A guardian violates his trust when he sells or transfers the property of his ward to pay his own debt.

4. Same—Fraud—Effect as to Innocent Parties.—The fraud of a guardian in disposing of the property of his ward, is not sufficient of itself, under all circumstances, to invalidate his transactions with innocent parties.

5. Executors—Fraud—Case at Bar.—A bond executed to an executor is transferred by him to a guardian as part of the ward's estate; the guardian is himself a legatee for a large amount of the same testator, and is guardian of another legatee; and he receives the amount of these legacies from the executor in bonds and other evidences of debt. Upon the marriage of the last mentioned legatee, he transfers to her husband the bond belonging to the first named ward in part discharge of her legacy, he being at the time in good circumstances and his sureties as guardian being wealthy. The husband takes the bond at par, without knowing or suspecting that it is the property of the first named ward; and takes it without a hope of gain or fear of loss, but simply as a mode of payment convenient to both parties. Years afterwards the guardian becomes insolvent by the failure of speculations in which he is then engaged. Held:

1. Same—Same—Liability of Innocent Party.—The husband, who received the bond, is not responsible to the ward, whose property it was, for the amount thereof.

2. Same—Same—Same.—The principle upon which a party dealing with a fiduciary is held responsible, is, that he has co-operated in the fraud of the fiduciary.

6. Same—Same—Same—Case at Bar.—A guardian qualifies in 1821. In 1825 he transfers a bond of his ward to a party wholly innocent of any participation in the guardian's fraud, in payment of a debt. The ward comes of age in 1832, and takes no steps to obtain his estate from his guardian until 1840, *when the guardian becomes insolvent. He then sues the sureties of the guardian, and recovers from them the amount due to him from his guardian. In all this time the sureties had done nothing to secure the faithful discharge of his duties by the guardian, or to compel him to pay over to the ward his estate after he came of age. Held: That even if the party who had received the bond from the guardian, could be held responsible to the ward, he is not responsible to the sureties.

George Pottie the elder, late of the county of Louisa, died prior to April 1815, leaving a widow and five children surviving him. By his will, after giving a few small legacies, he directed that the remainder of his estate, both real and personal, should be divided between his widow and children, as the law directs in cases of intestacy; and he appointed John Thompson of Culpeper his executor. The will was duly admitted to probat, and Thompson qualified as executor.

Several of the children of George Pottie the elder were infants, and in 1821 R. S. Sandridge qualified as the guardian of George Pottie the younger, and Nathaniel Thompson, who had previously married the widow, qualified as the guardian of Isabella Pottie. On the 28th of June of this year the executor John Thompson divided among the legatees the sum of forty-five thousand dollars, Nathaniel Thompson, as the husband of the widow, receiving fifteen thousand dollars, and as guardian of Isabella Pottie, receiving six thousand dollars; and Sandridge, as guardian of George Pottie the younger, also receiving the sum of six thousand dollars.

Although the receipts given by these parties purport to be for so much money, yet in fact these sums were not paid in money, but principally, if not wholly, in bonds and other evidences of debt. Among the bonds so received by Sandridge as guardian of George Pottie the younger, was one for five thousand dollars, executed by Isaac Winston of Culpeper to John Thompson, executor of George Pottie, 113 which bore date on the *13th of November 1820, and was payable on the 13th of November 1825, with legal interest payable semi-annually. This bond was secured by a deed of trust executed by Winston and wife conveying real estate and slaves, and was recorded in the county of Culpeper. The executor did not assign the bond, but simply transferred it, and the only endorsement upon it was one signed by the executor, of the receipt of interest upon it to the 13th of November 1821.

In 1822 Sandridge died, and in November of that year Nathaniel Thompson was appointed guardian of George Pottie the younger. In 1823 Sandridge's account as guardian of George Pottie was settled by commissioners, and returned to the County court of Louisa, and ordered to be recorded. In this account on the debtor side, there is an item as follows: "1822, Dec. 16. To amount of Isaac Winston's deed of trust, returned, $5000." And on the credit side there is the item, "1821, June 28. By Isaac Winston, for bank stock sold him, per deed of trust, $5000." At the time this account was ordered to be and was recorded, John Hunter was, and had been and continued to be until this suit was brought, clerk of the County court of Louisa; but the order directing the account to be recorded, and the record of the account, are proved to be in the handwriting of a deputy then in the office, who had since died.

In 1823 the administrator of Sandridge turned over to Nathaniel Thompson, guardian of George Pottie the younger, the estate of his ward which had been in the hands of Sandridge; and as a part of that estate he delivered to Thompson the bond of Winston. In 1824 Dickinson, one of the two sureties of Nathaniel Thompson, having, as it is stated on the record, suggested his fears of suffering in consequence of said securityship, Thompson waiving the necessity of a summons, an order was 114 made requiring him to give *other security, whereupon he entered into another bond, with Garland Thompson, jun., Charles Thompson, Oswald McGehee and Henry Lawrence as his sureties.

On the 3d of November 1825 John Hunter married Isabella Pottie; and they being on a visit to Nathaniel Thompson and his wife, the guardian and mother of Mrs. Hunter, on the 17th of November Thompson informed Hunter that he was indebted as guardian to Mrs. Hunter about six thousand dollars; that he held the bond of Winston for five thousand dollars, secured by a deed of trust; that he had recently seen Winston, and that he promised payment of the debt in installments at short intervals; and that as fast as Winston paid him he would pay Hunter in part discharge of what he owed as guardian of Hunter's wife. To this Hunter replied, that as Thompson intended to collect the debt to pay him, he had as well pass the debt to him, as he had no immediate use for the money, and preferred having it in safe hands bearing interest. This suggestion was adopted, and the bond was immediately transferred to Hunter; who held it for near twenty years, receiving the interest regularly upon it, before he collected the principal from Winston.

The foregoing conversation and arrangement occupied between five and ten minutes; and neither at that time, nor before nor afterwards, was Hunter informed by Thompson that he had received the bond from Sandridge's administrator, or that it was held by him as a part of the estate of his ward George Pottie the younger; nor does it appear from any evidence in the cause that Hunter was ever so informed until after the failure of Thompson in 1840. At the time of this transfer of the bond Thompson was in good credit, and in independent circumstances, able to pay up what he owed to Hunter's wife; and the 115 sureties in his bond as guardian were also in good circumstances; *and his circumstances continued good until 1840, when, owing to the failure of speculations in which he had engaged, he became insolvent.

In 1832 George Pottie the younger came of age; but he does not appear to have taken any steps to collect from his guardian Nathaniel Thompson the moneys of his in Thompson's hands until 1840, after Thompson's failure; and although the sureties in the guardian's bond lived in the neighborhood of Thompson, and were well acquainted with him, they do not appear to have made any attempt either to urge the payment by Thompson to Pottie, or to obtain their release from their liabilities as Thompson's sureties. In 1840 Pottie brought a suit upon the official bond of his guardian, and obtained a judgment, a part of which was paid out of a trust fund conveyed by Thompson to indemnify his sureties and pay his creditors, and the balance was paid by the administrators of Lawrence and Garland Thompson, two of the sureties. These payments appear to have been made in 1842 and 1843.

In 1845 this suit was instituted by the administrator of Lawrence against Hunter, to obtain from him repayment of the amount he had been compelled to pay as the surety of Thompson as guardian of George Pottie; and subsequently the administrator of Garland Thompson came in by petition and was made a party plaintiff in the suit. The bill, after stating the death and will of George Pottie the elder, the qualification of Sandridge as the guardian of George Pottie the younger, the transfer to him by the executor of the bond of Winston, the qualification of Nathaniel Thompson as guardian of George Pottie, the transfer of the bond to him by the administrator of Sandridge, the settlement and recording of the guardian account, the marriage of Hunter with Isabella Pottie, and the giving in became one of the sureties, as hereinbefore detailed, charged that about this period, Hunter having met with considerable difficulty in obtaining the money due to his wife from her guardian Nathaniel Thompson, and being perfectly familiar with all the circumstances of the case, and knowing that the bond of Winston for five thousand dollars was the property of the ward George Pottie, and not the property of Thompson, combining fraudulently with the said Thompson, obtained an assignment by Thompson to him of the said bond, and received the same as pro tanto a discharge of the debt due from Thompson to him, and had since held the said bond as his own property, and still held the same, unless he had changed the debt by receiving payment of the said bond. And it was charged expressly, that these facts were known directly to Hunter, because he was at that time, as he had been for years previous thereto, clerk of the County court of Louisa in which these facts were matters of record, and much if not all the record in his own handwriting. And it was charged that the doubtful condition of Thompson was known to Hunter; that he had full knowledge of the misapplication of the funds to the prejudice of the ward George Pottie or the sureties of Thompson, and that he thus obtained payment of his claim out of money which he knew could not be so applied without defrauding an infant or a surety.

The bill further stated the death of Lawrence, the action by George Pottie on his guardian's bond, and the payments made by the sureties, and making Hunter a party defendant, and calling upon him to answer to all the allegations of the bill, and to discover whether he still had the bond of Winston; prayed that if he still had it he might be compelled to surrender it, and to pay the interest he had received upon it; or if the bond had been paid, that he 117 might be compelled *to pay the amount thereof to the sureties of Thompson as guardian of George Pottie, and for general relief.

Hunter answered the bill, and denied explicitly every statement in the bill, as to his knowledge that the bond had been transferred by the executor of George Pottie the elder to Sandridge, or by Sandridge's administrator to Nathaniel Thompson, or that Thompson held it as a part of the estate of George Pottie the younger, or in any other manner which would have rendered it improper for Thompson to transfer it, or himself to receive it, in part payment of his wife's fortune, until 1840, when Thompson unexpectedly failed. He denied that Thompson was in difficulties in 1824 when Dickinson asked for other security, or that that proceeding was prompted by a fear of Thompson's failure. He denied that he had found any difficulty in obtaining payment of his wife's fortune from Thompson, and gave the facts attending the transfer of the bond substantially as before stated. He denied that he derived from his position as clerk of the court any knowledge that the bond had been transferred by Sandridge's administrator to Thompson, or of its being in any way or in any respect the property of George Pottie. And he stated the fact that the order for recording the settlement and the record of it was in the handwriting of one of his deputies. He averred that he not only did not know or suspect anything which rendered it improper to receive the bond, but that he could have had no motive to unite Thompson in a misapplication of the bond, because Thompson himself was very able to pay his wife's fortune, and the security in the guardian's bond was ample; and it could not be supposed that he would combine with his wife's mere step father to defraud her brother without the slightest inducement of danger or profit to himself.

The court below, without deciding 118 whether Hunter *was liable to pay the amount he had received upon the bond, directed a commissioner of the court to take an account of what Hunter had received, and also an account of what the plaintiffs had paid as sureties of Nathaniel Thompson as guardian of George Pottie. This report was returned, showing that Hunter had received nine thousand eight hundred and twenty-six dollars and fifty-seven cents. That Garland Thompson's administrator had paid one thousand seven hundred and eighty dollars and twenty-four cents; and Lawrence's administrator had paid one thousand eight hundred and twelve dollars and eighty-one cents. The first sum was received by Hunter prior to February 22d, 1842; and the payments were made by the representatives of Garland Thompson and Lawrence prior to September 2d, 1843.

The cause came on to be finally heard in April 1848, when the court made a decree by which Hunter was directed to pay to the plaintiffs respectively the sums reported by the commissioner to have been paid by them, with interest from the time the money was paid, and their costs. And from this decree Hunter applied to this court for an appeal, which was allowed.

Morson, for the appellant:

There is no case in the books in which a party has been charged with constructive fraud, where there was no earmark on the subject dealt for, upon the ground of some latent equity. In this case Hunter stands as the purchaser of this bond for full value, without notice of any equity in George Pottie. And on this question I refer particularly to the case of Jones v. Powles, 10 Cond. Eng. Ch. R. 310. That was a case of real estate, but this is personalty; and if we look to the law applicable to this species of property, we find as to bills of exchange, the holder for value is not affected 119 *even by crassa negligentia; but that actual fraud is necessary. Goodman v. Harvey, 31 Eng. C. L. R. 212.

We insist, then, that to subject a purchaser for value to a latent equity, there must be more than gross negligence; there must be fraud. This principle is directly applicable to the subject involved in this case; and in all the cases decided in this court the principle of the decisions is that there must be not only proof of a breach of trust by the trustee, but proof of notice of such breach by the party dealing with him. In other words, there must be fraud. Dodson v. Simpson, 2 Rand. 294; Graff v. Castleman, 5 Rand. 195; Broadus v. Rosson, 3 Leigh 12; Fisher v. Bassett, 9 Leigh 119; Pinckard v. Woods, 8 Gratt. 140. The first of these cases can only be sustained on the ground that the party dealing with the executor must have notice not only of the trust but of its breach, before he can be held responsible; and in the other cases, all of them, the decision is founded on the principle that the party dealing with the trustee was conscious of his misconduct.

In this case Mrs. Hunter was entitled to receive from the executor of her father more than the amount of this bond; and six thousand dollars was in fact paid by him to her guardian; and this guardian received in right of his wife, from the same executor, fifteen thousand dollars; and these sums were received in bonds. The presumption therefore is, as the fact is, that Hunter had no notice that this particular bond belonged to George Pottie; and that omnis ritæ acta. If then Hunter may ex equo et bono retain this money, the equities are equal; and the equities being equal melior est conditio defendentis, aut possidentis. But in fact the equities are not equal. The assignment of this bond to Hunter was in 1825; and then Thompson was in good circumstances, and so continued until 1840, without any notice to Hunter in all that time that part of Pottie to obtain from Thompson his guardian, his estate.
120 *he had been dealing with a trust subject, and without any effort on the

Patton, for the appellees:

It would be very uncandid in me to attempt to show that there was actual fraud in Mr. Hunter, or even in Nathaniel Thompson, in this transaction. But in making the transfer of this bond Thompson was guilty of a gross breach of trust. It is true that this is not a suit by a ward against his guardian; and it is also true that this attempt to subject Hunter has not been made until seventeen years after the transaction complained of, and seven years after George Pottie came of age. But it is also true that in a much stronger case against the relief sought, this court held the purchaser responsible, and that too at the suit of the sureties of the executor. Pinckard v. Woods, 8 Gratt. 140. In that case the delay was nearly as great. The executor was amply solvent at the time, and continued in good credit for years. He was moreover a legatee of one moiety of the estate, which owed no debts; and the bonds sold were less than his interest in the estate. Here it was not a sale by the guardian to a bona fide purchaser for value; nor was it a pledge for money advanced at the time: And not even Hardwicke and Mansfield can satisfy this court that there is no distinction between these cases and a transfer or pledge by the guardian for the payment of his own debt. Hardwicke refers to the only principle upon which a purchase of trust property can be countenanced in a court of equity: That is, that the trustee has the legal title and power of sale; and a purchaser who deals with him in good faith is entitled to presume he is exercising his power in good faith. But when the trust property is not disposed of by a sale, as was the case in Pinckard v.

121 Woods, but to discharge a debt of the trustee, the party dealing with *him takes upon himself the burden of showing that the trustee had a right so to deal with the property.

There could be no doubt in this case of Hunter's liability, if the bond showed upon its face that it belonged to George Pottie. There can be no doubt, after the decision of Pinckard v. Woods, that the guardian had no right to transfer a security which was safe, and leave only his own liability. But further. The fund was then put out just as the court would have directed if the guardian of Pottie had had the money in hand and had asked the directions of the court as to its investment. The court is referred to Field v. Schieffelin, 7 John. Ch. R. 150, for an able review of the authorities on this subject.

The only ground upon which Hunter can stand with any hope of success, is, that the security had no earmark, and that he was a purchaser for value without notice. But in the nature of things there were circumstances which should have awakened suspicion; though I do not say that it did awaken the suspicion of Hunter. Nathaniel Thompson had been the guardian of Mrs. Hunter ever since the death of her father; and Hunter, as clerk of the County court of Louisa, was bound to know that Thompson ought to have invested her estate. When then Thompson told him he had a bond which he was about to collect for the purpose of paying him, he should have known that he had been misapplying her property; and should therefore have suspected that he was about to misapply George Pottie's. He knew that Sandridge's account as guardian of Pottie had been settled, and recorded in his office, though he had never examined the settlement; and therefore he might readily have ascertained to whom this bond belonged.

But further. To entitle himself to the defence of a purchaser for value without notice, he must have acquired 122 *the legal title. But neither the legal nor equitable title to this bond was in Nathaniel Thompson. The legal title was in the executor of George Pottie the elder; and the equitable title was in George Pottie, junior. The bond was transferred, not assigned, by the executor to Sandridge the first guardian of George Pottie, junior; and in the account of Sandridge he is charged and credited with the amount.

I do not mean to say that the guardian could not sell the property of his ward, even a bond, to pay debts, or that he could not collect choses in action. But I do mean to say he cannot transfer it to pay his own debt: And the only principle on which the sale is sustained in any of these cases, is that the trustee has power to sell, and that the purchaser is not bound to enquire further. In this case the guardian had no greater power to dispose of the bond than the slaves of his ward. Could he have paid his debt to Hunter by transferring to him Pottie's slaves, which came into his possession in the same way that the bond came? Would not the slaves be still considered and held to be the slaves of Pottie? Suppose that instead of transferring the slaves at a valuation he had given a deed of trust upon them to secure Hunter's debt, would that have been valid?

I take it that a guardian has no legal title to the property of his ward; though he has the legal power to control, and as to the personal property, to sell. But as I have before said, Thompson had neither the legal nor equitable title to this bond. It and the trust to secure it, were given for money loaned by John Thompson as executor of George Pottie the elder to Winston. Mr. Hunter was bound to know all these papers disclosed. They did not show any title in Nathaniel Thompson; but they showed that they were the property of the testator of his wards: And Hunter had no right to suppose that the bond 123 came to *Thompson as his own property. He does not say in his answer that he supposed it came to Thompson in right of his wife: And if he had said so, what right had he to suppose it. I submit that when he saw that this bond and deed of trust had been a part of the estate of George Pottie the elder, and knew that others beside himself were interested in that estate, it was gross laches in him not to enquire how Nathaniel Thompson acquired it. Mr. Hunter excuses himself for this neglect by saying that Thompson was about to collect the money. But if he had collected it, he had no more right to pay the money than he had to transfer the bond: And he had no right to collect the bond because it was then put out as it ought to have been. It was the money of George Pottie received by Mr. Hunter without any authority to receive it, and an action for money had and received might have been maintained for it.

The court is referred to American Leading Cases, p. 300, for a collection of the authorities as to agents, showing that the transfer by one partner improperly does not transfer the title; and to Fisher v. Bassett, 9 Leigh 119; in which the only objection was the sale of the bonds at a discount. Is that worse than to dispose of the whole subject to the trustee's own use?

Robinson, for the appellant, in reply:

Nathaniel Thompson was solvent in 1824, as is proved by his giving security as guardian, and by his deposition; and by the conduct of these parties in lying by for fifteen years after the transfer of the bond to Hunter: And he continued solvent until 1840. These parties, by signing the bond, give the best evidence of his solvency and trustworthiness. Hunter was married in 1825; and within a fortnight afterwards, being at the house of his wife's guardian and step father, this guardian, without any prompting, tells Hunter what 124 *he proposes to do to pay him his wife's fortune; and the arrangement for the transfer of this bond is made, as detailed in the evidence.

Then what is the attitude of these plaintiffs? They say we vouch for Thompson's trustworthiness; and they bind themselves for his acts; and now they seek to subject a man for their relief, who they admit has been guilty of no fraud, of no breach of trust; and who never vouched in any way for the acts of Thompson. But it is said the circumstances should have excited his suspicions, and have prompted him to enquire into the true ownership of the bond. We say he did only what every gentleman would have done; even the most learned in the law either of this bar or bench. And the question is whether a man who thus acted is to be deprived of this subject as having been guilty of fraud: For that is the only ground on which he can be deprived of it.

It is said that Thompson was so in possession of this subject; that he had neither the legal or equitable title to it. It is true that the executor of George Pottie the elder owned the bond at one time; but he had parted with it. A creditor of the testator could not have followed it in the purchaser's hands. Whale v. Booth, 26 Eng. C. L. R.

210. The executor had a right to transfer the bond and did transfer it in a regular and proper manner. He could not be expected to assign it so as to bind himself; and he could not bind the estate. The delivery to Sandridge passed the property in the bond to him; and the delivery by his administrator passed it to Thompson. 1 Lomax on Ex'ors 276; Ewing v. Ewing, 2 Leigh 337. If the bond had gotten out of his possession, detinue or trover might have been maintained by Thompson for its recovery. It is true a transferee could not sue upon it in his own name. And so in England now neither an assignee nor transferee could sue in his own name.

125 But *a court of law recognizes his right and will not permit that right to be defeated by the assignor. Welch v. Mandeville, 1 Wheat. R. 233; Heath v. Hall, 4 Taunt. R. 326; Kimball v. Huntington, 10 Wend. R. 675; Wilson v. Coupland, 7 Eng. C. L. R. 77.

It is argued that this bond was appropriated as the property of the ward George Pottie, and in that character went into the hands of Thompson. To the extent that the ward had a right to this bond the guardian had absolute control over it. Field v. Schieffelin, 7 John. Ch. R. 150. The doctrine of this case was recognized by this court in the case of The Bank of Va. v. Craig, 6 Leigh 399. In this last case the subject was bank stock; and if the power of control and sale exists as to bank stock, it must exist as to state stock or debt; and if so as to state debts, it must equally exist as to the debts of individuals.

In this case there is no question that whatever passed by the transfer of the bond to Sandridge passed to Thompson by the transfer to him. He might have sued upon it in the name of the executor of George Pottie the elder, and could not have been hindered by that executor from prosecuting that suit and collecting the money. And as we have seen that the guardian has the right to dispose of the ward's estate for value, the assignee for value is entitled to the protection extended to a purchaser for value without notice; and Jones v. Poules, 10 Cond. Eng. Ch. R. 310, applies.

The facts in this case abundantly show that Hunter could have no reasonable ground of suspicion that Thompson was dealing improperly with a trust subject. And as in The Bank of Va. v. Craig, there was no mala fides and no motive of gain. He had Thompson and his sureties, who were of undoubted credit, bound to him. He might lose, but could not possibly gain. If he had not taken the bond he would have proceeded at once against them.

126 these plaintiffs *having delayed to question the transfer of the bond to him for much more than ten years, the sureties are now protected by the statute of limitations.

As these plaintiffs insist upon the enforcement of the strict rules of law, they must be bound by it. In Mead v. Ld. Orrery, 3 Atk. R. 235, the lord chancellor said he did not know any instance where an assignment has been made by an executor for a valuable consideration, that it had been set aside unless some fraud appeared between the executor and assignee. And to this effect was Ewer v. Corbet, 2 P. Wms. 148. The plaintiffs must therefore prove the fraud. The bill is indeed sweeping in its charges. But they are all denied in the answer and disproved by the evidence.

It is said that this bond was in fact the property of George Pottie, junior. Be it so. But do they show collusion between Hunter and the guardian? That is disproved. Did he have either means of knowing or reason to suspect that it was the property of George Pottie, junior? The only fact from which this suspicion could have arisen is, that Thompson transferred this bond to pay his own debt. The argument is that Hunter must know what the bond and deed showed; and then he must know all that he might have known. This argument has been tried before; Williams v. Nixon, 17 Eng. Ch. R. 473; and was repudiated by Lord Langdale. The bond shows that it was given to the executor of George Pottie the elder. The deed shows no more. And the proofs are that Thompson received in bonds from this executor fifteen thousand dollars in right of his wife, and six thousand dollars as guardian of Mrs. Hunter. It is said Hunter does not say he supposed the bond to have been taken as a part of his wife's fortune. He says he supposed it was Thompson's; and as he must have known that Thompson had received from the executor twenty-one thousand dollars in bonds, he might 127 therefore *well believe, when he saw Thompson treating this bond as his own, that it was his own in fact.

The whole question then is, whether the transfer of the bond by Thompson in payment of a debt of his own is of itself sufficient to subject Hunter, however innocent he may be of any participation or knowledge or suspicion of Thompson's breach of trust. On this question I refer the court to Rayner v. Pearsal, 3 John. Ch. R. 378; Petrie v. Clark, 11 Serg. & Rawle 377; Nugent v. Gifford, 1 Atk. R. 463; Bedford v. Woodham, 4 Ves. R. 40, in note. These cases show that the transfer of a bond in payment of a private debt of an executor or guardian is not fraud, unless it is shown affirmatively that the transferee knew it was a trust subject. And this doctrine has been recognized by this court in the case of Dodson v. Simpson, 2 Rand. 294. And the explanation of those cases in which such an assignment has been held invalid, is that such assignment was only important when it showed a knowledge on the part of the assignee, that the character in which the assignor held it did not authorize him to use it as he did. Scott v. Tyler, referred to in McLeod v. Drummond, 14 Ves. R. 353. In the cases in this court where such an assignment was held invalid, there were circumstances which brought home knowledge to the assignee, or should have satisfied him that the trustee was dealing improperly with a trust subject: and in all of them he knew positively that the subject dealt with was a trust subject. Such were the cases of Graff v. Castleman, 5 Rand. 195; Broadus v. Rosson, 3 Leigh 12; Fisher v. Bassett, 9 Leigh 119; and Pinckard v. Woods, 8 Gratt. 140. In this last important particular these cases are broadly distinguishable from the case now before the court.

It is asked whether if Thompson, instead of transferring this bond, had transferred Pottie's slaves, or made a deed of trust upon them to secure his debt to 128 *Hunter, it would have been valid.

Such a conveyance from its nature would convey the slaves of some person; if his own it would be decisive to show he could not convey the slaves of his ward; if on the face of the deed he conveyed the slaves of Pottie, this would bring home knowledge to the grantee and would not be allowed. A guardian, believing it to be for the interest of his ward, sells his slave. Under such a sale the purchaser for value takes the legal title, and will be protected. Then suppose Thompson had sold Pottie's slaves as his own to Hunter: Hunter would have taken the legal title; and if he bought them without knowledge that they were the slaves of Pottie, he would hold them against all claimants. It may be difficult to sell and buy such a subject without knowledge; and if there were circumstances which should have led the purchaser to suspect a misapplication of the ward's estate, of course the title would fail. But this is the only distinction between slaves and bonds.

Then here are two innocent parties, one of which must suffer; and the question is, which of them? We say the sureties. They undertake for the guardian and vouch for his trustworthiness. They are the security which the law has provided for the ward. The guardian having power to transfer the bond; and this having been done so as to pass the title, it then becomes a question of equity; and every man's moral sense will say that it is not unconscientious for Hunter to retain this money.

The principle of substitution cannot be extended further in such cases as this, than where there has been fraud on the part of the purchaser. Sureties may be expected to exercise some supervision over the guardian, and may be relieved by applying for further security. But the assignee is without redress. At all events, there is nothing in this case to induce the court to extend the principle of the cases relied on; in others this is unnecessary; and these cases of implied trust belong to the latter class. It is argued that Pottie might have maintained an action for money had and received, if it had not been barred by the statute. If Pottie was barred by the statute, how can these sureties be substituted to his rights? If he is barred, they are barred. And if such an action could have been maintained, then that is conclusive against this bill.

SAMUELS, J. Nathaniel Thompson, as guardian, was in possession of Winston's bond, as part of the estate of George Pottie his ward. Whatever interest the ward had therein was subject to the guardian's control; he might have received the money due thereon if voluntarily paid; he might have sued for it in a common law court in the name of John Thompson, executor of George Pottie the obligee, but for his own use as guardian; and the nominal plaintiff would have had no power to prevent the prosecution of the suit, or to prevent the collection of the money for the use of the guardian; or he might have sold and transferred the bond. But in any exercise of his authority the guardian must, at his peril, have acted with proper discretion, in reference to the ward's interest. It is for the benefit of the ward himself that the guardian should, if possible, be regarded as having the legal title to the ward's personal estate. That title may be essential to the protection of the property itself; the guardian is responsible for its safe 130 keeping, and it *would be unjust to deny him the means which may be the only effective means of discharging his duty. In Garland v. Richeson, 4 Rand. 206, it was held that an assignee of a bond acquired no legal title to the debt; and it follows a fortiori that a mere transferee acquires no legal title. Yet we have seen that the transferee may in a common law court recover the money; and that the supposed holder of the legal title cannot interfere to prevent such collection. It is obvious that John Thompson, the holder of the legal title, and the obligee in this bond, could not recover the money due if the holder sued for his own use, or the bond itself in detinue, or its value in trover. It is difficult to understand a legal title thus shorn of the rights usually conferred thereby. It is enough, however, for the purposes of this case, to decide that Nathaniel Thompson the guardian was invested with such title as was the subject of sale; whether legal or equitable; or partly legal and partly equitable; or equitable in form, but legal in effect.

The interest of the ward requires that his guardian should have the power to sell his personal estate. Under certain circumstances, readily conceived, an immediate expenditure of money might be indispensable to protect the estate against loss; the guardian might find that the best mode, or only mode, of raising the money, was by a sale of bonds belonging to the ward's estate. Under such circumstances, a delay for collection might be injurious or even ruinous to the ward's fortune. It is no valid objection to allowing the guardian this power, to say, it may be abused: Every power, however necessary, may be abused. The objection would apply to every case in which one party is entrusted with the property of another. This power is justified by the reason and fitness of things, and is moreover well sustained by authority.

In Truss v. Old, 6 Rand. 556, Judge
131 Green, speaking *of guardians, says, "their authority is coupled with a legal interest, and is not barely in office." "It is an interest like that of a trustee for the separate use of a married woman, an executor in trust, or an administrator of an estate of which there is no surplus after the payment of debts; all of whom have a legal without any beneficial interest." Judge Green expresses the further opinion that the guardian has power to sell his ward's personal estate.

In Bank of Virginia v. Craig, 6 Leigh 399, 426, Judge Carr says, "The power and legal title of Fox (the guardian) to dispose of the stock (the ward's property), is proved by many cases." And in this opinion Judges Brockenbrough and Cabell concurred. In the same case, p. 428, Judge Tucker says, "It is conceded also, that, as a general rule, a guardian has power to dispose of the personal estate of his ward; and though personally responsible for so doing, the vendee to whom he sells is not responsible if he has dealt fairly and justly, and without notice of any fraudulent intent."

In Field v. Schieffelin, 7 John. Ch. R. 150, Chancellor Kent considers the question of a guardian's power to sell his ward's personal estate; and comes to a like conclusion with our own courts.

Holding then on the general question, that the guardian in this case had the power to sell, the question recurs, did he exercise his power within the limits and for the purposes prescribed by law? The answer is plain, that he did not; he used his power for his own individual benefit, by appropriating the ward's property to pay his (the guardian's) own debt. This was a breach of trust, a fraud upon his ward. So far as the case of the appellees depends upon the conduct of Thompson the guardian, it is fully made out.

A recovery, however, cannot be had 132 against Hunter, *without showing his liability: The mere fraud of the guardian is not sufficient of itself, under all circumstances, to invalidate his transactions with innocent parties. In this case Hunter took the bond on Winston of Thompson, who concealed the right in which he held it, and passed it off as his own property: It was taken at par, in part payment of a debt, which was amply secured. Hunter was not induced, by any hope of profit or fear of loss, to take the transfer. His only purpose was to receive a debt justly due, by a mode of payment convenient to both parties. In the argument of the case here it was properly conceded by the appellees' counsel, that Hunter did not in fact know that Thompson's title was imperfect; but he contended that as the bond on its face was payable to John Thompson, executor of George Pottie, it showed that at one time other parties were interested, and might still be interested therein; that if Hunter had used proper caution he would have enquired further; and upon such enquiry would have ascertained the right in which Thompson held the bond: That he must be held liable as he would be if he had procured the information which he might and ought to have obtained. In reply, it may be said that the money due Hunter's wife, and which he was about to receive at the hands of her late guardian, was a legacy given by the will of George Pottie, of which John Thompson was the executor. That Nathaniel Thompson, the guardian, in right of his wife, a legatee in Pottie's will, had received fifteen thousand dollars of the executor on account of that legacy: that these two legacies had been paid wholly or in part by the transfer of paper belonging to Pottie's estate. Under these circumstances, when the guardian proposed to transfer as his own a bond payable to Pottie's executor, Hunter might well suppose he had full right to do so: any 133 man of ordinary prudence *would have been satisfied that all was right. Hunter must therefore be acquitted of any constructive fraud, as well as of actual fraud.

George Pottie the ward, and Hunter the purchaser for value without notice, are the victims of Thompson's fraud; and in settling the question of loss between them the court should proceed upon the general principles of equity. If the equities be equal, the court will not interfere; or if one party have the advantage at law, equity will not interfere to deprive him of that advantage, unless in favor of a party having superior equity. Trying the case by these tests, we must hold that Hunter's equity is equal to that of George Pottie; a purchaser for value, without notice of fraud in his vendor, stands upon as high ground in equity, as any creditor, or cestui que trust.

Again. Thompson's transfer to Hunter gave him the power at law to receive the money if paid by Winston, and to give him a valid discharge; or to sue for it in a common law court in the name of Thompson the executor, for his own use, and to recover it without the possibility of interference by the nominal plaintiff or any other party. Although Hunter may not have had the legal title to the debt, yet such were his rights and powers at law. In the exercise of his right he has received the money, and thereby acquitted Winston of all further liability therefor. To hold him responsible to George Pottie, we must deprive him of the advantage given by his legal power and right. To arrive at such a result, we must overturn all the decisions of the courts upon cases of the same or like kind.

In Broadus v. Rosson, 3 Leigh 12, the parties dealing with the guardian were fully aware of his breach of trust, and actively co-operated with him therein for their own benefit; and for that reason were held liable.

134 *In Dodson v. Simpson, 2 Rand. 294, the party dealing with an executor was apprised of his breach of trust, and aided him therein; and was therefore held accountable.

In Fisher v. Bassett, 9 Leigh 119, a party knowingly dealing with an administrator, who in breach of his trust was applying the assets of the estate to his own use, was held responsible.

In Pinckard v. Woods, 8 Gratt. 140, a party, for his own profit, knowingly dealing with an executor in such way as to enable the executor to commit a devastavit, was made liable.

In each of these cases, and in many if not all others of like kind, the party dealing with the fiduciary has been held responsible, because and only because of his co-operation in the fraud. In our case this ruling fact does not exist. I am therefore of opinion that George Pottie had no right to draw Hunter in question for his dealing with Thompson the guardian.

If George Pottie had no right to recover of Hunter, the appellees, claiming to be substituted to his rights, can have no right to recover. If, however, the case were otherwise between Pottie and Hunter, till, under the circumstances of this case, the appellees should not be permitted to subject the appellant to any liability. The intestates of the appellees respectively bound themselves by bond as securities for Thompson as guardian; and in 1825, when this bond was in full force, their principal committed the breach of its condition which is complained of in this suit. At that time the securities might have guarded themselves against all loss by using a small degree of diligence. They owed it to themselves and to the ward, to see that the guardian, who obtained possession of the ward's estate by means of their credit, faithfully performed his trust; they should at least have taken care, when the ward attained full age, that the guardian 135 *fulfilled his duty. Instead of this, however, they allowed the guardian to retain the estate for fifteen years without question. At the end of that time, and eight years after the ward had become of full age, the guardian becoming insolvent, the securities are compelled to pay the amount of the ward's estate in the guardian's hands. From 1825, when the bond was transferred to Hunter, to 1840, Thompson was perfectly solvent, and could have paid his ward if required to do so; yet the securities, confiding in Thompson's integrity and resources for indemnity, permitted him to retain the money without question. The loss resulting from the misplaced confidence of the securities should be borne by their estates; they trusted first, and they trusted last; they are asking relief against a party who is at least as innocent as themselves, and whose conscience is in nowise touched by their claim: he should not be held liable.

I am of opinion to reverse the decree and dismiss the bill, with costs of both courts to the appellant.

April Term, 1854, Richmond.

1. Riparian Lands—Boundary—Case at Bar.—By statute, the general assembly of Virginia agree to cede to the United States the soil and jurisdiction to the extent of two hundred and fifty acres at Old Point Comfort, for the purpose of fortification and other objects of national defence, and authorize the governor to convey the land by deed to the United States. The land is a peninsula bounded by Chesapeake bay, Hampton roads and Mill creek. The governor directs a survey of the land to enable him to convey, and directs the surveyor to lay off the two hundred and fifty acres as the United States shall elect to take it. The surveyor returns a plat and report, in which he says that the United States elected to take by high-water mark, and he gives the courses and distances, commencing at a point at high-water mark, and running nearly coincident with high-water mark except where it runs from Mill creek to the bay, and in that course it stops on the bay at high-water mark. The deed takes the description by course and distance from the report, but does not refer to it in terms. HELD:

1. Same—Same—Evidence of—Case at Bar.—That in determining the boundaries of the land ceded to the United States, the act, the report and the deed are all to be looked to in order to ascertain what boundary was intended.

2. Same—Same—Same—Same.—Looking to the act, the report and the deed, the intention was to convey by the high-water mark, and that is the boundary of the conveyance.

3. Same—Conveyance to High-Water Mark—What Passes.†—That under the act, 1 Rev. Code of 1891,

Riparian Lands—Boundary—Evidence of.—See principal case cited in Carter v. Railway Co., 26 W. Va. 655.

†Riparian Lands—Conveyance to High-Water Mark—What Passes.—In Shively v. Bowlby, 152 U. S. 1, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 557, it was said: "In Virginia, by virtue of statutes beginning in 1679, the owner of land bounded by tide waters has the title to ordinary low-water mark, and the right to build wharves, provided they do not obstruct navigation. 5 Op. Attys. Gen. 412, 435-440; French v. Bankhead, 11 Gratt. 136, 159-161; Hardy v. McCullough, 23 Gratt. 231, 262;

ch. 87, p. 341, the conveyance by the high-water mark boundary passed to the United States the soil and jurisdiction to the low-water mark.

2. Public Lands—Appropriation by Individuals.‡—The land at Old Point Comfort had been appropriated by legislative enactments, to the public use; and it was not therefore subject to be appropriated by individuals as waste and unappropriated land, by entry and patent.

This was an action of ejectment in the Circuit court of Elizabeth City county, brought by James S. French against General James Bankhead, the officer of the Norfolk City v. Cooke, 27 Gratt. 430, 434, 435; Garrison v. Hall, 75 Va. 150."

See the principal case also cited and approved in McDonald v. Whitehurst, 47 Fed. Rep. 768.

In Ravenswood v. Flemings, 22 W. Va. 67, the court, after quoting at some length from the principal case, said that the statute in question applied only to "the Atlantic Ocean, Chesapeake Bay and the rivers and creeks thereof," and that it was intended to have no application whatever to the Ohio river. The court in this case held that riparian owners of land on the banks of the Ohio river had no title as against the state of West Virginia beyond ordinary high-water mark, that the title to the bed, the shores and banks to ordinary high-water mark was in the state of West Virginia for the use of the public.

And in Barre v. Flemings, 29 W. Va. 319, 1 S. E. Rep. 735, it was said: "In French v. Bankhead, 11 Gratt. 136, it was held 'that under the act (1 Rev. Code 1819, ch. 87, p. 341) the conveyance by the high-water mark boundary passed to the United States the soil and jurisdiction to the low-water mark.' This case, however, being controlled by a statute relating only to the tide-water section of Virginia, cannot be treated as authority on the question now before us. This is also true as to the case of Norfolk City v. Cooke, 27 Gratt. 430." In this case it was held that the riparian proprietors of land bounded on the Ohio river, in the state of West Virginia, own the fee in the lands to low-water mark, subject to the easement of the public in that portion lying between high and low-water mark, with the right of the state to control the same, for the purposes of navigation and commerce, without compensation to the owner. See pp. 738, 739, where the court reviews the case of Ravenswood v. Flemings, and states what it considers the real decision in that case.

In Norfolk City v. Cooke, 27 Gratt. 433, the principal case was cited along with Home v. Richards, 4 Call 441-449; Mead v. Haynes, 8 Rand. 33-36, and certain sections of the Code, as authority for the proposition that the bed of a navigable river is incapable of being granted to an individual.

See the principal case also cited in Garrison v. Hall, 75 Va. 161; Groner v. Foster, 94 Va. 657, 27 S. E. Rep. 493; Waverly, etc., Co. v. White, 97 Va. 179, 33 S. E. Rep. 534. In this last case, the court said: "French v. Bankhead is a very strong case. It was decided in 1854 by a unanimous court, and has never been questioned to this day."

‡Lands—Liable to Location.—In Garrison v. Hall, 75 Va. 154, it was said: "As a general rule it was held in French v. Bankhead, 11 Gratt. 136-168, that 'all lands which had never before been patented are to be considered as waste and unappropriated, and are liable to location by any holder of a treasury warrant.'"

United States in common at Fortress Monroe. The *facts are stated in the opinion of the court delivered by Judge Allen.

It will be seen from the statement of facts that French's patent purports to commence at the southeast corner of Mill creek bridge, the beginning corner in the deed from the governor of the state of Virginia, conveying to the United States two hundred and fifty acres of land at Old Point Comfort; and it calls for the lines of the United States land from that point along Mill creek: And the great question in the cause was, whether the United States held by a water boundary which gave them the land to low water mark, or whether their title was limited to the lines of their deed which were intended to be and were substantially conformable to high water mark? Another question was, whether the land covered by the patent of French was waste and unappropriated land subject to entry and survey?

After all the evidence had been introduced, the plaintiff asked the court to instruct the jury:

1st. That if the jury shall be of opinion that the deed executed by David Campbell, the governor of Virginia, to the United States, was actually executed by him, as the conveyance in writing which he was authorized by the act of March 1st, 1821, to make, of soil and jurisdiction to the United States, and was accepted and received by the United States as the conveyance in writing which was to be executed by the governor of Virginia to convey soil and jurisdiction under the said act of March 1st, 1821, then said deed is to be taken as the agreement of the commonwealth of Virginia and of the United States, of what should be the boundary of the territory so ceded; and in ascertaining what the boundaries are as so ceded, and in ascertaining what the boundaries are as made by the said deed, the jury are to construe the said deed by the words and terms to be found in the *deed itself; and cannot vary, alter or add to the words of the deed by any extrinsic evidence, or evidence without the deed itself.

2d. If in construing the deed and applying it to the land, the subject of the grant, by the descriptive calls of the deed, any ambiguity should arise, then the jury must be governed in solving such ambiguity, by the descriptive calls used in the deed itself; but evidence derived from matters without the deed, may be used to explain the terms or words used in the deed, and apply them to identify the land granted; but cannot be used to change the terms or words of the deed, or make an agreement for a boundary not called for in the descriptive words of the deed.

3d. That in law a distinction exists between a boundary by courses and distances and a high water mark. When courses and distances alone are called for in the deed, and high water mark is not called for therein, then as a matter of legal construction the deed is an agreement to make the boundary a boundary by courses and distances, and not by high water mark.

These instructions the court refuse to give. There was a fourth instruction asked for by the plaintiff, which was given; and which it is not necessary to state.

The defendant asked for five instructions to the jury, the first of which the court refused to give: The other four were as follows:

2d. If the jury believe from the evidence that the agent of the United States at the time of the survey in 1838, elected the line of high water as the boundary of the lands of the United States on the Chesapeake bay, Hampton roads and Mill creek, and that the lines run by the surveyor were designed to correspond generally with said high water line, and did so correspond generally; and that the courses and distances mentioned in the deed from the governor of 139 *Virginia to the United States, are the courses and distances of the lines so run, then the boundary of said lands is a water boundary, notwithstanding the courses and distances called for in said deed. And the water boundary so established extends, by virtue of the act of assembly then and still in force, to the ordinary low water mark; and consequently the plaintiff acquired no title by his patent, to any lands described therein which lie above the ordinary low water mark.

3d. The lands covered by Mill creek at ordinary high tide were not patentable at the time the plaintiff obtained the patent under which he claims in this case; and the said patent therefor gave the plaintiff no title to such lands; and as to all such lands embraced by the said patent, the jury should find for the defendant.

4th. The lands between high water mark and ordinary low water mark, were not subject to entry at the time of the entry on which the plaintiff's patent is founded. And if the jury believe from the evidence that any part of the lands covered by the said patent lie between ordinary high water mark and ordinary low water mark, then as to such lands the plaintiff acquired no title by said patent; and the jury as to such lands should find for the defendant.

5th. The lands at the Old Point Comfort, extending to low water mark on the Chesapeake bay, Hampton roads and Mill creek, were not liable to entry as waste and unappropriated lands at the date of the entry on which the plaintiff's patent is founded. And if the jury believe from the evidence that the lands covered by the said patent, or any part thereof, are part of the lands known as Old Point Comfort, then the plaintiff acquired by his patent no title to such lands or any part thereof, above the ordinary low water mark; and as to all such lands embraced by said patent, the jury should find for the defendant.

140 *These instructions the court gave.

And to the opinion of the court refusing to give the three first instructions asked for by him, and giving the four last instructions asked for by the defendant, the plaintiff excepted. There was a verdict and judgment for the defendant; whereupon French applied to this court for a superseas, which was allowed.

The case was most elaborately argued by Baxter and Cox, for the appellant, and Joynes and Lyons, for the appellee.

For the appellant, it was insisted:

1st. That the deed was the exponent of the agreement between the state of Virginia and the United States; and could alone be looked to, to ascertain what were the boundaries of the land thereby conveyed. As mediately or immediately bearing on this question, they referred to The People v. Godfrey, 17 John. R. 225; United States v. Bevans, 3 Wheat. R. 336; Broom's Maxims 266, 267, 50 Law Libr.; Dwarris on Statutes 22, 9 Law Libr.; 1 Philips' Evi. 538, 548; Miller v. Travers, 21 Eng. C. L. R. 288; McIver v. Walker, 9 Cranch's R. 173; S. C. 4 Wheat. R. 444; Chinoweth v. Haskell, 3 Peters' R. 92; Howard v. Ingersoll, 13 How. S. C. R. 381; Decatur v. Paulding, 14 Peters' R. 497; Foster v. Neilson, 2 Peters' R. 253.

2d. That the deed not calling for a water boundary, but a boundary by courses and distances, the United States is not entitled to claim by a water boundary, though in fact the courses and distances called for in the deed are coincident with the high water mark. On this question they referred to Rutherford's Inst. 463-4-5; Schutz on Aquatic Rights 117, 122, 125, 24 Law Libr.; Hargrave's Law Tracts, 12, 14, 15, 25, 26, 31, 32, 35, 36; The King v. Ld. Yarborough, 3 *Barn. & Cress. 91, 10

Eng. C. L. R. 19; Livingston's Argument in the Battuer Case; Houston v. Moore, 5 Wheat. R. 49; Commonwealth v. Clary, 8 Mass. R. 72; Harris v. Elliott, 10 Peters' R. 25.

3d. That if the deed was to be construed as conveying by the high water mark line, it did not operate to convey to low water mark. That whatever may be the general law of Virginia on the question, yet that the United States could only take, and did take, under a special act of the general assembly limiting the amount to be taken to two hundred and fifty acres; and that all the proceedings by the executive showed that it was only intended to convey this quantity of land; and that it was intended to limit the conveyance by the boundaries stated in the deed.

4th. That it was not competent for the United States, which showed neither title to, nor occupancy which could ripen into title by adversary possession of the lands in controversy, to question the validity of the appellant's title. Code of 1849, p. 428; Warwick v. Norvell, 1 Rob. R. 308; Jackson v. Johnson, 1 Bibb's R. 58; Sutton v. Menser, 6 B. Monr. R. 433; Polk's lessee v. Wendell, 9 Cranch's R. 87; S. C. 5 Wheat. R. 293; Norvell v. Camm, 6 Munf. 233.

That by the law of Virginia all waste and unappropriated lands are subject to entry and grant by patent. And that such are all lands which have not been patented.

Whittington v. Christian, 2 Rand. 353, 369, 371; McClung v. Hughes, 5 Rand. 453, 478-9, 488; Code of 1849, ch. 112, § 37, 38; Sess. Acts of 1850-51, p. 33, ch. 41, § 10.

And they referred to the various acts passed by the legislature from the year 1679 to the present time, in relation to the land at Old Point Comfort; and insisted that they were not excluded from the body of waste and unappropriated lands, which were subject to entry and grant.

142 *For the appellee, it was insisted:

1st. That the deed was not to be taken alone to ascertain what was to pass to the United States; but that the act which authorized it, and the report of the surveyor which was made by the directions of the executive of Virginia, and upon which the deed was founded, were all necessary steps in conferring title upon the United States; and were to be looked to, to ascertain what passed by the deed. And they referred to Handly v. Anthony, 5 Wheat. R. 374; Martin v. Waddell, 16 Peters' R. 367, 411; Howard v. Ingersoll, 13 How. S. C. R. 381, 412; Garner's Case, 3 Gratt. 655, as showing that this was a contract between independent states, and to be construed upon principles of international law. To show the principles upon which the contract should be construed, they referred to Vattel, book 2, ch. 3, § 152; Foster v. Neilson, 2 Peters' R. 253; Vattel, book 2, ch. 17, § 244; Wright v. Cartwright, 1 Burr. R. 285; Noy's Maxims 48, 50; Garner's Case, 3 Gratt. 655.

2d. That the deed was intended to convey, and did convey, by a water boundary, which by the law of Virginia carried the grant to low water mark: And they referred to the facts to show this. On this point they cited Handly v. Anthony, 5 Wheat. R. 367, 374; Howard v. Ingersoll, 13 How. S. C. R. 381, Curtis' opinion; Lesseur v. Price, 12 How. S. C. R. 59; Bruce v. Taylor, 2 J. J. 3d. That the land embraced in the patent of the appellant lying between high and low water mark, *was not subject to entry and patent as waste and unappropriated land. And they examined the various acts of assembly to show that the land between high and low water mark was not patentable; and that the land at Old Point Comfort was embraced in what are spoken of in the acts of assembly as public lands, as distinguished from waste and unappropriated lands. And they insisted that though it was true that a mere trespasser or intruder would not be allowed to question the validity of his adversary's title, yet that principle did not apply to a party in possession bona fide claiming title. And they referred to Whittington v. Christian, 2

ALLEN, P., delivered the opinion of the court:

By the terms of the federal constitution, the United States are bound to protect each state against invasion, and no state is authorized to keep troops in time of peace without the consent of congress. The duty of providing for the common defence being thus imposed upon the United States, and the erection and maintenance of fortifications being necessary and proper to perform this duty, the constitution confers upon congress the power to exercise jurisdiction over all places purchased by the consent of the legislature of the state in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, &c. &c. Having thus in a great measure surrendered the power of providing for her own protection against invasion, and her cost being exposed to aggression, the state of Virginia was called upon to cede to the United States places proper for the erection of forts, 144 so that the United States *might do that for the people of the state which she could not do herself.

On the 1st of March 1821, Sess. Acts, p. 102, an act was passed, entitled "an act ceding to the United States the lands on Old Point Comfort, and the shoal called Rip Raps." The preamble of the act recites, "that whereas it is shown to the present general assembly, that the government of the United States is solicitous that certain lands at Old Point Comfort, and at the shoal called the Rip Raps, should be, with the right of property and entire jurisdiction thereon, vested in the said United States for the purpose of fortification, and other objects of national defence." And it is then enacted, "That it shall be lawful and proper for the governor, by conveyance, to transfer, assign and make over unto the United States the right of property and title as well as all the jurisdiction which this commonwealth possesses over the lands and shoal at Old Point Comfort and the Rip Raps: provided the cession at Old Point Comfort shall not exceed two hundred and fifty acres, and the cession of the shoal at the Rip Raps shall not exceed fifteen acres: and provided also, that the cession shall not be construed or taken so as to prevent the officers of this state from executing any process, or discharging any other legal functions within the jurisdiction or territory herein directed to be ceded, nor to prevent, abolish or restrain the right and privilege of fishery hitherto enjoyed and used by the citizens of this commonwealth within the limits aforesaid: and provided further, that nothing in the deed of conveyance required by the first section of this act shall authorize the discontinuance of the present road to the fort, or in any manner prevent the pilots from erecting such marks and beacons as may be deemed necessary:" With a further provision, "that should the United States at any time 145 abandon the said *lands and shoal, or appropriate them to any other purposes than those indicated in the preamble to the said act, that then and in that case the same shall revert to and revest in the commonwealth."

The evidence in the record shows that surveys of part of the lands at Old Point Comfort had been made under the direction of the officers of the United States in 1816 or 1817, and in 1818. And the law, by the proviso preventing the discontinuance of the present road to the fort, seems to recognize the then existence of a fort, which must have been in possession of the United States. After the passage of the act the United States proceeded to erect an extensive fortification on the point, but no conveyance was made by the governor, nor so far as the record discloses, any measures taken to designate the precise boundaries of the land embraced by the cession, until the year 1838.

On the 16th of May 1838, a communication from the acting secretary of war was addressed to the governor, requesting him to make a conveyance in the manner prescribed by the provisions of said act, and for the maximum quantity of land contemplated to be ceded; and referring the governor to Captain W. A. Eliason, the bearer of the communication, as being authorized by the department of war to mark out to the surveyors or other persons acting for the commonwealth of Virginia, the boundaries which for purposes of defence should be given to said cession.

This officer, on the 22nd of May 1838, addressed a letter to the governor, in which he remarked, that the limits of the ceded territory at Old Point Comfort should include all the neck of land on which Fort Monroe is situated, from the bridge to the main land; and extend as far in the northerly direction as the plat of two hundred and fifty acres will allow; that he could not say 146 how far this would be, until he knew *how the law requires the survey lines to be run. That he believed the lines ought to include only the dry land at ordinary high water, and that the coterminal land from high to low water line pertained as a matter of course to the plotted land. He furthermore stated that the high tide limits could be readily defined; that it would not do to leave the land between high and low water in debate; it must attach to the land above tide; and it is to be desired that it does so without increasing the number of acres in the plot.

These papers were referred to the attorney general of the state, by the governor, for his opinion and advice. That officer, after stating that it did not appear from the papers before him, whether the commonwealth owned two hundred and fifty acres of land above high water, advised that all the commonwealth's lands should be layed off by metes and bounds; that then the surveyor should lay off, under the direction of the United States or its officers, so much of the public land, not exceeding two hundred and fifty acres, at Old Point, as they may require. That this land should be laid off by metes and bounds, the courses as well and durably marked as they could be. That the officers of the United States should elect whether they would have the whole survey laid off above high water mark; or whether they would include in its boundaries the lands below high water mark. On the return of the survey a conveyance should be made by metes and bounds. That the grant to the United States must be limited by the metes and bounds laid off, and they could not take either property or jurisdiction over the adjacent lands below high water mark as pertinent to the plotted land.

On the 1st of June 1838, the governor, as appears from an extract from the executive journal, directed the surveyor of Elizabeth City county, under the direction of 147 Captain Eliason, and in accordance with the *opinion of the attorney general, to make surveys of the lands and shoals mentioned in the act of cession, and return a fair plat and certificate of surveys to the executive. A survey was accordingly made by the surveyor, and a report returned to the governor. In the report so returned, the surveyor informs the governor that in pursuance of his directions, he applied to Captain Eliason to elect whether he would have the land ceded to the United States surveyed to high or low water mark; that he elected the former for the boundary, but requested the surveyor to spread the low water line, the mud flats and grass marsh on Mill creek, on the plat, which he had done. He further states that he began the survey at Old Point Comfort, at the southeast foot of the Mill creek bridge; and then pursued the ordinary high water mark on the Mill creek shore, until he came to the mouth of a small gut running up into the grass marsh. From thence he pursued a line between the high land and the marsh until he came to a piece of land taken up by Shelton. He then pursued this line, by a line of marked pines to the Chesapeake bay shore, at the ordinary high water; and then pursued the high water mark along the bay shore to the beginning; including an area of two hundred and seventy-eight acres one rood and ten poles, including also two acres ceded to the United States for a light-house. He then laid off two hundred and fifty-two acres for the United States, including the two acres for the light-house: and the report then gives the metes and bounds of the two hundred and fifty-two acres. The plat returned with the report shows that the land at the place described was a peninsula bounded on one side by the Chesapeake bay, on another by Hampton roads and Mill creek, having a water boundary all around the tract laid off for the United States, 148 except upon four *of the lines called for. Of these, three run parallel with, and on the edge of the high land and grass marsh, which is principally covered at high water, leaving but one line of sixty poles in length, which divides the part so laid off from the adjacent land. The report gives the boundaries, describing the survey as commencing at the southeast foot of Mill creek bridge, the position of which is designated on the plat; thence with the meanders of the creek to the mouth of a small gut running into the marsh overflowed by high tide in the creek. From this point three lines are called for; the first terminating at a dead pine on the line between the highland and the marsh; the second calls for a pine; the third calls merely for course and distance; and the plat returned shows that these three lines run between the high land and the marsh, on the edge of the marsh. From the termination of the last line on the edge of the marsh, the survey calls for a line of sixty poles to the bay shore at high water mark; and thence by various courses and distances to the beginning.

In the report, the surveyor says he pursued the high water mark along the bay shore to the beginning; and the fact that he did so appears from the plat returned. The meanderings of Mill creek are by fourteen courses, with distances on each course, amounting to five hundred and forty-nine poles; the three lines along the edge of the marsh call for one hundred and six poles; the line across the neck of land from the marsh to the bay shore at high water mark, is sixty poles in length; the meanderings of the bay and roads are by sixteen courses, with distances on each, amounting to 864.20 poles, making the whole distance around the two hundred and fifty-two acres one thousand five hundred and seventy-nine poles, of which one thousand five hundred and nineteen poles appear 149 from *the report and plat to have been a water boundary. The artificial boundaries made or marked and called for are the bridge, the dead pine and the pine. The natural objects named are the mouth of the small gut running into the marsh, and the bay shore at high water mark, at the termination of the line across the neck between the marsh and bay.

The deed made by the governor bears no date, but an extract from the executive journal, dated the 29th of November 1838, recites that the governor executed a deed of cession to the United States for the lands at Old Point Comfort, and the shoal called the Rip Raps, pursuant to an act of the general assembly of March 1821; and the same was transmitted to Captain Eliason of the United States corps of engineers, to be recorded in the court of Elizabeth City county. On the 12th of December 1838, the deed was admitted to record in the proper county. It recites the act of March 1st, 1821, with its various provisions, and conveys the land at Old Point and at the Rip Raps, subject to the provisions of the law. It describes the tract of two hundred and fifty acres at Old Point Comfort, as adjacent to and in part surrounding a tract of two acres theretofore granted by the commonwealth to the United States, and blends both into one tract of two hundred and fifty-two acres, the boundaries of which are described as beginning at the south-east foot of Mill creek bridge; and then gives the courses and distances, and other objects called for, as the same are set forth in the report of the surveyor returned to the executive. The deed in that portion of it describing the two hundred and fifty acres at Old Point Comfort, does not in so many words, refer to the report of the surveyor, or plat returned by him. But in reference to the fifteen acres of shoal at the Rip Raps including the site of Fort Calhoun, the deed contains this clause, 'The boundaries of the said tract of fifteen acres 150 to *be ascertained by reference to a plat and description made by C. Hubbard, acting surveyor of Elizabeth City county, dated the 17th July 1838, hereto annexed, marked A.'

Such is the title under which the defendant, an officer of the United States, relies to protect him and the United States in the possession of the property, to recover which this suit has been instituted.

The lessor of the plaintiff claims under a patent as for waste and unappropriated land, founded on a land office treasury warrant, and entered and surveyed under the laws of the state providing for the appropriation of the waste and unappropriated land of the state, and the grant thereof in private property to individuals; jurisdiction over the territory still remaining in the commonwealth.

The grant to the lessor of the plaintiff is dated the 28th of August 1851, and is for 264.72 acres, described as lying in Elizabeth City county, including the mud flats between low water mark on Mill creek, the Shelton patent and the tract of two hundred and fifty-two acres of land conveyed to the United States by the commonwealth of Virginia by deed, recorded in the clerk's office of Elizabeth City county on the 12th day of December 1838, beginning at the east foot of Mill creek bridge, and thence along the United States land to the mouth of a small gut running into the marsh, the boundary of the United States land, and the Shelton patent.

The patent being long posterior in date to the act of cession and deed to the United States, and calling to be bounded by the lands of the United States, it becomes necessary to enquire into the extent of the grant to the United States. To ascertain this, it is important to determine whether the literal calls of the deed should alone be regarded as defining and designating the limits, by a fixed, unvarying, mathematical line, where nothing *else is 151 called for, or whether it is competent to look at the law, and the plat and report of the surveyor, made out in pursuance of the instructions of the governor, to enable him to execute a conveyance, to ascertain what was the land actually intended to be ceded and conveyed. There is no ambiguity apparent on the face of the deed. If any arises, it results from a comparison of the calls of the deed with the subject granted. By that comparison it appeared that the subject of the grant was a sandy peninsula, varying by the action and operation of the tides and winds. Most of the calls in the deed were for magnetic lines and distances not terminating upon any monuments or marked boundaries. A survey made out according to the mathematical lines and calls of the deed would, with the exception of three objects, the bridge and the two pines, represent no visible objects but the land and the water. The magnetic lines and courses would be found to pursue the general outline of high water mark; the high water line not being a right line from station to station, as it would follow the slight indentations in the shore, so that a right line from station to station would at some places cross the mouths of small inlets and vary above and below the precise high water line. If by such comparison of the calls with the subject granted a doubt should arise as to whether a fixed line or a water boundary was intended, a survey made by the direction of the grantor, and which was his guide in making the conveyance, would be proper evidence to explain the ambiguity thus produced. Bowling v. Helm, 1 Bibb's R. 88; Burton on Real Prop. 142.

In this case the deed of the governor refers to a plat and description made by C. Hubbard, acting surveyor of Elizabeth City county, dated the 17th of July 1838. The report of the surveyor in evidence in this cause bears date the 30th of July 1838.

But it is obvious that the report was 152 accompanied by a plat; for he *speaks of having made the surveys directed, and of having spread the low water line, and mud flats and grass marsh on the plat. The survey necessarily preceded the report, and accordingly, the certificate on the plat from the executive department shows that the survey was made on the 17th of July 1838. But the plat gives no courses and distances; they are found in the report, from which they were copied into the deed. There is no doubt, therefore, that the report as well as the plat were before the governor when he executed the conveyance, and were intended to be referred to in the deed; and whether actually referred to or not, yet as they were made out by the officer selected by the governor to enable him to execute the grant, it would be evidence as against the grantor as to the subject intended to be granted.

But this was not a transaction between individuals, but between state and state; and is to be considered and construed with reference to the character of the parties, and the object each had in view.

The act of assembly contemplated a survey; for as the cession was not to exceed two hundred and fifty acres, a survey was essential to ascertain the quantity of land, and to define the line of demarcation between the land ceded and the adjacent land, to show to what extent the jurisdiction ceded to the United States would reach. The title of the United States depends on the act of cession, and all that was done by the proper officers to carry it into execution. Until the quantity and locality of the land was ascertained, the title was incomplete; and as congress can only exercise exclusive jurisdiction in such places within a state, when purchased by the consent of the legislature of the state, the deed of the governor would not of itself confer title and jurisdiction. The act, the survey made necessary by it, and the deed were all necessary to consummate the title; and all

153 must be *regarded, though occurring

at different times, as parts of one entire compact, resulting in the transfer of a portion of the soil and jurisdiction of the state to the United States for specified purposes, and subject to certain reservations contained in the act of cession. If we look at the deed as applied to the subject of the grant, and explained by the plat and report, we see that the descriptive part commences at the water mark, on one side of the tract, calls for fourteen magnetic courses and measured distances to the mouth of an inlet running up into the grass marsh. A reference to the plat shows that the three next lines pursued the line between the high land and the marsh, the ground of which is stated on the face of the plat to be below the water at high tide, although the grass is generally above; so that all the lines from the beginning along Mill creek and the marsh correspond in general with the high water mark. The line across the neck commences at the edge of the marsh and terminates within the sixty poles called for, on the bay shore at high water mark; and from thence the lines run round by magnetic courses and distances to the beginning. The tract of two hundred and fifty acres is described as adjacent to, and in part surrounding the tract of two acres heretofore granted by the commonwealth to the United States, and the boundaries comprehend and include the two hundred and fifty acres and the two acres in one tract of two hundred and fifty-two acres. The act of January 2d, 1798, ceded so much of the public lands at Old Point Comfort, not exceeding two acres, as should be sufficient to erect a light-house. The boundaries of these two acres do not appear; but from the position of the light-house, as indicated on the plat, it may be fairly presumed it was or was supposed to be in part a water boundary; and therefore the two hundred and fifty acres are described as adjacent to and in part 154 surrounds *said tract of two acres, evidently referring to the exterior or land boundary so surrounded by the two hundred and fifty acres, and indicating that by blending the two tracts into one by a common boundary, there would be a continuous water boundary round the whole to the beginning.

The surveyor in his report furthermore certifies to the executive that the agent of the United States elected the high water mark for his boundary; but requested him to spread the low water line and the mud flats and grass marsh on Mill creek on the plat; which he accordingly did. The plat on its face indicates, by black and dotted lines, both the high and low water line; and the surveyor certifies that he began at the southeast foot of the bridge, and then pursued the ordinary high water mark on the Mill creek shore to the mouth of the small gut running up into the grass marsh; and from thence he pursued the line between the high land and marsh to Shelton's land; from thence by a line of marked pines to Chesapeake bay shore at the ordinary high water mark; and then he pursued the high water mark along the bay shore to the beginning; including an area of two hundred and seventy-eight acres one rood and ten poles, including the two acres ceded for a light-house. He then laid off the two hundred and fifty-two acres for the United States, including the two acres: And the plat shows that this was done by running a line across the neck from the grass marsh to the bay shore, cutting off 26.16 acres from the whole area of two hundred and seventy-eight acres one rood and ten poles between the line of the United States and the land of Shelton; but no other change was made in the plat in respect to the boundaries of the two hundred and fifty-two acres.

From these facts it appears that no monuments or marks were fixed to indicate 155 the curves and indentations *of the creek or bay, and from the character of the land in question it would have been difficult if not impracticable to have fixed a boundary at high or low water mark as at the time of the cession or survey, which would point out at all future times the gradual and imperceptible encroachment of the waters at one place, and the gradual accretion of the land at another. The surveyor did not attempt to fix the boundaries by such artificial monuments. The running by the magnetic course and measured distance was essential to compute the quantity of land within the area. But the lines on Mill creek and the bay were open lines; and left open because the natural boundaries of the creek and bay, the waters of which he represented on the plat at high and low water mark, obviated the necessity of any artificial marks.

In the case of Starr v. Child, 20 Wend. R. 149, the deed called for a line to the Genesee river, and thence northwardly along the shore of said river to Buffalo street. The court held that there was no necessity for looking to extrinsic circumstances, for that the deed on its face invested the grantee with a fee simple to the bank of the river. The judge, in giving the opinion, remarks, "That the cases show, what it is difficult for the human mind to resist, that the parties never mean to leave a narrow strip between the land and the river, merely because some stake or tree, or even all the stakes or trees of the line, stand at a slight distance from the river. The expression of an intent to run the line along the stream, reaches a distinct natural monument which overcomes the others." So in the case of McCulloch's lessee v. Aten, 2 Ohio R. 425, it is said, "That the fact that the marked corner called for stands four rods from the water, does not create any ambiguity in the terms, down the creek with the several meanders thereof. They import the water's edge at low water, which is a decided natural *boundary, and must control a call for corner trees on the bank."

In the case under consideration, no embarrassment arises from a conflict between artificial monuments and the line of high water mark, for no such monuments are called for. In Bruce v. Taylor, 2 J. J. Marsh. R. 160, the grant called to begin on the Ohio river, thence by courses and distances, without any marked lines or corners, to the mouth of a creek emptying into the Ohio, thence by courses and distances, without any marked lines or corners, to a stake; and thence for courses and distances round to the beginning. The court held, that as three of the calls were on the river, as there were no intermediate marked lines and corners, and as the general description was "to lie on the Ohio river,"—"these facts alone would not leave room for any other legal construction of the patent, than that the Ohio river with its sinuosities is one of the lines of its boundaries." In the same case they say that even if the lines and courses had been marked, and the patent had called for the river as a line of the boundary, this call would control the marked line: It being a universal rule that the actual boundary, whether natural or artificial, shall control repugnant course and distance. In that case, the original survey was exhibited, and showed the river as a boundary: "This, the court said, was decisive. The survey was the foundation of the patent: It is of record, and in that respect equal in dignity to the patent. It does not contradict but only renders fixed and certain some of the calls of the patent; and that it may be used to aid in supplying omissions, or in correcting mistakes in the patent."

All these remarks apply directly to the case under consideration. The lands at Old Point Comfort having been held as public lands, their position in relation to the surrounding waters was well understood by the *grantor. The law ceded the right of property and title as well as the jurisdiction "over the lands at Old Point Comfort." It contemplated a survey, as that was necessary to ascertain the quantity; and as a conveyance was to be made by the governor, such survey would be naturally returned to the executive department, as his guide in describing the subject to be conveyed. The deed conveys the land at Old Point Comfort; it calls to begin on the water at the southeast foot of Mill creek bridge, and then for certain magnetic courses and measured distances to the mouth of a gut running up into the marsh; in all, fourteen calls without any artificial marks or corners or monuments. And on the other side it commences on the bay shore at high water mark, and thence calls for courses and distances sixteen lines, to the beginning; without a mark or corner on any of the lines. And in addition to this, the report of the surveyor sets forth that the officer of the United States elected the high water as his boundary; that he pursued the ordinary high water mark on the Mill creek shore; that he commenced at the ordinary high water mark on the Chesapeake bay shore, and pursued the high water mark along the bay shore to the beginning; and the plat returned exhibits the line of high water as the boundary of the land surveyed. All the circumstances which led the court to hold in the case of Bruce v. Taylor, that the legal construction of the patent, that the Ohio river with its sinuosities was one of the lines of the boundary, stand out with prominence in this case. To the same effect is the case of Rix v. Johnson, 5 N. Hamp. R. 520; and Angel on Water Courses, § 29, 30, where the authorities are reviewed. See also, Mayhew v. Norton, 17 Pick. R. 357.

I think, that having regard to the law, the report and survey and deed of the governor, the legal construction of the whole transaction was to make the *boundary of the land ceded to and conveyed to the United States a boundary by the line of ordinary high water mark, except on the line extending from the margin of the grass marsh across the neck to the bay shore at high water mark.

The attorney general, when consulted by the executive, advised that the officers of the United States should elect whether they would have the whole survey laid off above high water, or whether they would include within its boundaries the lands below high water mark, and on the return of the survey the conveyance should be made by metes and bounds; being of opinion that the grant to the United States must be limited to the metes and bounds laid off, and that they could not take jurisdiction over the adjacent lands below high water mark, as pertinent to the plotted land. And the governor directed surveys to be made in accordance with this opinion. From whence it is inferred that by his deed the governor intended to convey, by a certain fixed, invariable line, which, though it coincided generally with the high water at the time it was surveyed, must at all times be run according to the magnetic courses and measured distances, without reference to its actual correspondence with the line of ordinary high water mark, or the gradual and imperceptible changes caused by the encroachments of the bay or the accretions to the soil. The attorney general was correct in saying that the grant to the United States must be limited by the metes and bounds laid off, if by laid off is meant the bounds called for. But he cannot be supposed to have meant that such bounds must be artificial, made by the hand of man. Artificial monuments are liable to destruction; and surveyors seldom agree as to a precise mathematical line. The variation of the magnetic needle, uneven surfaces, and other causes, render it difficult, if not impracticable, to arrive at perfect accuracy; and hence natural or artificial 159 *boundaries always control the mere magnetic calls. We are not, therefore, to suppose that a great natural boundary, as a river, or the shore of the bay, could not be adopted in a grant by a state to the United States. Convenience would seem to point out the latter as the most proper boundaries between two governments, where jurisdiction as well as property is regulated by the limits between them. "In a case of doubt," say the Supreme court in Handly's lessee v. Anthony, 5 Wheat. R. 374, quoting Vattel, "every country lying upon a river is presumed to have no other limits but the river; because nothing is more natural than to take a river for a boundary, when a state is established on its borders; and where there is a doubt, that is always to be presumed which is most natural and proper." When, therefore, the officers of the United States elected the ordinary high water mark as the boundary, and the surveyor adopted it, and the deed conveyed to it, the land passes to the boundary so called for and adopted.

The attorney general and the agent of the United States differed as to the effect of such conveyance: The latter supposing it would give title and jurisdiction down to low water; the former, that title and jurisdiction would be fixed by the magnetic calls for courses and measured distances, no matter how the water line varied. And the question now is, what was the legal effect of the act done? And that is a matter for judicial decision. If it were a mere grant of property, the jurisdiction remaining in the state, the right of the grantee would extend to ordinary low water mark, under the express provisions of the act of assembly, 1 Rev. Code of 1819, ch. 87, p. 341; which declares that hereafter the limits or bounds of the several tracts of land lying on the Atlantic ocean, the Chesapeake bay and the rivers and creeks thereof, within this commonwealth, shall extend to ordinary low water mark; and the 160 owners of said lands shall *have, possess and enjoy exclusive rights and privileges to and along the shores thereof, down to ordinary low water mark. By the common law, the title of the proprietor extends to the ordinary high water mark.

The shore, or that space alternately covered and left dry by the rise and fall of the tide, being the space between high and low water marks, was in the king for the use of the public. The law of Virginia, so far at least as relates to the soil, has, as appears by the act referred to, been altered; and the limits or boundaries of the land extend over and include the shore, by operation of law. This was the law in force when the cession of the land at Old Point Comfort was made, and the law being general, and speaking at every instant of time, it operated upon the grant to the United States, and extended the bounds down to ordinary low water mark; thereby annexing the right to the soil between ordinary high and low water mark as incident or appurtenant to the adjacent land.

The provisions of the act of 1819 have been incorporated in the Code, ch. 62, § 1, 2; and constituted the law when the patent of the plaintiff's lessor was issued. But it is insisted that as the act ceded jurisdiction as well as property and title, that sovereignty cannot be yielded or granted by implication; and therefore, whatever might be the rule in the case of a private individual, there could have been no intention on the part of the state to apply such a rule to a grant of this description.

The state, in granting, where nothing appears to the contrary, must be presumed to have granted with reference to the general law. If she had granted to an individual, the right of property would have extended to the low water mark. If the United States, with the consent of the legislature, had purchased from the individual, the whole proprietary right would have passed; and if jurisdiction had been yielded, it must have been coincident 161 with the right of property. *The whole right of property was transferred by the act of cession and the conveyance under it; and the jurisdiction followed. If an island had been the subject of the cession, the grant of soil and property would as here, extend to low water mark, and jurisdiction would follow. This cession might be assimilated to a grant of an island; it was known to be a peninsula nearly surrounded with water. A line across the narrow neck and the surrounding waters, furnishing the best and most convenient boundary for property as well as jurisdiction; and there being nothing in the terms of the grant to limit the bounds as to property, all the incidents of such a property attach to it, including the right to the gradual accretions, which being imperceptible in their progress, may in the course of years increase the area beyond the quantity originally conveyed.

The legal effect of the deed, therefore, was to transfer to the United States the land to low water mark, with all the incidents of property so situated, and jurisdiction coincident with it, unless it should appear that in executing the transfer the governor has transcended the power conferred upon him by the law under which he was acting.

In giving an interpretation to such an act, the character of the parties to it, the purposes of the cession, and the situation and nature of the thing granted must all be looked to, and such construction given as will, if possible, carry out, and not defeat, the intention which led to the grant.

The parties were two governments, both equally interested in the accomplishment of the object in view, the erection and maintenance of the proposed fortifications. The purpose of the parties in making and receiving the cession is set forth in the preamble of the act. It recites that it was shown to the general assembly that the government of the United States was solicitous that certain land at Old Point Comfort and the shoal called the Rip Raps, should, with the right of property and entire jurisdiction thereon, be vested in the United States for the purpose of fortification and other objects of national defence. In proceeding to execute a grant having these objects in view, the grant must be interpreted as intending to pass with the subject all the means necessary to carry into effect the design of the parties to it, and to preserve and maintain the fortifications in a state of efficiency thereafter. The legislature must have contemplated such a cession as would give the government of the United States free access to and the command of either shore. To erect the fortifications, docks and wharves would be necessary; to render them efficient, a free communication between the two fortifications and unimpeded command of the shore and channel between the forts, was essential. To maintain discipline in a large garrison, and a proper police for the preservation of health and the safety of the public property, jurisdiction thereon in the words of the preamble, was required. All these objects would be defeated if the state had retained the right to the soil between high and low water mark, and to the alluvion that might be formed. She could not have intended to retain it for any purpose of her own. It was for her interest that the fortifications should be so erected as to accomplish the object intended, the protection of her own citizens from foreign invasion. Nor could she have contemplated a sale of it as private property, upon which houses might be erected masking the guns of the fort, and a conflict of jurisdiction brought about subversive of the police and discipline of the fort and garrison. Such a construction would defeat the declared purpose of the law. The nature of the property was well known to the state. It had been dedicated to the purposes of defence in the early history of the colony, and had continued as public property up to the time of the cession; a sandy peninsula projecting into the bay and connected with the main land by a narrow isthmus, the water furnishing a proper boundary and the most palpable and convenient line of demarcation between the two jurisdictions. These considerations necessarily imply that it was the intention of Virginia to cede and of the United States to receive so much of the land at Old Point Comfort, including all the land on the point from shore to shore, as would be comprised in an area containing the prescribed quantity of two hundred and fifty acres. This implication is supported by the language of the act: The governor is authorized to make over, by proper conveyance to the United States, the right of property and title, as well as all the jurisdiction the commonwealth possesses over the lands and shoal at Old Point Comfort and the Rip Raps; provided the cession at Old Point Comfort shall not exceed two hundred and fifty acres: Thus implying that the lands at Old Point Comfort meant all the lands from the point upwards, so far as the government of the United States should require, so as not to include more than the prescribed quantity in the area cut off from the adjacent lands. The provisos that the cession should not prevent, abolish or restrain the right and privilege of fishery hitherto enjoyed and used by the citizens of this commonwealth within the limits aforesaid, or in any manner to prevent the pilots from erecting such marks and beacons as may be deemed necessary, show that it was not supposed any right in the soil in the part of the land at Old Point Comfort cut off from the adjacent land would be retained by the commonwealth. But contemplating a grant of property and jurisdiction to the water boundary, the rights and privileges theretofore enjoyed and used were to be preserved unimpaired.

In giving a construction to the legal effect of the conveyance, so as to carry both property and jurisdiction to ordinary low water mark, the intention of each party, the state in making and the United States in accepting the cession, is promoted; whilst any other construction would defeat the object of the parties and render the grant illusory. The legal construction of the effect of the conveyance extending the bounds of the grant from the line of ordinary high to ordinary low water mark, conforms to the general law and carries into effect the intention of the parties to the cession. By these transactions the state has parted with property and jurisdiction subject to the reservations and provisos contained in the act of cession, within the limits of the grant to the United States, on the Chesapeake bay, Hampton roads and Mill creek down to ordinary low water mark. As an incident to such grant, the alluvion formed by the imperceptible increase of the land belongs to the United States; and therefore, there remained nothing within the limits aforesaid which could be made the subject of grant by the commonwealth to another.

If, as it has been argued, the land was to be laid off all around its area by metes and bounds, by which was to be understood fixed, unvarying lines, ascertained by permanent monuments or mathematical calls, it would have been the same, whether the ordinary low water or the ordinary high water mark had been elected as the boundary by the agents of the United States. The lines corresponding with either at the time of election, would have been fixed and unvarying. It would have been difficult if not impracticable to have designated such a line by artificial monuments, if low water had been selected, as every tide would have submerged them; and mathematical lines, the most uncertain of boundaries, must have been relied on. The low water mark on a sandy peninsula like this, will necessarily vary through the operation 165 *of the winds and tides. As accretions, imperceptible in their progress, were formed, state jurisdiction would attach, varying as the alluvion increased, disappearing as it diminished. Even if there was more doubt as to the legal construction of the deed, the inconvenience of the construction contended for would be a strong objection to adopting it. In the language of the Supreme court in Handly's lessee v. Anthony, 5 Wheat. R. 374, "In questions which concern boundaries of states, (and here jurisdiction is involved,) when great natural boundaries are established in general terms, with a view to public convenience and the avoidance of controversy, the great object, where it can be distinctly perceived, ought not to be defeated by those technical perplexities which may sometimes influence contracts between individuals."

Questions were raised at the trial, and have been argued here, as to the validity of the patent to the lessor of the plaintiff. It is insisted by the defendant that the lands at Old Point Comfort could not be entered, surveyed and patented as waste and unappropriated lands of the commonwealth; that the acts of the government had separated these lands from the mass of waste and unappropriated lands, and reserved them for the public use as a site for fortifications and defence; and that this is a matter which any defendant sued by another claiming under a patent under the general law, may set up to defeat this action.

It seems that as early as 1629-30, 6 Charles 1st, an act was passed by the assembly for the "raying of a ffort at Poynt Comfort;" and certain persons named "by full consent of the whole assembly, were chosen to view the place,"—"and agree for the building, raying and finishing of the same." A fort seems to have been erected, and various regulations in regard to the fort are found in the 1st vol. of Hening's Statutes, p. 166, 175, 215, 218.

166 In 1639, an act was passed *levying taxes to pay the captain of the fort and ten guards, and to build a new fort at Point Comfort. In 1671, Governor Sir William Berkeley, in reply to enquiries submitted by the lords commissioners of foreign plantations, reported that there were five forts in the colony, two in James river, but that they had neither skill nor ability to make or maintain them, &c. 2 Hen. Stat. 512.

It does not appear from anything in the Statutes at Large whether a fort was continued at the point during the residue of our colonial history or not. By the revolution the commonwealth succeeded to the rights and dominion of the crown. In May 1779 the act passed for establishing a land office and ascertaining the terms and manner of granting waste and unappropriated lands; subjecting such lands to entry under land office treasury warrants, providing for the making and return of surveys, and for the issuing of patents. But in addition to the waste and unappropriated lands thus made the subject of entry, survey and grant in the mode prescribed, there were certain lands in the eastern part of the state which, by the acts of the agents of the crown or commonwealth, the proprietor of all the waste lands in the commonwealth, had been set apart and appropriated to public purposes. It does not appear that any specific grant or special act passed for such appropriation. They seem to have been dedicated to the public use, by being so used and enjoyed. When referred to in the laws, they are designated as public lands, and a specific mode of disposition was prescribed. Thus the act of May 1784, 2 Rev. Code of 1819, p. 414, directed that all public lands and other public property in or near the city of Richmond, except so much thereof as should be set apart by the executive for the use of the government, should be sold by certain commissioners named in the act. By another act, passed May 167 1784, 2 Rev. Code *415, all the public lands in this commonwealth, except those thereafter mentioned, were directed to be sold by commissioners named in the act. By the 3d section, certain of those lands in and near Williamsburg and in James City were transferred to and vested in the president and professors of William and Mary university forever. By the 4th section, the commissioners were empowered to sell the lands commonly called Gosport, except such part as in their opinion may be necessary for the use of the public. In October 1784, 2 Rev. Code 419, another act passed in relation to the disposition of the public lands called and known by the name of Gosport, and authorizing the commissioners to convey to purchasers thereof an estate in fee simple. In October 1785, 2 Rev. Code 423, an act entitled "an act for the sale of certain public lands," was passed, by which it was enacted "that the public lands in the counties of York and Elizabeth City, except a point of land in the last mentioned county, called Point Comfort, should be vested in certain commissioners by name, who were empowered to sell and convey the same to purchasers."

All these acts were passed after the general land law of May 1779, throwing open the waste and unappropriated lands within the territory of this commonwealth to entry, survey and patent by all adventurers. Yet it is manifest that the legislature did not suppose that lands set apart for public purposes, or the public lands were embraced under the designation of waste and unappropriated lands. Special acts were passed for the sale of these public lands by commissioners, and the title of the state passed not by patent but by a conveyance of the commissioners specially authorized to execute deeds. The act last mentioned shows that the point of land in Elizabeth City county, called Point Comfort, was so held, not as waste and unappropriated land, liable to entry under a land warrant, but as public land, the title to which had 168 vested in the *commonwealth for special purposes. By the act of January 2d, 1798, 1 Rev. Code 1819, p. 48, the governor was authorized by deed to convey to the United States all interest in and right and title to, as well as all the jurisdiction which the commonwealth possessed over, so much of the public lands not exceeding two acres, situate in Elizabeth City, at a place commonly called Point Comfort, as should be sufficient to erect a light-house. Here again the land is treated as public land belonging to the commonwealth, the title to which was to be transferred by deed. A proviso in this law continued to the citizens of the commonwealth the privilege they then enjoyed of hauling their seines on the shores of said land. And by the act of cession the commonwealth authorized the governor to transfer by deed her right and title as well as the jurisdiction she possessed over the lands and shoal at Old Point Comfort and the Rip Raps. As a general rule, all lands which had never before been patented are to be considered as waste and unappropriated, and are liable to location by any holder of a treasury warrant. But as the crown first and the commonwealth afterwards owned all the public domain, it was competent for either to set apart a portion thereof for specific purposes. The early proceedings of the colonial legislature show that this point of land was so set apart; and from the fact that no attempt appears to have been made to take it up as waste land until recently, it would seem that the public right was universally acknowledged. The laws passed since the act of May 1779, recognize the existence of such public lands, provide for a specific mode of disposition, treat this as a portion of such public lands, and reserve it from sale, and the acts of 1798 and 1821 treat it as the public property of the state, when about to cede portions of it to the United States.

These various acts amount to a complete appropriation to the public use of the 169 lands at Old Point Comfort, *held by the commonwealth, and excepted from the sale of other public lands by the act of 1785, and withdrew them from the mass of waste and unappropriated lands. They were not liable to entry, survey and patent as such; and the patent therefore passed no title whatever. The act of March 31st, 1851, Sess. Acts, p. 33, protecting the magazine at Westham and any stone quarry now worked by the state from grant, cannot be so construed as to subject all other lands owned by the state, and held for specific purposes, to location as waste and unappropriated: It may confer the immunity of public lands upon the property therein mentioned if it was waste and unappropriated before that act. On this ground the plaintiff showed no title; and it was competent for any person to rely upon this defence. It is not like the case of a contest between claimants to a portion of the waste and unappropriated land under conflicting claims. In such controversies, private rights alone come under review; and we give no opinion as to the right of a defendant in ejectment to object to the validity of the plaintiff's patent in such a case. But where the right is vested in the commonwealth for the benefit of the public, as in the case of the public square in the city of Richmond, the navigable waters and the soil under them held by the commonwealth for the common use, and expressly exempted from grant by the Code, ch. 62, § 1, it would be unreasonable and oppressive if the individual could not protect himself from an action of trespass brought by the patentee, until the patent had been repealed or shown to be invalid in some proceeding having that object directly in view.

These observations upon the rights of the parties dispose of all the questions raised by the instructions moved for on either side, and given or refused at the trial.

The first instruction asked for and 170 refused, asserts *the proposition that the deed alone can be regarded to ascertain the rights of the United States. It has been already shown that the title of the United States depends upon the law, the proceedings had in execution of it, and the deed. They were all necessary to complete the cession, and must be looked to in order to find out what was intended to be granted and was in fact granted to the United States: The instruction was therefore properly refused.

The second instruction is rather an abstraction than an instruction bearing on the case, and for this reason properly refused as calculated to mislead the jury. The terms are obscure, but the first clause would seem to imply that where a latent ambiguity arises from a comparison of the calls of the deed with the subject of the grant, no evidence aliunde could be received to explain it. It is in such cases that evidence aliunde must be resorted to; and as has been already remarked, the law, the survey, report and deed must all be regarded in arriving at the intention of the parties, and to ascertain the extent of the cession. That instruction was properly refused.

The third instruction is based upon a state of facts not existing. Courses and distances are not alone called for in the deed. The southeast foot of Mill creek bridge, the mouth of the small gut running into the marsh, the dead pine, the line between the high land and the marsh, the pine, the bay shore at high water mark, are all called for; for this reason the instruction was properly refused, as calculated to mislead, and also because it asks for a legal construction of the effect of the deed, which the law did not warrant.

Nor did the court err in any of the instructions given to the jury at the instance of the defendant. From what has been already said, it appears that the deed, construed with reference to the law 171 and acts *done in execution of it, gave to the United States a boundary, by operation of law, to the ordinary low water mark; and consequently the lessor of the plaintiff could acquire no title by his patent to any lands described in the deed, which lie above ordinary low water mark.

The third instruction, in regard to the lands covered by the waters of Mill creek at ordinary high tide, is to be taken secundum subjectam materiam. So far as it comes in collision with the defendant's grant, the patent could give no title, and as the grant to the defendant, by extending to ordinary low water on Mill creek embraced all that could be the subject of grant, the patent to the plaintiff's lessor could give no title to such lands.

The fourth instruction is similar, in the principle involved, to the third.

The fifth is equally free from objection, taking it secundum subjectam materiam, which was the lands in controversy as claimed by the defendant. These lands had been granted, and property and jurisdiction parted with. They were, therefore, no longer waste and unappropriated at the date of the entry on which the patent issued to plaintiff's lessor; and upon the further ground, which was probably the meaning of the court, that the lands at Old Point Comfort, extending to low water mark on the Chesapeake bay, Hampton roads and Mill creek, were public lands, and not liable to appropriation by entry, survey and grant, as part of the waste and unappropriated lands of the commonwealth.

We think there is no error in the judgment, and that it should be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

†Ejectment—When Mere Possession Will Support Action.—By way of exception to the general rule, that in ejectment the plaintiff must recover on the strength of his own title and not upon the weakness of his adversary's, the principal case holds that, a party in peaceable possession of land, ousted by one not having title thereto, or authority to enter upon the land, such party ousted, may recover the premises in ejectment upon his possession merely; and his right to recover cannot be resisted by showing that there is or may be an outstanding title in another, but only by showing that the defendant himself either has title or authority to enter under feudant himself either has title or authority to enter under the title.

2. Same—Death of Ancestor—Presumption as to Possession of Heir.—Where an ancestor dies in possession of land, the presumption of law is that the heir is in possession after the death of the ancestor; and in the absence of all evidence on the point, the heir may maintain ejectment upon the strength of his possession, against one who has entered upon the land without title, or authority to enter under the title outstanding in another.

This was an action of ejectment in the Circuit court of Buckingham county, brought in February 1846, by the lessee of Elizabeth A. Cobbs and others against William H. Tapscott. Upon the trial the defendant demurred to the evidence. It appears that Thomas Anderson died in 1800, having made a will, by which he appointed several persons his executor, of whom John Harris, Robert Rives and Nathaniel Anderson qualified as such. By his will his executors were authorized to sell his real estate.

At the time of Thomas Anderson's death the land in controversy had been surveyed for him, and in 1802 a patent was issued therefor to Harris, Rives and N. Anderson as executors. Some time between the years 1820 and 1825, the executors sold the land at public auction, when it was knocked off to Robert Rives; though it appears from a contract between Rives and Sarah Lewis, dated in September 1825, that the land had,

173 prior to that date, been sold by the executors to *Mrs. Lewis for three hundred and sixty-seven dollars and fifty cents. This contract was for the sale by Mrs. Lewis to Rives of her dower interest in another tract of land, for which Rives was to pay to the executors of Thomas Anderson the sum of two hundred and seventeen dollars and fifty cents in part of her purchase. In a short time after her purchase she moved upon the land, built upon and improved it, and continued in possession until 1835, when she died. In 1825 the executor Harris was dead, and Nathaniel Anderson died in 1831, leaving Rives surviving him. And it appears that in an account settled by a commissioner in a suit by the devisees and legatees of Thomas Anderson against the executors of Robert Rives, there was an item under date of the 28th of August 1826, charging Rives with the whole amount of the purchase money, in which it is said, "The whole not yet collected, but Robert Rives assumes the liability."

such title. For the above proposition, the principal case is approved in Olinger v. Shepherd, 12 Gratt.
478; Atkins v. Lewis, 14 Gratt. 40, and note; Nelson v.

v. R. F. & P. R. Co., 76 Va. 234; Barton's Law Practice (2d Ed.) 354; monographic note on "Eject-ment," at end of case.

There is no evidence that the heirs of Mrs. Lewis were in possession of the land after her death, except as it may be inferred from the fact that she had been living upon the land from the time of her purchase until her death, and that she died upon it.

The proof was that Cobbs took possession of the land about the year 1842, without, so far as appears, any pretense of title. He made an entry with the surveyor of the county in December 1844, with a view to obtain a patent for it.

The court gave a judgment upon the demurrer for the plaintiffs, and Tapscott thereupon applied to this court for a super-sedeas, which was allowed.

G. N. Johnson, for the appellant.
Irving, for the appellees.

DANIEL, J. It is no doubt true, as a general rule, that the right of a plaintiff in ejectment to recover, *rests on the strength of his own title, and is not established by the exhibition of defects in the title of the defendant, and that the defendant may maintain his defense by simply showing that the title is not in the plaintiff, but in some one else. And the rule is usually thus broadly stated by the authorities, without qualification. There are, however, exceptions to the rule as thus announced, as well established as the rule itself. As when the defendant has entered under the title of the plaintiff he cannot set up a title in a third person in contradiction to that under which he entered. Other instances might be cited in which it is equally as well settled that the defendant would be estopped from showing defects in the title of the plaintiff. In such cases, the plaintiff may, and often does recover, not by the exhibition of a title good in itself, but by showing that the relations between himself and the defendant are such that the latter cannot question it. The relation between the parties stands in the place of title; and though the title of the plaintiff is tainted with vices or defects that would prove fatal to his recovery in a controversy with any other defendant in peaceable possession, it is yet all sufficient in a litigation with one who entered into the possession under it, or otherwise stands so related to it that the law will not allow him to plead its defects in his defense.

Whether the case of an intrusion by a stranger without title, on a peaceable possession, is not one to meet the exigencies of which the courts will recognize a still further qualification or explanation of the rule requiring the plaintiff to recover only on the strength of his own title, is a question which, I believe, has not as yet been decided by this court. And it is somewhat remarkable that there are but few cases to be found in the English reporters in which the precise question has been decided or considered by the courts.

The cases of Read & Morpeth v. Er-175 ington, Croke *Eliz. 321; Bateman
v. Allen, Ibid. 437; and Allen v.
Rivington, 2 Saund. R. 111, were each decided on special verdicts, in which the facts with respect to the title were stated. In each case it was shown that the plaintiff was in possession, and that the defendant entered without title or authority; and the court held that it was not necessary to decide upon the title of the plaintiff, and gave judgment for him. In the report of Bateman v. Allen, it is said that Williams Sergeant moved, "that for as much as in all the verdict it is not found that the defendant had the primer possession, nor that he entered in the right or by the command of any who had title, but that he entered on the possession of the plaintiff without title, his entry is not lawful;" and so the court held.

And in Read & Morpeth v. Erington, it was insisted that for a portion of the premises the judgment ought to be for the defendant, in as much as it appeared from the verdict that the title to such portion was outstanding in a third party; but the court said it did not matter, as it was shown that the plaintiff had entered, and the defendant had entered on him.

I have seen no case overruling these decisions. It is true that in Haldane v. Harvey, 4 Burr. R. 2484, the general doctrine is announced that the plaintiff must recover on the strength of his own title; and that the "possession gives the defendant a right against every man who cannot show a good title." But in that case the circumstances under which the defendant entered, and the nature of the claim by which he held, do not appear; and the case, therefore, cannot properly be regarded as declaring more than the general rule.

The same remark will apply to other cases that might be cited, in which the general rule is propounded in terms equally broad and comprehensive.

In 2 T. R. 749, we have nothing more than the syllabus of the case of Crisp 176 v. Barber, in which it is said *that a lease of a rectory-house, &c., by a rector, becomes void by 13th Eliz. ch. 20, by his nonresidence for eighty days, and that a stranger may take advantage of it. And that the lessee cannot maintain ejectment against a stranger who enters without any title whatever.

And in Graham v. Peat, 1 East's R. 244, in which, upon a like state of facts, arising under the same statute, the plaintiff brought trespass instead of ejectment, it was held that his possession was sufficient to maintain trespass against a wrong-doer, the chief justice, Lord Kenyon, remarking, that "if ejectment could not have been maintained, it was because that is a fictitious remedy founded upon title."

These two cases as reported may, perhaps, when taken in connection, be fairly regarded as holding that mere possession by the plaintiff will justify the action of trespass against an intruder, but is not sufficient to maintain ejectment. If so, they are in conflict with the earlier decisions before cited. It is to be observed, however, of the first of these cases, that we have no statement of the grounds on which it was decided; and of the last, that it does not directly present the question whether ejectment could or could not have been maintained. And I do not think it would be just to allow them to outweigh decisions in which the precise question was fairly presented, met and adjudicated: The more especially, as the doctrine of the earlier cases is reasserted by Lord Tenterden in the case of Hughes v. Dyball, 14 Eng. C. L. R. 481. In that case, proof that the plaintiff let the locus in quo to a tenant who held peaceable possession for about a year, was held sufficient evidence of title to maintain ejectment against a party who came in the night and forcibly turned the tenant out of possession. In Archibold's Nisi Prius, vol. 2, p. 395, the case is cited with approbation, and the law stated in accordance with it. In this country

177 *the cases are numerous, and to some extent conflicting, yet I think that the larger number will be found to be in accordance with the earlier English decisions. I have found no case in which the question seems to have been more fully examined or maturely considered than in Sowden, &c. v. McMillan's heirs, 4 Dana's R. 456. The views of the learned judge (Marshall) who delivered the opinion in which the whole court concurred, are rested on the authority of several cases in Kentucky, previously decided, on a series of decisions made by the Supreme court of New York, and on the three British cases of Bateman v. Allen, Allen v. Rivington, and Read & Morpeth v. Erington, before mentioned. "These three cases (he says) establish unquestionably the right of the plaintiff to recover when it appears that he was in possession, and that the defendant entered upon and ousted his possession, without title or authority to enter; and prove that when the possession of the plaintiff and an entry upon it by the defendant are shown, the right of recovery cannot be resisted by showing that there is or may be an outstanding title in another; but only by showing that the defendant himself either has title or authority to enter under the title."

"It is a natural principle of justice, that he who is in possession has the right to maintain it, and if wrongfully expelled, to regain it by entry on the wrong-doer. When titles are acknowledged as separate and distinct from the possession, this right of maintaining and regaining the possession is, of course, subject to the exception that it cannot be exercised against the real owner, in competition with whose title it wholly fails. But surely it is not accordant with the principles of justice, that he who ousts a previous possession, should be permitted to defend his wrongful possession against the claim of restitution merely

178 by *showing that a stranger, and not the previous possessor whom he has ousted, was entitled to the possession. The law protects a peaceable possession against all except him who has the actual right to the possession, and no other can rightfully disturb or intrude upon it. While the peaceable possession continues, it is protected against a claimant in the action of ejectment, by permitting the defendant to show that a third person and not the claimant has the right. But if the claimant, instead of resorting to his action, attempt to gain the possession by entering upon and ousting the existing peaceable possession, he does not thereby acquire a rightful or a peaceable possession. The law does not protect him against the prior possessor. Neither does it indulge any presumption in his favor, nor permit him to gain any advantage by his own wrongful act."

In Adams v. Tiernan, 5 Dana's R. 394, the same doctrine is held; it being there again announced that a peaceable possession wrongfully divested, ought to be restored, and is sufficient to maintain the action; and that no mere outstanding superior right of entry in a stranger, can be used availably as a shield by the trespasser in such action. It has also been repeatedly reaffirmed in later decisions of the Supreme court of New York; and may therefore be regarded as the well settled law of that state and of Kentucky.

To the same effect are the decisions in New Jersey, Connecticut, Vermont and Ohio. Penton's lessee v. Sinnickson, 4 Halst. R. 149; Law v. Wilson, 2 Root's R. 102; Ellithorp v. Dewing, 1 Chipm. R. 141; Warner v. Page, 4 Verm. R. 294; Ludlow's heirs v. McBride, 3 Ohio R. 240; Newnam's lessee v. The City of Cincinnati, 18 Ohio R. 327. In the case of Ellithorp v. Dewing, 1 Chipm. R. 141, the rule is thus stated:

179 "Actual seizin is sufficient to recover as well as to defend against a *stranger to the title. He who is first seized may recover or defend against any one except him who has a paramount title. If disseized by a stranger, he may maintain an action of ejectment against the disseizor, and in like manner the disseizor may maintain an action against all persons except his disseizee, or some one having a paramount title."

In Delaware, North Carolina, South Carolina, Indiana, and perhaps in other states of the Union, the opposite doctrine has been held.

In this state of the law, untrammelled as we are by any decisions of our own courts, I feel free to adopt that rule which seems to me best calculated to attain the ends of justice. The explanation of the law (as usually announced) given by Judge Marshall in the portions of his opinion which I have cited, seems to me to be founded on just and correct reasoning; and I am disposed to follow those decisions which uphold a peaceable possession for the protection as well of a plaintiff as of a defendant in ejectment, rather than those which invite disorderly scrambles for the possession, and clothe a mere trespasser with the means of maintaining his wrong, by showing defects, however slight, in the title of him on whose peaceable possession he has intruded without shadow of authority or title.

The authorities in support of the maintenance of ejectment upon the force of a mere prior possession, however, hold it essential that the prior possession must have been removed by the entry or intrusion of the defendant; and that the entry under which the defendant holds the possession must have been a trespass upon the prior possession. Sowden v. McMillan's heirs, 4 Dana's R. 456. And it is also said that constructive possession is not sufficient to maintain trespass to real property; that actual possession is required, 180 *and hence that where the injury is done to an heir or devisee by an abator, before he has entered, he cannot maintain trespass until his re-entry. 2 Tucker's Comm. 191. An apparent difficulty, therefore, in the way of a recovery by the plaintiffs, arises from the absence of positive proof of their possession at the time of the defendant's entry. It is to be observed, however, that there is no proof to the contrary. Mrs. Lewis died in possession of the premises, and there is no proof that they were vacant at the time of the defendant's entry. And in Gilbert's Tenures 37, (in note,) it is stated, as the law, that as the heir has the right to the hereditaments descending, the law presumes that he has the possession also. The presumption may indeed, like all other presumptions, be rebutted: but if the possession be not shown to be in another, the law concludes it to be in the heir.

The presumption is but a fair and reasonable one; and does, I think, arise here; and as the only evidence tending to show that the defendant sets up any pretense of right to the land, is the certificate of the surveyor of Buckingham, of an entry by the defendant, for the same, in his office, in December 1844; and his possession of the land must, according to the evidence, have commenced at least as early as some time in the year 1842; it seems to me that he must be regarded as standing in the attitude of a mere intruder on the possession of the plaintiffs.

Whether we might not in this case presume the whole of the purchase money to be paid, and regard the plaintiffs as having a perfect equitable title to the premises, and in that view as entitled to recover by force of such title; or whether we might not resort to the still further presumption in their favor, of a conveyance of the legal title, are questions which I have not thought it necessary to consider; the 181 view, which *I have already taken of the case, being sufficient, in my opinion, to justify us in affirming the judgment.

I. NATURE OF THE REMEDY.

The action of ejectment is designed to try both the title and right of possession to the land in controversy. The plaintiff cannot recover without showing that he is entitled to the possession; and the defendant without having any right to the possession himself, may generally prevent a recovery by the plaintiff, by showing an outstanding right of possession in another. 4 Min. Inst. (3d Ed.) 444 et seq.; Davis v. Mayo, 82 Va. 97; Olinger v. Shepherd, 12 Gratt. 471.

II. FOR WHAT THE ACTION LIES.

Land Subject to Dower.—A plaintiff in an action of ejectment may recover land which is subject to the dower of a widow, if such dower has not been assigned; for, until the dower is assigned she has no right to the possession of any of the land. The plaintiff's recovery in such case, however, is subject to the title of the widow. Chapman v. Armistead, 4 Munf. 382; Moore v. Gilliam, 5 Munf. 346.

Where Right of Easement Is in Defendant.—A recovery of a judgment in ejectment is subject to any easement in the public to use the land as a street or highway; and the right of the public to the easement is not drawn in question or in any way affected by the controversy between the plaintiff and the defendant as to the ownership of the fee. Warwick v. Mayo, 15 Gratt. 528.

Breach of Condition Subsequent in a Deed.—Where land is granted upon a condition subsequent, and there is a breach of the condition, the grantee's estate is determined by this breach, and an action of ejectment can be maintained by the grantor against the grantee for the recovery of the land. Martin v. Ohio R. R. Co., 37 W. Va. 349, 16 S. E. Rep. 589.

But where a stipulation in a deed does not amount to a condition subsequent, the grantor cannot maintain ejectment upon nonperformance of the stipulation. Brown v. Caldwell, 23 W. Va. 187. In Carper v. Cook, 39 W. Va. 346, 19 S. E. Rep. 379, land was sold to the board of education for school purposes, and afterwards the board of education ceased to use the land for such purposes, and sold it to a third person. It was held that ejectment would not lie by the grantor, for the recovery of the land.

Incorporeal Hereditaments.—Under the Virginia statute which provides, that "a party having an interest in or claim to land held adversely by another may sell and convey the same, and his grantee may maintain ejectment for it," an action of ejectment may be maintained for the recovery of an incorporeal hereditament. Code of 1887, § 2418; Carrington v. Goddin, 13 Gratt. 587; Reynolds v. Cook, 83 Va. 817, 3 S. E. Rep. 710.

A grant of a right to quarry and remove limestone for certain specific purposes, has been held to be not a mere license, but an interest in or a right arising out of land, and as such, to constitute under the Va. Code, the foundation for an action of ejectment. Reynolds v. Cook, 83 Va. 817, 3 S. E. Rep. 710.

Land Dedicated to Public or Charitable Uses.—Where land is reserved by a grantor in a deed, and dedicated to a public or charitable use, no title passes by subsequent conveyances of the tract out of which the reservation was made, though these conveyances be without reservation; and if a subsequent grantee takes possession of the land so dedicated by reservation, the dedicator may maintain an action of ejectment for it. Benn v. Hatcher, 81 Va. 25.

Action to Recover the Use of Certain Lands.—According to the terms of a covenant annexed to a deed, the grantor of a tract of land had a right to its use, when it was not required or needed for the purposes of the grantee. In an action of ejectment brought by the grantor to recover the use of the lands which were unemployed by the grantee, it was held, that under the Virginia Code, §§ 2730, 2738, ejectment would not lie to recover the mere use of unemployed or unoccupied lands for an uncertain and indefinite period. King v. Norfolk, etc., Ry. Co., (Va. 1901), 7 Va. Law Reg. 403.

Where the Land Claimed Is Uncertain—Election.—Where there is an intention on the part of the grantor to except from the operation of a deed certain lands which would otherwise be covered by such deed, the land intended to be excepted must be described with certainty in order to withdraw it from the operation of the deed. Unless the land is described with certainty the grantor cannot maintain an action of ejectment for it. Butcher v. Creel, 9 Gratt. 201.

But uncertainty in the reservation of a deed may be cured by the election of the grantor made within a reasonable time; and after such election, the grantor may maintain an action of ejectment for the land which he elects to take. Benn v. Hatcher, 81 Va. 25.

Land Granted with Reservations to Prior Holders.—The commonwealth, by patent granted a tract of land containing 70,202 acres, within specified metes and bounds, by a survey containing a surplus of 42,000 acres, held by titles having legal preference to the warrants and rights, upon which the grant was founded. A reservation was therefore made in favor of those titles in general terms. It was decided that under the terms of this patent, the grantee was entitled to recover in ejectment all the land within the metes and bounds thereof, except such as the defendants might show themselves entitled to, under the said reservation. Hopkins v. Ward, 6 Munf. 38. See also, Nichols v. Covey, 4 Rand. 365; Bryan v. Willard, 21 W. Va. 65.

Land Forfeited for Nonpayment of Taxes.—The heirs of a patentee of land forfeited for nonpayment of taxes and not redeemed, cannot maintain ejectment for it against a party who has entered upon it peaceably, though the tenant has no title to the land. Ushers v. Pride, 15 Gratt. 190.

III. TITLE TO SUPPORT THE ACTION.

A. IN GENERAL.

General Rule.—The general rule in ejectment is that the plaintiff must show a legal title in himself, and a present right of possession under it at the time of the commencement of the action. He must recover on the strength of his own title and not on the weakness of his adversary's. As the party in possession is presumed to be the owner until the contrary is proved, it is necessary for the claimant in ejectment to show in himself a good and sufficient title to the land, to enable him to recover from the defendant. He will not be satisfied by the weakness of the defendant's claim. The possession of the latter gives him the right against every man who cannot establish a title, and if he can answer the case on the part of the claimant by showing the real title to the land to be in another, it will be sufficient for his defence, although he does not pretend that he holds the land with this consent or under the authority of the real owner. Suttle v. Rich., etc., R. Co., 76 Va. 284; Nelson v. Triplett, 81 Va. 236; Russell v. Allmond, 92 Va. 484, 23 S. E. Rep. 895; Holly River Coal Co. v. Howell, 36 W. Va. 489, 15 S. E. Rep. 214; Reusers v. Lawson, 91 Va. 226, 21 S. E. Rep. 347; Atkinson v. Smith (Va.), 24 S. E. Rep. 901; Bradley v. Ewart, 18 W. Va. 598; Witten v. St. Clair, 27 W. Va. 762; Slocum v. Compton, 93 Va. 374, 25 S. E. Rep. 3; Low v. Settle, 82 W. Va. 600, 9 S. E. Rep. 922; McKinney v. Daniel, 90 Va. 704, 19 S. E. Rep. 880; Voight v. Raby, 90 Va. 799, 20 S. E. Rep. 824.

Exceptions to the General Rule.—A person in peaceable possession of land which is entered upon, and who is ousted by a stranger without title, may recover in ejectment upon the strength of his mere previous possession. The reason is, that actual seisin is evidence of title against all the world, except the true owner, and the law will not permit that seisin to be wantonly invaded by one who himself has no title. Lee v. Tapscott, 2 Wash. 276; Suttle v. Richmond, etc., R. Co., 76 Va. 289; Witten v. St. Clair, 27 W. Va. 762.

A tenant let into possession under a lease is estopped to deny the title of his landlord, and this estoppel may be relied on in ejectment. Here again, the estoppel is founded on a permissive possession, and is admitted to be a departure from the strict rule of law, which requires that the plaintiff in ejectment must recover on the strength of his own title, and not on the weakness of his adversary's. Miller v. Williams, 15 Gratt. 213; Alderson v. Miller, 15 Gratt. 279; Suttle v. Rich., etc., R. Co., 76 Va. 289; Witten v. St. Clair, 27 W. Va. 762.

Equitable Title Insufficient.—It is a well-established rule that an equitable title is not sufficient to support an action of ejectment. Ruffners v. Lewis, 7 Leigh 720; Suttle v. Rich., etc., R. Co., 76 Va. 284; Russell v. Allmond, 92 Va. 484, 23 S. E. Rep. 895; Slocum v. Compton, 93 Va. 374, 25 S. E. Rep. 3.

Title from a Common Source.—In ejectment, when both parties claim title from a common grantor, the rule is well settled that it is prima facie sufficient for the plaintiff to prove such common derivation of title, without proving that such person had title to the land in controversy. Bolling v. Teel, 76 Va. 487; Laidley v. Cent. Land Co., 30 W. Va. 505, 4 S. E. Rep. 705; Low v. Settle, 32 W. Va. 600, 9 S. E. Rep. 922; Carrell v. Mitchell, 37 W. Va. 180, 16 S. E. Rep. 453.

When Title Must Exist in Plaintiff.—The plaintiff must have title to the land in controversy at the commencement of the suit in order to support an action of ejectment. Suttle v. Rich., etc., R. Co., 76 Va. 284; Russell v. Allmond, 92 Va. 484, 23 S. E. Rep. 895. But it has been held that the conveyance of the land in controversy by the plaintiff pending an action of ejectment does not affect his right of recovery. Beckwith v. Thompson, 18 W. Va. 103.

What Is Sufficient Proof of Title.—A plaintiff in an action of ejectment may show his title by tracing it back to a grant from the commonwealth, or he may show such a state of facts as will warrant the jury in presuming a grant from the commonwealth. Sulphur Mines Co. v. Thompson, 93 Va. 293, 25 S. E. Rep. 232. And he may recover under one or the other of two demises of the same land, from different persons. Hopkins v. Ward, 6 Munf. 38; See v. Greenlee, 6 Munf. 302.

B. ADVERSE POSSESSION.

Actual Possession under Color of Title.—A person having held actual possession of land for more than fifteen years under color of title, and being then ousted by another who is a mere trespasser without pretence of title, may recover in ejectment against such trespasser, though it does not appear that the land has ever been granted by the commonwealth. Middleton v. Johns, 4 Gratt. 129.

See generally, on this subject, monographic note on "Adverse Possession" appended to Nowlin v. Reynolds, 25 Gratt. 137.

Temporary Possession Insufficient to Give Title.—It was held in Pasley v. English, 5 Gratt. 141, that a temporary possession of land, by cutting and sawing timber upon it, was not such adversary possession as would give title, and enable a party to sue in ejectment.

In ejectment, where it appeared from the evidence that the land in controversy was vacant when the defendant came to the possession of it peaceably and quietly, without any privity between him and the lessors of the plaintiff or those under whom they claimed, it was held that the plaintiff could not recover, upon the ground of the prior possession of the lessors, without proving twenty years uninterrupted adverse possession on their part or on the part of those under whom they claimed; or showing a right to the possession by the death and seisin, in the manner prescribed by the act of assembly, of some person under whom they claimed. Moody v. McKim, 5 Munf. 374.

Adverse Possession—Interlocks.—A plaintiff in an action of ejectment claiming title by adverse possession, though he recovers other parts of the tract claimed, cannot recover possession of an interlock which has never been in his actual possession and which has been occupied for a long time by the defendant. The plaintiff must show possession of the interlock or some portion of it for the period of the statutory bar before his claim will ripen into title. Breeden v. Haney, 95 Va. 622, 29 S. E. Rep. 328;

Garrett v. Ramsey, 26 W. Va. 345; Congrove v. Burdett, 28 W. Va. 220.

Defect in a Deed Cured by Possession under It.—In ejectment, the jury having found twenty years' possession in the plaintiff, an objection to one of his title deeds that it was not indented, and expressed no consideration, was not sufficient to prevent a judgment in his favor. Kinney v. Beverley, 2 H. & M. 318.

Grant Presumed from Possession.—Plaintiffs in an action of ejectment, claimed under possession taken by a party in 1792, and a continuous, open, and notorious possession by persons claiming under the party who originally took possession. The defendants had only been on the land a few years, not even under color of title, and they sought to defeat the action by showing an outstanding title in a third person. It was held, that as against these defendants, a grant would be presumed to the person under whom the plaintiffs claimed. Carter v. Robinett, 33 Gratt. 429.

IV. PARTIES.

A. WHO MAY BRING THE ACTION.

Parties Entitled to Sue in Writ of Right Prior to 1850.

—By the Code of Va. of 1849, the action of ejectment was enlarged to embrace all cases which were formerly covered by the writ of right. If a party was entitled to recover in a writ of right before the Code of 1849 went into effect, he is entitled to recover in the present action of ejectment under the provisions of that Code (ch. 135, 149). Mitchell v. Baratta, 17 Gratt. 445.

Cestui Que Trust.—A cestui que trust, after the purposes of the deed have been satisfied, may maintain ejectment, upon a demise in his own name, although the legal estate is still in his trustee. Hopkins v. Ward, 6 Munf. 38.

Trustees.—The fact that a cestui que trust may maintain ejectment, after the trust is satisfied, does not deprive the trustee holding the legal title, of his right to maintain such an action. Hopkins v. Stephens, 2 Rand. 422.

Purchaser from a Trustee.—A conveyance of the trust property by a trustee, though in violation of the terms of the trust deed, passes an absolute legal title to the property, defeasible only in a court of equity, and the purchaser from the trustee may maintain an action of ejectment against the party in possession. Taylor v. King, 6 Munf. 358; Harris v. Harris, 6 Munf. 367.

Co-tenants Inter Se.—Ejectment may be maintained by one tenant in common against another; but in such case actual ouster must be shown by the plaintiff before he can maintain the action. The pro forma confession of ouster which a defendant was compelled to make under the old "consent rule" before being allowed to plead, was not sufficient to satisfy this rule. Taylor v. Hill, 10 Leigh 457.

Co-tenants against Third Persons.—A plaintiff in an action of ejectment cannot recover that to which he has not the legal title, therefore a co-tenant cannot recover the share of another co-tenant. If a partition has been made which is effectual, each joint tenant is still seised of his individual share of the whole, and that will be the extent of his recovery in an action of ejectment. Nye v. Lovitt, 93 Va. 710, 24 S. E. Rep. 345.

Action by a Grantor after Making a Void Grant.—A deed of bargain and sale and release of land, from a person not in possession, to another in the same predicament, the land being at the time held by a third person with adverse title, passes nothing, and therefore does not divest the bargainor of his right to recover in ejectment. Hopkins v. Ward, 6 Munf. 38.

Assignee of a Mortgage.—The possession of the mortgagor, continuing by the mortgagee's permission, is to be considered the possession of the mortgagee; so that, where the latter could recover in ejectment, his deed assigning the mortgage will enable the assignee to recover in like manner. A final decree of foreclosure, in favor of the assignee of a mortgage, ought to put to rest any controversy between the parties thereto, on the ground of any supposed defect in the deed of assignment. Chapman v. Armistead, 4 Munf. 382.

Party Claiming under a Decree.—A decree requiring the execution of a conveyance to a party, does not of itself vest title to the land in that party, and he cannot maintain an action of ejectment for it until there has been a deed executed to him. Aldridge v. Giles, 3 H. & M. 136; Nelson v. Triplett, 81 Va. 236.

Reversioner.—Where there was a devise to a person and the heirs of his body, but if he died without heirs of the body, then a limitation over the heirs of the grantor; this was held to be a fee simple defeasible upon the devisee dying without heirs of the body; and when the devisee died without heirs of the body, the heirs of the grantor were allowed to sue for and recover the land in an action of ejectment. Elys v. Wynne, 22 Gratt. 224. See also, Corr v. Porter, 33 Gratt. 278; Hyer v. Shobe, 2 Munf. 200; Burke v. Lee, 76 Va. 386.

Ejectment by the Heir—Presumption.—Where an ancestor dies in possession of land, the presumption of law is that the heir is in possession after the death of the ancestor; and in the absence of all evidence on the point, the heir may maintain ejectment upon the strength of his possession, against one who has entered upon the land without title, or authority to enter under the title outstanding in another. Tapscott v. Cobbs, 11 Gratt. 172.

Heirs of an Executor.—On the death of an executor who had acquired the legal title to land at a trustee's sale, his heirs were the proper parties to bring ejectment, whether the property was purchased by their ancestor in his own right, or for the benefit of his testator's estate. Sulphur Mines Co. v. Thompson, 93 Va. 293, 25 S. E. Rep. 232.

Action by the Person in Possession of the Premises.—Virginia Code, sec. 2726, as amended by Acts 1895-6, p. 514, provides that: "The person actually occupying the premises and any person claiming title thereto or claiming any interest therein adversely to the plaintiff may also at the discretion of the plaintiff be named defendant in the declaration. If there be no person actually occupying the premises adversely to the plaintiff then the action must be against some person exercising ownership thereon, or claiming title thereto, or some interest therein at the commencement of the suit." It was suggested that under this statute the person in possession of the land might sue in ejectment a person claiming title thereto, but this view is overruled, and it is held that ejectment will not lie in such case. Steinman v. Vicars (Va. 1901), 7 Va. Law Reg. 259.

Patentee of Waste Land.—It is not necessary for a patentee of waste and unappropriated land, to make a personal entry thereon, to enable him to maintain ejectment; for the patent ipso facto confers seisin. Such seisin may be transferred and continued by deed of bargain and sale, or by devise; but a person, whose seisin is interrupted by the actual entry and adverse possession of another, cannot, while out of possession, convey by bargain and sale such a title as will enable the bargainee to recover in ejectment. Clay v. White, 1 Munf. 162.

Heirs of a Patentee.—The heirs of a patentee of land may recover in ejectment, against a person who had the use and occupation of the land as his own, in the lifetime of the patentee, and so continued until after his death, claiming to hold the same by adverse possession; the duration of such possession having been less than twenty years. See v. Greenlee, 6 Munf. 303; Clay v. White, 1 Munf. 162; Clay v. Ransome, 1 Munf. 454. In such case, if the heirs being out of possession of the land, have executed a deed of bargain and sale of the same to a third person, such bargainee cannot recover in ejectment; but the bargainors may. See v. Greenlee, 6 Munf. 303; Hopkins v. Ward, 6 Munf. 38; Ushers v. Pride, 15 Gratt. 190.

Junior Patentee.—A patent is the consummation of the legal title, and passes to the grantee the legal estate and seisin of the commonwealth. Accordingly, where a patent contained a reservation in favor of a prior claimant who relied only on his entry and survey, and under these circumstances, a patent including the land so claimed and without a reservation, was issued to a junior patentee, the latter acquired the legal title, and his title prevailed in an action of ejectment. Carter v. Hagan, 75 Va. 557.

In an action of ejectment, the plaintiff rested his title on a grant dated in 1796 of 20,000 acres; defendant relied on a patent dated in 1795, for an equal tract adjoining the plaintiff's tract, and a resurvey by order of court in 1835, for the purpose of more certainly establishing the lines of the original grant. The resurvey contained 26,650 acres, the difference being within plaintiff's tract. The lines of the resurvey, however, did not correspond with those of the original grant. It was held that the title to the 6,650 acres was founded on new rights acquired subsequent to the plaintiff's patent, and could not affect the plaintiff's title. Randolph v. Longdale Iron Co., 84 Va. 457, 5 S. E. Rep. 30.

Action by the Commonwealth.—An act directed the public engineer to lay off a road and sites for bridges thereon, and declared that upon the return of the plats thereof to the clerks' offices of the county courts in which the road located lay, the land should be vested in the commonwealth for the use of the road. It was held, that on compliance with the law, the title to the land on which the road was located, and the sites of the bridges were fixed, was vested in the commonwealth; and that the commonwealth or her grantee might maintain ejectment therefor against the former owner. James R. & K. Co. v. Thompson, 3 Gratt. 270.

Parties Claiming under a Statute—Virginia.—A plaintiff in ejectment who does not claim title by grant from the commonwealth, but by certain proceedings had under sec. 41, ch. 108, Code of 1873 as amended by Acts 1879-80, p. 205, must bring himself within the terms of this act. This act provides that the commonwealth's title to land which has been settled continuously for five years, and on which taxes have been paid within five years by the person in possession, shall be relinquished to the person in possession of the land claiming the same under such settlement and payment. Where the evidence showed that the plaintiff's grantor was not in possession when proceedings under such act were begun, it was held proper for the court to sustain a demurrer to evidence, for want of title in the plaintiff. Slocum v. Compton, 93 Va. 374, 25 S. E. Rep. 3.

Parties Claiming under a Statute—West Virginia.—The act of 1841 vested title to land in those who were in actual possession under claim of title, derived from or under a grant. Parties who claim under this act, must show possession under title or claim derived from or under a grant of the commonwealth. It was held that the parties in an action of ejectment who claimed title from a patent issued on different entries and surveys of different dates, must show within which of the entries or surveys the land lay, which they claimed as actual occupants under this act. Kenna v. Quarrier, 3 W. Va. 210.

Purchaser from Insolvent Debtor.—Where a person taken in execution is discharged as an insolvent debtor, the estate in lands belonging to him at the time of such discharge is, by the statute (1 Rev. Code, 1819, ch. 134, p. 538), so completely vested in the sheriff of the county wherein such lands lie, that an action of ejectment for such lands cannot afterwards be maintained on the demise of the insolvent debtor, while the execution remains unsatisfied. Syrus v. Allison, 2 Rob. 200.

Collateral Agreement No Bar to the Action.—An agreement between a tenant in possession and the plaintiff in an action of ejectment, that if the plaintiff recovers against the tenant's lessor, a lease shall be executed by the plaintiff in the same terms as that subsisting before, does not operate to bar the action by the plaintiff, which joins the tenant as a defendant. Carrington v. Otis, 4 Gratt. 235.

Bill in Equity by a Party Who May Maintain Ejectment.—Where a party has a complete and adequate remedy at law for the recovery of land, equity has no jurisdiction. A bill in equity in such case is called an "ejectment bill" and is demurrable. Stuart v. Coalter, 4 Rand. 74; Lange v. Jones, 5 Leigh 192; Carrington v. Otis, 4 Gratt. 235; Stearns v. Harman, 80 Va. 48; Jones v. Fox, 20 W. Va. 370.

A widow claiming to be the sole heir of her deceased husband has not a right to file a bill in chancery against parties claiming to be heirs of her husband, who are in possession of the property of her deceased husband as his heirs, and obtain from the court a decision, as to who are the true heirs of the husband, and be put into possession of her husband's land, if she established herself to be his sole heir. In such case her remedy is in a common-law court by ejectment. Jones v. Fox, 20 W. Va. 370.

A court of equity has no jurisdiction to settle the title or bounds of lands between adverse claimants, unless the plaintiff has an equity against the defendants claiming adversely to him. An equity against other persons will not give such jurisdiction. The remedy in such case is by an action of ejectment. Stuart v. Coalter, 4 Rand. 74; Lange v. Jones, 5 Leigh 192; Carrington v. Otis, 4 Gratt. 235.

A court of equity has no jurisdiction to remove a cloud upon the title to land, where the party who asks for relief is out of possession. He has a complete remedy at law in an action of ejectment for the recovery of the land. Otey v. Stuart, 91 Va. 714, 22 S. E. Rep. 513; Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Taylor, 93 Va. 231, 24 S. E. Rep. 1013; Stearns v. Harman, 80 Va. 48.

B. AGAINST WHOM THE ACTION MAY BE BROUGHT.

Party in Possession—Common-Law Rule.—At common law the rule is well established that the action of ejectment must be brought against the tenants in possession. The landlord has a right to be made a joint defendant, however, through fear that he may be injured by a combination between the plaintiff and his tenant; but he may waive this right, or having asserted it, he may relinquish it by consent to the plaintiff. Herbert v. Alexander, 2 Call 502; Stearns v. Harman, 80 Va. 48; Southgate v. Walker, 2 W. Va. 427; Hauks v. Price, 33 Gratt. 107. In an action of ejectment the facts proven at the trial, did not show that the defendant was in possession of the land described in the declaration, at the time the action was brought. It was held, that the plaintiff was not entitled to a judgment against him, although the plaintiff's title and right to recover were perfect in all other respects. Nor did the common-law consent rule, then in force, obviate the necessity of its being proved or admitted on the trial, that the defendant was in possession of the land sued for, at the time the suit was brought. Southgate v. Walker, 2 W. Va. 427.

Ejectment may be brought against several persons; in possession of any part of the tract of land claimed by the lessor of the plaintiff. Stuart v. Coalter, 4 Rand. 74.

Party Claiming Title—Statutory Rule.—The Virginia Code, ch. 131, sec. 5, provides "that the person actually occupying the premises shall be named defendant in the declaration. If they be not occupied, the action must be against some person exercising ownership thereon, or claiming title thereto, or some interest therein at the commencement of the suit." So in Stearns v. Harman, 80 Va. 48, a bill in equity asking for relief when there was no person in possession of the land, was dismissed, because ejectment might have been brought against the person claiming title to the land. This statute was also construed in Harvey v. Tyler, 3 Wall. (U. S.) 134. See also, Postlewaite v. Wise, 17 W. Va. 14.

V. DEMAND AND NOTICE TO QUIT.

Necessity of Notice.—Where a purchaser of land is put in possession without a conveyance having been made to him, he is a tenant at will, and his possession is lawful, until demand of possession is made by the owner, and refusal is made by the tenant. In such case, the vendor is bound to make demand for the premises, and serve the tenant with notice to quit before bringing an action of ejectment; and this is true even though the vendee may be entitled in equity to a specific execution of the contract. Twyman v. Hawley, 24 Gratt. 512; Williamson v. Paxton, 18 Gratt. 475; Pettit v. Cowherd, 83 Va. 20, 1 S. E. Rep. 392; Jones v. Temple, 87 Va. 210, 12 S. E. Rep. 404.

Tenant by Sufferance—Notice Not Essential.—Where a party is in possession of land under a contract which has already been declared null and void, he is merely a tenant by sufferance, and as such not entitled to notice to quit before ejectment can be maintained by his landlord for the premises. McClung v. Echols, 5 W. Va. 204.

VI. DEFENCES.

A. LIMITATIONS OR ADVERSE POSSESSION.

Adverse Possession a Good Defence.—Where there is adverse possession by the defendant of the premises for the period of the statutory bar, this of course is a good defence to an action of ejectment. Va. Midland R. Co. v. Barbour, 97 Va. 118, 33 S. E. Rep. 554; Taylor v. Burnside, 1 Gratt. 190; Creek- mur v. Creekmur, 75 Va. 430; Thomas v. Jones, 28 Gratt. 383; Va. Min. & Imp. Co. v. Hoover, 82 Va. 449; Bream v. Cooper, 5 Munf. 7; Andrews v. Roseland Iron & Coal Co., 89 Va. 393, 16 S. E. Rep. 252; Stull v. Rich Patch Iron Co., 92 Va. 253, 23 S. E. Rep. 293; Core v. Faupel, 24 W. Va. 238; Adams v. Alkire, 20 W. Va. 480; Lagorio v. Dozier, 91 Va. 492, 22 S. E. Rep. 239.

See monographic note on "Adverse Possession" appended to Nowlin v. Reynolds, 25 Gratt. 137.

When the Statute Commences to Run.—The statute of limitations does not commence to run in favor of an occupant of land, while the title thereto is vested in the state. But the statute does commence to run in favor of such occupant against the grantee of the state, from the date of the grant of the land so occupied. Hall v. Webb, 21 W. Va. 318; Adams v. Alkire, 20 W. Va. 480; Shanks v. Lancaster, 5 Gratt. 110; Reusens v. Lawson, 91 Va. 226, 21 S. E. Rep. 347.

Injunction to Judgment on Ground of Lapse of Time.—An injunction to a judgment in an action of ejectment, will not be dissolved, where it appears that the plaintiff in the action, was guilty of laches and has acquiesced in the claim of the defendant for the period of the statutory bar. Hatcher v. Hall, 77 Va. 573.

"War and Stay Law Period" Must Be Excepted.—A defendant in ejectment is protected by twenty years' possession before the bringing of the action, but the stay law period provided for by the legislature is not to be counted in his favor. Clay v. Ransome, 1 Munf. 454; Va. Min., etc., Co. v. Hoover, 82 Va. 449; Hall v. Webb, 21 W. Va. 318. But a statute providing for the war and stay law period, so far as it relates to actions for recovery of land, is unconstitutional and void, as to actions which had become barred before the passage of that act. Hall v. Webb, 21 W. Va. 318.

Burden of Proving Adverse Possession.—Where defendants in ejectment rely upon adverse possession as a defence, the burden of proving adverse possession is on them. They must show not only entry, but that their possession has been continuous during a period necessary to give title under the statute of limitations. A break in the possession restores the seisin of the true owner. Stonestreet v. Doyle, 75 Va. 356; Turpin v. Saunders, 32 Gratt. 27; Parkersburg, etc., Co. v. Schultz, 43 W. Va. 470, 27 S. E. Rep. 255; White v. Ward, 35 W. Va. 418, 14 S. E. Rep. 22.

Ejectment for Rent—Saving in Favor of Infants Not Applicable.—The saving in favor of infants, married women or insane persons in sec. 36, ch. 135, of the Code, in relation to actions of ejectment was held not to apply to actions of ejectment brought by the lessee to recover possession of the leased premises, which had been recovered by the landlord, under his right of re-entry for rent in arrears, as provided for by § 16, ch. 138, of the Code. In such case the lessee is always barred in twelve months. Leonard v. Henderson, 23 Gratt. 331.

Possession Not Adverse.—An open, exclusive, notorious and uninterrupted possession of land for more than twenty years, taken, held, and claimed under a parol gift from a plaintiff in ejectment, for a life not yet terminated, is no bar to his recovery in the action. Clarke v. McClure, 10 Gratt. 305; Flanagan v. Grimmet, 10 Gratt. 421.

The holder and claimant of property, under an equitable title derived from a vendor or grantor, who retains the legal title for future conveyance, does not hold adversely but in subordination to the grantor's title; and no length of possession under such title will ripen into such a title as to bar an action of ejectment brought by a second grantee, who has the legal title. Nowlin v. Reynolds, 25 Gratt. 137; Garrett v. Ramsey, 26 W. Va. 345.

B. OUTSTANDING TITLE IN A THIRD PARTY.

Outstanding Title Must Be Valid.—To defeat an action of ejectment by an outstanding title in a stranger, the defendant must show it to be a present, subsisting, operative legal title, on which the owner could recover if asserting it by action. It is not for the plaintiff to disprove its validity. Parkersburg Industrial Co. v. Schultz, 43 W. Va. 470, 27 S. E. Rep. 255; Wilson v. Braden (W. Va.), 36 S. E. Rep. 367; Wilcher v. Robertson, 78 Va. 602; Jarrett v. Stevens, 36 W. Va. 445, 15 S. E. Rep. 177; Atkins v. Lewis, 14 Gratt. 30.

An outstanding title which will defeat an action of ejectment must be one that is subsisting and superior at the commencement of the action. Jarrett v. Stevens, 36 W. Va. 445, 15 S. E. Rep. 177.

One who is in actual possession of land, cannot defeat an action of ejectment, by showing that he had conveyed his title to another, before the commencement of the action. Wilson v. Braden (W. Va.), 36 S. E. Rep. 367.

Proof of Outstanding Title Insufficient.—In an action of ejectment it was held that a grant of land by the commonwealth, which was properly issued and authenticated, gave the grantee prima facie title, which could not be resisted in ejectment, by a defendant who had taken possession without color of title, and relied on the fact that the land had been conveyed by an old colonial governor, to a third person, prior to the grant by the commonwealth to the plaintiff. Holloran v. Meisel, 87 Va. 398, 13 S. E. Rep. 33.

Patent—Prima Facie Proof.—Defendants in ejectment relied upon an outstanding title in a third person and offered in evidence an abstract of the patent certified by the register, which was received without objection. It was held that this was to be regarded in the appellate court as prima facie evidence that such a grant was issued, though the case came up on a demurrer to evidence. Atkins v. Lewis, 14 Gratt. 30.

Contract of Purchase.—Where the defendants in an action of ejectment did not attempt to show title in any other person than the plaintiff, but claimed under him, and sought to defend their possession by virtue of a contract of purchase, it was held that they were estopped from disputing his title. McClung v. Echols, 5 W. Va. 204.

C. EQUITABLE DEFENCES.

At Common Law.—At common law no equitable defence is available in an action of ejectment against the plaintiff with the legal title. Taylor v. King, 6 Munf. 358; Harris v. Harris, 6 Munf. 367; Gibson v. Jones, 5 Leigh 370; Carrington v. Goddin, 13 Gratt. 587.

By Statute.—Equitable defences are now very generally allowed by statute to prevail against the party with the legal title in certain specific cases. The defences provided for in Virginia and West Virginia are two:

First.—When a vendor of land seeks to eject the vendee who has no deed, but is in possession under a written contract of purchase signed by the vendor, and the vendee has paid for the land, and is entitled to a deed. Va. Code 1887, sec. 2741; W. Va. Code 1899, ch. 90, sec. 20. The defence under this section is limited to cases where the whole contract, and its precise terms. is manifested by plain written evidence. The written contract itself must be produced before the jury; and parol evidence of its contents is inadmissible, though it may have been lost or destroyed. Davis v. Teays, 3 Gratt. 283; Carrell v. Mitchell, 37 W. Va. 130, 16 S. E. Rep. 453; Jennings v. Gravely, 92 Va. 377, 23 S. E. Rep. 763; Suttle v. Richmond, etc., R. Co., 76 Va. 284.

Second.—Where the sum, a mortgage or deed of trust was given to secure, has been paid, and the owner of the land is in possession, and the mortgagee or trustee brings ejectment. Code of Va. 1887, sec. 2742; W. Va. Code 1899, ch. 90, sec. 20. Under this section the defence is limited to mortgages and deeds of trust, where the mortgage money has been fully paid, or to sales, where the vendee has paid all the purchase money and performed everything incumbent on him, so as to entitle him to the specific execution of the contract in equity, and a conveyance of the legal title, without any condition proper in equity to be imposed on him. It must be a sale, and not a partnership in the acquisition of the land; and the terms of the contract must be plain. Davis v. Teays, 3 Gratt. 283; Carrell v. Mitchell, 37 W. Va. 130, 16 S. E. Rep. 453; Suttle v. Richmond, etc., R. Co., 76 Va. 284; Jennings v. Gravely, 92 Va. 377, 23 S. E. Rep. 763.

Statute Strictly Construed.—The legislative enactment providing for equitable defences in certain specified cases was dictated not by a general, but a restricted policy, having in view on the one hand the preventing of gross injustice to the tenant in possession, and on the other guarding against the evils of a complicated and protracted litigation. The defendant who cannot bring himself within the terms of this statute, though he has a perfect equitable title, must fall in his defence against the plaintiff with the legal title and immediate right of possession. Davis v. Teays, 3 Gratt. 283; Jennings v. Gravely, 92 Va. 377, 23 S. E. Rep. 763; Suttle v. Richmond, etc., R. Co., 76 Va. 284.

Notice of Equitable Defences.—The statute allowing equitable defences requires that a notice of such defence must be given to the plaintiff at least ten days before the trial. If the defendant does not file the notice as required by this section, his defence will not avail him at the trial. Carrell v. Mitchell, 37 W. Va. 130, 16 S. E. Rep. 453.

VII. PLEADING AND PRACTICE.

A. FORUM OF THE ACTION.—Land is immovable property, and the universal law of nations is, that the forum rei sitæ in actions at law is the only jurisdiction in which the right or title to immovables can be determined, and the judgment of such forum is absolutely conclusive in such cases. Witten v. St. Clair, 27 W. Va. 762.

B. THE DECLARATION.

Description and Location of the Property.—The declaration in an action of ejectment must describe the premises sought to be recovered with sufficient certainty. What is sufficient certainty will depend largely upon the circumstances of the particular case. But as the purpose of the description, is to identify the land so as to enable possession to be given after judgment rendered, it may be said to be the general rule that where the description of the property in the declaration is sufficient to enable the sheriff to deliver possession of the property after judgment, it is a sufficient description. Urquhart v. Clarké, 2 Rand. 549; Hitchcox v. Rawson, 14 Gratt. 526; Postlewaite v. Wise, 17 W. Va. 1; Car- ter v. Chesapeake, etc., Ry. Co., 26 W. Va. 644; Kemble v. Herndon, 28 W. Va. 524; Holly River Coal Co. v. Howell, 36 W. Va. 489, 15 S. E. Rep. 214; Fleming Oil & Gas Co. v. South Penn Oil Co., 37 W. Va. 645, 17 S. E. Rep. 203; Clerc v. Greer (W. Va.), 38 S. E. Rep. 485.

In Carter v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 26 W. Va. 644, the declaration described the premises as "a certain lot of land lying in the town of Ronceverte, in the county aforesaid, being the piece of land near the railroad depot in said town, upon which the defendant has erected a pumphouse and appliances for the purpose of supplying its engines with water." Applying the rule above laid down, the court held this description sufficient, and a demurrer to the declaration was overruled.

In Hitchcox v. Rawson, 14 Gratt. 526, a declaration which described the land as a part of a larger tract owned by the plaintiff, near certain creeks which had no public notoriety was held defective and bad on demurrer.

In Clerc v. Greer (W. Va.), 38 S. E. Rep. 485, a description of land showing the county, the quantity, the home farm of which it was a part, the person to whom it was assigned, the suit in which partition was made, and all the lands by which it was bounded, was held sufficient.

In an action of ejectment brought under Code of Virginia of 1860, it was held that the land was described with sufficient certainty, where the declaration stated the county in which it lay, and that it adjoined the "old Postlewaite farm," and that it contained 114 acres, and its boundaries were set out in detail by courses and distances. Postlewaite v. Wise, 17 W. Va. 1.

In Kemble v. Herndon, 28 W. Va. 524, the caption of the declaration was: "West Virginia, Preston County, to wit." The declaration described the land as situated in Preston county, in Kingwood district, and gave a description of it which was minute and accurate. The declaration was held valid, and the fact that it was not stated in the body of the declaration that Preston county was in West Virginia, did not invalidate it.

The Declaration Need Not Allege That the Premises Were "Unlawfully" Withheld.—A declaration in an action of ejectment, which alleged that the plaintiffs were ousted by the defendants, and held out of possession by them, was held sufficient. It was not necessary to allege that the defendants unlawfully withheld possession of the premises from the plaintiffs. Postlewaite v. Wise, 17 W. Va. 1.

Variance in Counts—Effect.—After issue joined in ejectment on the title only, and a verdict for the plaintiff, for the land in one of the counts in the declaration mentioned, it was held to be no ground for a motion in arrest of judgment, that the two counts laid demises of the land from different persons. Throckmorton v. Cooper, 3 Munf. 93; Paul v. Smiley, 4 Munf. 468.

In ejectment, where the demise and ouster were laid precedent to the plaintiff's title, it was held to be cured by the statute of jeofails. Duval v. Bibb, 3 Call 362; Whittington v. Christian, 2 Rand. 353.

Enlarging the Term Laid in the Declaration.—Upon a judgment in ejectment, if execution of the writ of habere facias possessionem be prevented for several years by injunction, the plaintiff is entitled to the writ on motion upon a rule to show cause, without a scire facias, provided not more than a year has elapsed since the affirmance, by the court of appeals, of the decree dissolving the injunction, and dismissing the bill in chancery. In such case, if the term laid in the declaration has expired pending the proceedings on the injunction the court to which the motion is made for the writ, may cause the term to be enlarged and award the writ, upon a rule to show cause, served upon the defendant. Noland v. Seekright, 6 Munf. 185.

That the term stated in a declaration in ejectment has expired, previous to the decision on an appeal, is a circumstance of no importance. Baker v. Seekright, 1 H. & M. 177.

In ejectment, if the term laid in the declaration expire before the decision of the cause, the practice is to grant leave to amend the declaration by enlarging the term. Hunter v. Fairfax, 1 Munf. 218.

Landlord Not Joined in the Declaration—Costs.—A landlord who defended an action of ejectment against his tenant without being joined in such action, was compelled to pay the costs of the action where his defence was unsuccessful, and execution against the tenant for the costs had been returned unsatisfied. Johnston v. Mann, 21 W. Va. 15.

Where a tenant was sued in ejectment for the land so held by him it was held that his landlord was entitled under the act, Code, ch. 135, § 5, to be made a party defendant to the action. Mitchell v. Baratta, 17 Gratt. 445.

Substitution of New Plaintiffs by Amending the Declaration.—When one or more plaintiffs have been named in the declaration in ejectment, and it is afterwards discovered or supposed that other persons may have the right, the same reason that authorizes the joinder of several different persons, not claiming jointly or in common, in an original declaration, admits the introduction of new plaintiffs by an amendment. When this is done, all may proceed in the one suit; the same surveys and depositions, thereafter made and taken, and the same evidence, may be used, as far as competent and relevant; and the rights of all the parties may, at one time, be determined. Strader v. Goff, 6 W. Va. 261.

Undivided Interests—Declaration—Statute.—By section 2730, Virginia Code, it is provided that the plaintiff in ejectment shall state whether he claims in fee, or for life, or for the life of another, or for years, specifying such lives, or the duration of such term, and when he claims an undivided interest he shall state the same. A declaration was held sufficient under this section, which stated that the plaintiffs were possessed each in fee simple absolute, of an undivided share or interest in a tract of land, where the suit was for the whole land so claimed, and not for any part or parcel. Roach v. Blakey, 89 Va. 767, 17 S. E. Rep. 228.

Several Claimants May Be Joined in One Action of Ejectment.—Several tenants, claiming severally, parts of the land sued for, may be sued in one action of ejectment. Camden v. Haskill, 3 Rand. 462.

C. PLEAS.

Under Virginia Statute the Only Plea in Bar is the General Issue.—In an action of ejectment, the only plea in bar of the action, in whole or in part, admissible under the statute (Code 1873, ch. 131, sec. 13) is the plea of "not guilty"; and where the defendant was allowed to file a paper which he called a disclaimer, but which was in effect a special plea, the appellate court held the allowance of the filing of such paper error. Reynolds v. Cook, 83 Va. 817, 3 S. E. Rep. 710.

Defendant May Plead in Abatement—Waiver.—A plea in abatement is admissible in an action of ejectment, and a defendant may waive his plea in abatement and plead in bar. James River, etc., Co. v. Robinson, 16 Gratt. 434.

A defendant in ejectment admitted that he was mistaken as to matters pleaded in abatement, and upon this admission submitted the issue upon the plea to the court, and at the same time asked leave to file the plea of "not guilty." This was in effect a waiver of the plea in abatement, and he should have been permitted to file the plea of "not guilty." James River, etc., Co. v. Robinson, 16 Gratt. 434.

Pleas—West Virginia—Statute.—The Code of West Virginia, ch. 90, sec. 13, provides, "that a defendant in ejectment shall plead the general issue only, which shall be that he is not guilty of unlawfully withholding the premises," etc. It was held proper for the court, in an action of ejectment to sustain a demurrer to a special plea, to a declaration in ejectment under this statute. Johnston v. Griswold, 8 W. Va. 240.

D. NEW TRIALS.

Rule in Regard to New Trials in Ejectment.—A court ought to hold a stricter course towards plaintiffs, moving for new trials, in ejectment, than towards defendants; yet, where a verdict in favor of a defendant, in ejectment, is founded in mistake and produces injustice, it is both the right and duty of the court to grant a new trial. Deems v. Quarrier, 3 Rand. 475.

Motion for a New Trial—After-Discovered Evidence.—In an action of ejectment, judgment being given for the plaintiffs, the defendants moved for a new trial upon the ground of after-discovered evidence. This evidence, which they claimed was after-discovered, was a conveyance which had been on record for two years. It was held that as the defendants did not allege that they had used due diligence, the motion was properly overruled; and the judgment was affirmed on appeal. Lewis v. McMullin, 5 W. Va. 582.

Motion for a New Trial—Putting the Plaintiff upon Terms.—In an action of ejectment, the verdict was for the plaintiff, for the whole amount of the land claimed. The defendants moved the court to set aside this verdict, and to grant them a new trial, upon the ground that the verdict was contrary to the law and evidence. After consideration of the motion, the court entered an order declaring that the verdict was contrary to the law and the evidence, and that it would set the same aside and grant a new trial, unless the plaintiff would abate the said verdict and take a judgment for less land than allowed in the verdict. On an appeal by the plaintiff, it was held that while it is proper for the trial court to put the plaintiff on terms in an action for the recovery of money, this rule does not apply to actions of ejectment because of § 2646, Va. Code, prescribing what the verdict for land shall be. Shiflet v. Dowell, 90 Va. 745, 19 S. E. Rep. 848.

But by a later decision in Virginia, a plaintiff in ejectment may be put upon the term, as well as a plaintiff in any other action. In Fry v. Stowers, 98 Va. 417, 36 S. E. Rep. 482, HARRISON, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "We do not approve the rule announced in Shiflet v. Dowell, 90 Va. 745, 19 S. E. Rep. 848, that the principle stated does not apply in the case of an action of ejectment, because of the statute which requires that the verdict shall 'specify the land, particularly as the same is proved, and with the same certainty of description as is required in the declaration.' The practice of putting a party upon terms where the verdict is plainly erroneous in part, is a wise and salutary one, saving delay, costs, and above all, ending strife, and we perceive no good reason why the ends of justice are not as much subserved by the application of the principle in an action of ejectment as in any other case."

E. APPELLATE PROCEEDINGS.

Effect of Death of the Appellee.—Where, in ejectment, judgment was given for the defendant and the plaintiff appealed, pending which, the appellee died, it was held that the appellant could not sue a scire facias against his heirs, but he must bring a new suit. Tomkies v. Walters, 6 Call 44.

Death of Plaintiff's Lessor.—An appeal from a judgment in ejectment does not abate by the death of the plaintiff's lessor; and this is true though the lessor claims for life only. Medley v. Medley, 3 Munf. 191; Kinney v. Beverley, 1 H. & M. 530; Purvis v. Hill, 2 H. & M. 614; Mooberry v. Marye, 2 Munf. 453; Carter v. Washington, 2 H. & M. 31. See also, Stockton v. Copeland, 30 W. Va. 674, 5 S. E. Rep. 143.

Dismissal of Writ of Error.—Where the plaintiff in error himself has done some act since the judgment complained of was rendered, that would in law prevent him from obtaining any fruits of a writ of error, his writ of error will be dismissed by the appellate court. But where the motion to dismiss was founded upon an alleged forfeiture of the defendant's title after judgment in an ejectment case, the motion was overruled. Bradley v. Ewart, 18 W. Va. 598.

No Issue Made Up—Judgment Reversed.—Where the record in an action of ejectment, showed that there was no issue made up between the plaintiff and the defendant, by the pleadings in the case, the judgment was reversed by the appellate court. Brown v. Cunningham, 23 W. Va. 109.

In an action of ejectment the plaintiff recovered possession of the tract of land in controversy, and a writ of possession issued, ousting the defendant and putting the plaintiff in possession. Afterwards this judgment was reversed by the appellate court. It was held that the defendant was entitled to a writ of possession of the land. Brown v. Cunningham, 23 W. Va. 109.

Irregularities at the Trial—Objection on Appeal.—Where there were a number of defendants to an action of ejectment, and a trial and verdict was had as to part of them, and the case was revived against the heirs of others, and a further trial was had as to them, no objection being made in the court below, it was held that the question of error in the separate trials, could not be raised for the first time in the appellate court. Kenna v. Quarrier, 3 W. Va. 210.

VIII. EVIDENCE.

A. ADMISSIBLE EVIDENCE.

The Evidence Must Be Relevant.—The evidence in an action of ejectment must be relevant to the issue. The statute of jeofails, curing any objection of form or substance in the declaration in ejectment, after issue joined, does not affect this rule. Butts v. Blunt, 1 Rand. 255. In this case the lessor being a fictitious person, instead of the lessee, evidence on the part of the plaintiff not going to show title in the lessor, was excluded.

The "Best Evidence Rule"—Exceptions.—The rule requiring that the best evidence which the nature of the case admits of should be produced, though generally true, is inapplicable in actions of ejectment concerning the title to land. A copy of a patent is as good evidence of title as the original would be. Lee v. Tapscott, 2 Wash. 276.

The testimony of the editor of a newspaper, that he inserted therein, the requisite number of times, an advertisement, the purport of which he states on oath, is sufficient proof of such publication, on a trial in ejectment, without producing the advertisement itself. Moore v. Gilliam, 5 Munf. 346.

Indorsement on a Deed.—An indorsement on the back of a deed, relating to the subject-matter of the deed, is a part of the deed, and is admissible in evidence to defeat an action of ejectment. Stone v. Hansbrough, 5 Leigh 422.

Recitals in a Deed.—In an action of ejectment, it was held admissible for the plaintiff to introduce in evidence a deed, for the purpose of supplying a link in his chain of title, by means of recitals contained therein, and from which a grant might be presumed as against the defendant. Va. & Tenn. Coal & Iron Co. v. Fields, 94 Va. 102, 26 S. E. Rep. 426. See also, Hall v. Hall, 12 W. Va. 1; Hassler v. King, 9 Gratt. 115.

Evidence to Show Adverse Possession.—In ejectment between co-tenants, where the defendants relied on adverse possession, and acquiescence by the plaintiffs, letters by a party under whom defendants claimed, and also a correspondence between one of the plaintiffs and the agent of the defendant, were held competent evidence to show for what purpose the tenants in possession had claimed the property, and the plaintiffs acquiesced in their claim. Stone-street v. Doyle, 75 Va. 356.

Error in a Patent—Evidence.—In ejectment for land in Wood county, lessor of plaintiff claimed under grant of land described in the patent as lying in Monongalia; defendant showed by the statute of 1784, dividing Monongalia and establishing Harrison county, and other evidence that the land described in the patent, at the date of the patent, lay not in the then county of Monongalia, but in that of Harrison, and that no part of the present county of Wood was then part of Monongalia. It was held, competent to the plaintiff to prove, that the land in Wood was the same land granted by the patent, notwithstanding the error of the patent as to the county in which it lay. Chapman v. Bennett, 2 Leigh 329.

Proof of Outstanding Title—Landlord and Tenant.—In an action of ejectment brought by the landlord against a tenant in possession, it appeared that before the institution of the action the tenant had disclaimed to hold under the landlord; it was held admissible for the tenant to introduce in evidence matters which tended to show title in a third person, and an assignment of that title by such third party, to the tenant himself. Smoot v. Marshall, 2 Leigh 134.

Commissioner's Deed.—In an action of ejectment the plaintiff offered in evidence a deed made by a commissioner in pursuance of a decree entered in a suit brought for the specific execution of a written contract for the sale of the land so conveyed, and such portions of the record, as show the authority of the commissioner to make such deed, including the said written contract. Held, it was not necessary in such action of ejectment to prove the execution of such contract by the vendor of the land. Waggoner v. Wolf, 28 W. Va. 820.

Tax Deed Executed by a Deputy Recorder.—In an action of ejectment, a tax deed for land, executed in 1870, by a deputy recorder, and duly acknowledged by him in his own name as such deputy, was held admissible evidence under W. Va. Code of 1868. Davis v. Living, 33 W. Va. 174, 9 S. E. Rep. 84.

Record in Another Suit.—A record in another suit was held admissible in evidence in an action of ejectment, for the purpose of using as evidence certain exhibits contained in the record, where the exhibits tended to prove title, and the record was accompanied by proof of possession under claim or color of title. Va. & Tenn. Coal & Iron Co. v. Fields, 94 Va. 102, 26 S. E. Rep. 426.

In ejectment where the defendants claimed as a purchaser under a decree, it was held that the record in a chancery cause was legal evidence for him, as a link in his chain of title, though the plaintiff was not a party to the cause. Baylor v. Dejarnette, 13 Gratt. 152.

But in an action of ejectment, the record of another action of ejectment between other parties was held not competent evidence upon a question of boundaries, or the location of the land in controversy. Stinchcomb v. Marsh, 15 Gratt. 202.

Record of Prior Proceedings—Collateral Attack.—On the trial of an action of ejectment, plaintiff claimed under a conveyance from a commissioner of delinquent lands, and offered the record of the proceedings for the sale of the lands in evidence. The defendant objected to it for irregularities on its face. But as these irregularities did not render the proceedings void, it was held they could not be attacked in a collateral proceeding between the purchaser and a third party. Hitchcox v. Rawson, 14 Gratt. 526.

Evidence of Nonexecution of a Deed.—In an action of ejectment, evidence by the female plaintiff, that she did not sign or acknowledge the deed under which the defendant claimed, was admitted. It was held that the defendant might rebut this by showing that she received a part of the consideration for the deed. Blair v. Sayre, 29 W. Va. 604, 2 S. E. Rep. 97.

Identification of Land—Land Books—Payment of Taxes.—Upon the trial of an action of ejectment it was held admissible for the plaintiffs to introduce evidence showing that a tract of land containing the same number of acres, and lying the same distance from the courthouse, and in the same direction as the land in controversy, was charged on the land books for the purposes of taxation. They were also allowed to introduce tax tickets showing the payment of taxes on the land so listed. The question as to the identity of the land was held one for the jury upon all the evidence. Sulphur Mines Co. v. Thompson, 93 Va. 293, 25 S. E. Rep. 232.

Entry—Identification.—An entry may be introduced, as presumptive evidence, before the jury, in an action of ejectment, to identify the calls of the patent; but not to furnish particulars of description, not contained in the grant, nor to invalidate or aid the legal title of which the patent is the foundation. Camden v. Haskill, 3 Rand. 462.

Evidence to Show Color of Title.—In an action of ejectment to recover a larger tract of land, of which defendants claimed title to two parcels or interlocks, it was held proper for the court to admit evidence of the possession of the plaintiff of the larger tract outside of the interlocks in controversy, where the plaintiff's claim was based upon adverse possession under color of title. Breeden v. Haney, 95 Va. 622, 29 S. E. Rep. 328.

Defendant in ejectment claiming under a junior patent, founded on an inclusive survey, may introduce in evidence the entries for the different tracts embraced in the inclusive survey, the order of court authorizing the survey, and the survey itself. In order to show possession under color of title prior to his patent. Shanks v. Lancaster, 5 Gratt. 110.

The deed or instrument relied on to give color of title, must seem to define specifically the boundaries of the claim, therefore, an instrument offered by the plaintiff in evidence in an action of ejectment, which did not point to the boundaries of the claim, was rejected. Blakey v. Morris, 89 Va. 717, 17 S. E. Rep. 126.

Party Claiming under a Void Patent.—Where the grantee in a patent for land was dead at the time the grant issued, the patent was void; and this was properly shown on a trial of ejectment in which one party claims under the patent. Blankenpickler v. Anderson, 16 Gratt. 59.

In ejectment, it was held competent to the defendant, to give in evidence that the patent, under which the plaintiff claimed, was obtained by fraud, although upon the face it appeared to have been regularly issued. Hambleton v. Wells, 4 Call 213. But evidence is inadmissible, in an action of ejectment, to show irregularities which do not amount to fraud. Witherinton v. McDonald, 1 H. & M. 306.

Competency of Witnesses—Trustee.—The trustee in a deed of trust, conveying property to be sold for payment of a debt, is equally the agent of the debtor and creditor, and is a competent witness, in an action of ejectment against the debtor in behalf of a purchaser from himself, to prove that the sale of the property was advertised, according to the terms of the deed of trust. Ross v. Norvell, 3 Munf. 170.

Competency of Witnesses—Husband and Wife.—In an action of ejectment, the heirs of a wife demanded land in possession of grantees of the husband, on the ground that it had descended upon her from her father, though the wife's brothers had conveyed it to her and her husband by a deed reciting a consideration, but which the heirs claimed was only a deed of partition. It was held, that the declarations of the husband that the land had come to the wife from her father and that he had only a life estate in it, were admissible in evidence. Dooley v. Baynes, 86 Va. 644, 10 S. E. Rep. 974.

B. INADMISSIBLE EVIDENCE.

Irrelevant Evidence.—Evidence which is irrelevant to the issue, and which has no connection with the subject of the controversy is not admissible in an action of ejectment. Blakey v. Morris, 89 Va. 717, 17 S. E. Rep. 126; Butts v. Blunt, 1 Rand. 255. The will of a patentee of land under whom the plaintiff in ejectment claimed, was held inadmissible in evidence, where it made no reference to the land in controversy. Blakey v. Morris, 89 Va. 717, 17 S. E. Rep. 126.

Unproved Deed.—In an action of ejectment, it was held error to admit a deed in evidence, where there was no legal proof of its execution, and no sufficient evidence of possession under it; and evidence of possession fifteen years after the date of said deed by a purchaser from the grantee therein, under his deed, was not sufficient to entitle the former deed to be admitted. Where the plaintiff was permitted to show by parol evidence, possession in conformity with his deed, it was held error to exclude the evidence which the defendant offered in rebuttal. Shanks v. Lancaster, 5 Gratt. 110.

Parol Declarations Cannot Extend a Deed.—In an action of ejectment where the plaintiff's deed conveyed by well defined boundaries, it was held that a parol agreement made before the execution of the deed, that other adjoining land beyond these boundaries, should be included in it, or an agreement after its execution that it should extend to include other adjoining lands, could not have the effect to embrace these lands within the deed. Pasley v. English, 5 Gratt. 141; Pasley v. English, 10 Gratt. 236.

Attacking a Deed.—In an action of ejectment by a party claiming under the purchaser against the devisees, evidence to prove that the consideration of the deed was different from that expressed in it, was held inadmissible. Carrington v. Goddin, 13 Gratt. 587.

Parol Disclaimer.—In ejectment by the heirs of the devisee of an estate in fee, the defendant introduced evidence tending to show a parol disclaimer by the devisee, of the land devised to him, and moved the court to instruct the jury, that if they believed from the facts proved, that there was such parol disclaimer of the land devised, they must find for the defendant. The court refused to give this instruction to the jury, and instructed them that the disclaimer must be by writing. Bryan v. Hyre, 1 Rob. 94; Suttlev. Rich., etc., R. Co., 76 Va. 284.

Deed of Partition.—A decree of partition obtained by several parties against the vendor of certain lands was held inadmissible in evidence in an action of ejectment brought by them against the vendee, who was not a party to the suit for partition and was therefore not bound by the decree. Carter v. Washington, 2 H. & M. 345.

A Deed Which Is Improperly Acknowledged.—If proof, or acknowledgment, of a deed, made by a nonresident of land lying in Virginia, be not certified according to law, though it should be admitted to record it cannot be received in evidence as a recorded deed in an action of ejectment. Turner v. Stip, 1 Wash. 319.

But in Wise v. Postlewait, 3 W. Va. 452, it was held that a deed for land in that state, acknowledged in another state, by part of the grantors, in such manner that it might be admitted to record in West Virginia, but which was not recorded, might be given in evidence on the trial of an action of ejectment, as to the parties by whom it was acknowledged.

C. WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE.

A Question for the Jury.—While it is competent to the court to decide upon the legality and admissibility of evidence, it is not competent to them to decide upon the weight of such evidence. It should be admitted only as legal testimony, in relation to the subject in controversy, leaving the jury to determine what facts are proved by it. Whitacre v. McIlhaney, 4 Munf. 310.

In an action of ejectment, the plaintiff offered evidence to prove where one of the corners of a survey was located, and the defendant offered evidence to prove where another corner was located. As both of them could not be correct it was held a question for the jury, to determine the boundary upon all the evidence which was produced before them. Bowers v. Dickinson, 30 W. Va. 709, 6 S. E. Rep. 335.

Weight of Record in Ejectment.—The record of an action of ejectment is not conclusive evidence of the date of the demise, in an action for mesne profits, although it is conclusive as to the title. Whittington v. Christian, 2 Rand. 353.

IX. VERDICT AND JUDGMENT.

A. REQUISITES AND CONSTRUCTION OF VERDICTS.

In General.—The verdict of the jury in an action of ejectment must describe the premises with convenient certainty and must be responsive to the issue. The estates of the parties in the subject of the controversy must be set out specifically. The object of describing the premises is that possession may be delivered, and where a verdict points out the locality of the tract by reference to the lands of coterminous owners and the public highways passing it, it forms a description equally satisfactory and certain as the statement of metes and bounds ordinarily contained in deeds of conveyance. Hawley v. Twyman, 24 Gratt. 513; Messick v. Thomas, 84 Va. 891, 6 S. E. Rep. 482.

In Wilson v. Braden (W. Va.), 36 S. E. Rep. 367, the evidence showed that the plaintiff and the defendant, were each entitled to hold a part of the land. A verdict of the jury which did not show with any degree of certainty the part each was to hold, was held bad.

A verdict in ejectment, finding for the plaintiff, in general terms, a certain number of acres, part of the premises in the declaration mentioned, without designating the boundaries of such part, or referring to some certain standard to supply such defect, was held too uncertain to warrant a judgment upon it, and a venire facias de novo was awarded. Gregory v. Jackson, 6 Munf. 25; Cropper v. Carlton, 6 Munf. 277; Murra v. Northern, 1 Wash. 282.

Where the premises in an action of ejectment were described in the declaration with "convenient certainty," and the verdict was that the plaintiff was entitled in fee to the whole of the premises in the declaration described, such verdict was held not defective for uncertainty. Messick v. Thomas, 84 Va. 891, 6 S. E. Rep. 482.

Co-tenants—Certainty of Verdict.—One cannot recover as sole plaintiff in ejectment the interests of both himself and his co-tenants, and where a plaintiff shows that he is a co-tenant, he must also show the extent of his undivided interest, so that the verdict and judgment may be sufficiently certain as to his interest. Marshall v. Palmer, 91 Va. 344, 21 S. E. Rep. 672.

The Verdict Must Be Responsive to the Issue.—To a charge in a declaration of ejectment that the defendant unlawfully withholds the possession of the land, the plea was "not guilty," and the verdict of the jury was: "We the jury, find that the defendant does not withhold possession of the land in the declaration mentioned, as alleged, and therefore find for the defendant on the issue joined." This was held responsive to the issue, and the verdict in form was unexceptionable. Andrews v. Roseland Iron & Coal Co., 89 Va. 393, 16 S. E. Rep. 252.

The declaration in ejectment alleged that the plaintiff was possessed of an estate in fee, and the defendant entered upon this estate and unlawfully withheld possession thereof from plaintiff. The defendant pleaded not guilty, the verdict of the jury was: "We, the jury, find for the plaintiff that he is entitled in fee to the whole of the premises in his declaration described, and that all the defendants were in possession of a part thereof, or claimed title to some part at the commencement of this suit." It was held, that the verdict responded to the issue. Messick v. Thomas, 84 Va. 891, 6 S. E. Rep. 482; Hawley v. Twyman, 24 Gratt. 516.

Verdict Must Specify the Estate.—In an action of ejectment, the declaration stated that the plaintiff had title in a fee simple to the land, and described it by quantity, and as bounded by certain roads and coterminous owners. The issue was upon the plea of "not guilty," and the verdict of the jury was: "We, the jury find that the defendant is guilty in manner and form as stated in the declaration." It was objected that this verdict did not specify the estate to which the plaintiff was entitled; but it was held to be a finding by the jury that the plaintiff was entitled to the land in fee, and was a sufficient description of the estate. Hawley v. Twyman, 24 Gratt. 516; Messick v. Thomas, 84 Va. 891, 6 S. E. Rep. 482.

Verdict Must Specify the Estate—West Virginia.—In Elliott v. Sutor, 3 W. Va. 37, the plaintiff claimed land in fee, the verdict of the jury found for the plaintiff the land in the declaration mentioned, as described in a survey in the cause, without specifying the estate therein to which the plaintiff was entitled. It was held that the verdict was unobjectionable. But this case has since been overruled, and it is now held that a verdict which does not specify the estate to which the plaintiff is entitled is fatally defective, under W. Va. Code, ch. 90. Low v. Settle, 22 W. Va. 387; Oney v. Clendenin, 28 W. Va. 34.

Proof that a corporation, suing in ejectment, has an estate in fee in land, whether on the dissolution of the corporation the estate would revert to the grantor or not, is sufficient to support a finding by the jury that the corporation has an estate in fee. Mercer Academy v. Rusk, 8 W. Va. 373.

Verdict—Rules of Construction.—In an action of ejectment there was only one plaintiff, and on a plea of not guilty the jury found this verdict: "We, the jury, find the issue for the plaintiffs, and we find the plaintiffs have title in fee to the lands in the declaration mentioned, and we find one cent damages for the plaintiff." It was held that this verdict was valid, as the word "plaintiffs" could only refer to the one plaintiff in the case. Williams v. Ewart, 29 W. Va. 650, 2 S. E. Rep. 881.

Verdicts of juries are to be favorably construed. But in an action of ejectment where the verdict was so vague and uncertain that the substantial meaning of the jury could not be satisfactorily collected from the verdict, it was held insufficient, and a new trial was awarded. Lewis v. Childers, 13 W. Va. 1.

Variance between Verdict and Declaration—Construction.—A declaration in ejectment claimed five acres of land, and the plot of the surveyor made in the cause showed that the boundaries and lines as described in the verdict finding for the plaintiffs contained nine acres. It was held that as the only question in dispute was a common line, claimed by the plaintiff and the defendant, and the jury having found for the former, it was immaterial whether the quantity be five or nine acres, as the bounds and line claimed in the declaration corresponded with the bounds and lines found by the jury. Elliott v. Sutor, 3 W. Va. 37.

Province of the Jury—Undivided Interests.—Though in ejectment the plaintiffs in their declaration claim the whole of a tract of land, the jury may find for the plaintiffs for an undivided interest in it. Though where less land is recovered than is demanded, the boundaries of the land recovered should be designated, yet where an undivided interest in it is recovered, it is impossible to set out the boundaries; but the interest being certain, that is sufficient. Callis v. Kemp, 11 Gratt. 78.

In an action of ejectment, where a deed which forms part of the chain of title of the plaintiff, is alleged to be voluntary and fraudulent, it is proper for the jury under suitable instructions from the court, to determine whether the deed was voluntary and fraudulent, or not. Taylor v. Mallory, 96 Va. 18, 30 S. E. Rep. 472.

It was proved on a trial in ejectment, that the father of the lessor of the plaintiff, who devised the land to him, was in possession thereof many years before and until his death; and that the lessor of the plaintiff afterwards conveyed it to a person, who was in possession at the time of his death; it was held that the jury might presume that the lessor of the plaintiff was in possession from the death of his father to the date of such conveyance, if it was not proved that some other person, in the meantime, had that possession. Moore v. Gilliam, 5 Munf. 346.

Whether the plaintiff in ejectment is sole heir of a person through whom he traces title, and whether the defendant has adverse possession for the period of the statutory bar, are questions for the jury. Taylor v. Mallory, 96 Va. 18, 30 S. E. Rep. 472.

Verdict Fixing the Boundary Lines.—Where, in an action of ejectment, the evidence is conflicting as to boundary lines, the verdict of the jury fixing such lines will not be disturbed unless some other valid objection thereto be shown. Fry v. Stowers, 98 Va. 417, 36 S. E. Rep. 482.

Verdict for Part of the Land Sued for.—Where a verdict in ejectment is for a part only of the land sued for, the boundaries of the part recovered should be designated. The verdict must be certain in itself, or must refer to some certain standard by which to ascertain the land so found, otherwise it will be too uncertain to warrant a judgment upon it. Callis v. Kemp, 11 Gratt. 78, 84; Gregory v. Jacksons, 6 Munf. 25; Slocum v. Compton, 93 Va. 374, 25 S. E. Rep. 3.

Where Defendant Only Claims Part of the Land.—In an action of ejectment where the defendant at the trial proved that he was in possession of and claimed title to only a part of the premises, the verdict and judgment for the whole land claimed in the declaration was held not to be erroneous, or at least not an error whereby the defendant was injured. Messick v. Thomas, 84 Va. 891, 6 S. E. Rep. 482; Carrington v. Goddin, 13 Gratt. 587; Beckwith v. Thompson, 18 W. Va. 103.

In an action of ejectment all of the defendants pleaded a joint plea of not guilty, without disclaiming title to any of the land in the declaration. The plaintiff proved his right to the whole land, but failed to prove that certain of the defendants were in possession of any part of the land, or that they claimed title to it, or any part thereof. It was held that a general verdict for the whole land claimed in the declaration was not erroneous, because of this failure of proof by the plaintiff. Beckwith v. Thompson, 18 W. Va. 103.

A general verdict for the defendant in an action of ejectment, is proper, if warranted by the evidence; and no disclaimer is necessary to its validity, although much more land was described in the declaration than the defendant had in possession at the commencement of the suit. Jones v. C. & O. R. Co., 14 W. Va. 514.

In an action of ejectment, the tenant, without disclaiming title to any part of the land in the declaration mentioned, proves upon the trial that he is only in possession and claiming title to a part of it. A verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff for all claimed in the declaration, is not erroneous; or if it is, it is not an error by which the tenant is injured, or of which he can complain in an appellate court. Carrington v. Goddin, 13 Gratt. 587.

Verdict upon One of Several Counts.—In an action of ejectment, the declaration contains three counts: The first count in the name of J. M. and J. C. M., the second count in the name of J. M., and the third count in the name of J. C. M. The plea filed, is, not guilty, on which issue is joined. The jury find for J. C. M., "under the third count in the declaration, the following land in fee simple," and described the land so found, by reference to the plat of the surveyor filed in the cause. This finding of the jury is to be taken as a finding for J. C. M., of part of the land in the declaration demanded, and that his estate therein, was an estate in fee simple, and the verdict giving metes and bounds, by reference to said plat, is sufficiently specific. Myers v. Ford, 9 W. Va. 184.

Verdict of Jurors Who Are Irregularly Sworn.—The oath usually administered to a jury is, "to well and truly try the issue joined." Where the jurors were sworn to "speak the truth of, and upon the premises" their verdict in an action of ejectment was held to be unexceptionable. Mercer Academy v. Rusk, 8 W. Va. 373.

Verdict No Bar to Another Action.—No verdict and judgment in ejectment, can be relied on as a bar to a subsequent action of ejectment, even though for the same land, and between the same defendants and lessors of the plaintiffs, if the fictitious plaintiffs are not the same. Pollard v. Baylors, 6 Munf. 433.

Verdict by Eleven Jurors.—A verdict in ejectment rendered by eleven jurors was held valid, where it appeared that the parties in open court consented to a trial by eleven jurors instead of twelve. Roach v. Blakey, 89 Va. 707, 17 S. E. Rep. 228.

Verdict Extended by the Court.—In an action of ejectment the jury found for the plaintiff one cent damages. The verdict was extended by the court so as to include the land in the declaration mentioned, and one cent damages. This was no error. McMurray v. Oneal, 1 Call 246.

B. SPECIAL VERDICTS.

Special Verdict Must Describe the Premises.—The plaintiff in ejectment may recover less land than the quantity stated in his declaration. But, if the jury find a special verdict, showing the plaintiff entitled to a certain number of acres, part of the tract sued for, and do not specify the boundaries of such part with so much precision as that possession thereof may with certainty be delivered, a venire de novo ought to be awarded. Clay v. White, 1 Munf. 162. See also, Geddy v. Butler, 3 Munf. 345.

Special Verdict—Certainty.—In ejectment the jury set out the wills of a grandfather and father; and if the son who is dead took under his father's will they find for the plaintiff. If he took under the grandfather's will, they find for the defendants. The verdict is sufficiently certain; and submits the single question upon the construction of the wills to the court. Callis v. Kemp, 11 Gratt. 78.

In an action of ejectment, the jury having returned a special verdict, which found facts in relation to two tracts of land, and concluded by saying that if the law arising upon those facts were for the plaintiff they found for the plaintiff, the lands in the declaration mentioned, but if the law was for the defendant they found for the defendant; and the court being of the opinion that the law was for the plaintiff as to one of the tracts of land, and for the defendant as to the other, held it unnecessary to award a venire facias de novo, but gave judgment on the special verdict for the plaintiff for one tract, and for the defendant for the other. Hutchinson v. Kelly, 1 Rob. 123.

Special Verdict—Insufficiency.—A special verdict in ejectment was set aside, for not finding the time of the death of a person, under whom the lessors of the plaintiff might or might not have been entitled to the land in controversy, their title depending upon the time when he died, which, from the circumstances disclosed in the verdict, probably could have been found by the jury; also, for not finding whether the defendant or those under whom he claimed, had or had not such possession of the land as would be sufficient for his defence, in that action, whatever might be the state of the title. Cropper v. Carlton, 6 Munf. 277.

Actual Ouster Must Be Shown in Verdict against a Co-tenant.—In an action of ejectment against a tenant in common by a co-tenant, if the jury return a special verdict, actual ouster must be found therein, to entitle the plaintiff to judgment: the pro forma confession of ouster which the defendant is compelled to make before he is allowed to enter his plea, was held not sufficient in an action of ejectment, between co-tenants. Taylor v. Hill, 10 Leigh 457; Purcell v. Wilson, 4 Gratt. 16.

Tracing Title in a Special Verdict.—In tracing title in a special verdict in an action of ejectment, it is not necessary to find a seisin in the crown; because that is the ultimate point beyond which the party is not bound to go. Birch v. Alexander, 1 Wash. 34.

C. THE JUDGMENT.

Effect of a Judgment in Ejectment.—The whole effect of a judgment for the plaintiff in ejectment is to put the lessor of the plaintiff into possession of the land; and the only point decided is, that he has a better title to the possession than the defendant. Chapman v. Armistead, 4 Munf. 383.

After judgment for the plaintiff in ejectment, trespass does not lie against one who was no party to the suit, without proof of an actual trespass. Alexander v. Herbert, 2 Call 508.

Judgment in Ejectment—Validity.—A person, having an equitable title to a tract of land, executed a power of attorney, to obtain a conveyance, but without authorizing a sale of his right. The attorney, being induced to believe the title bond defective and finding it inconvenient to pay the balance due of the purchase money, was persuaded, notwithstanding the land had greatly increased in value, to give up the title bond (but without assigning it) to the husband of a woman in whom the legal title was, in consideration of the husband's giving up to him the unsatisfied bond for the purchase money. After the death of the wife, the husband sold the land, as his own, and the purchaser of him filed a bill in equity to enjoin a judgment in ejectment obtained against him by the heir of the wife, and to get a conveyance of the land. It was decided, that the contract between the attorney and the husband did not stand on such a footing of fairness and equity, that it ought to prevail over the legal title of the heir of the wife. McClenahans v. Hannah, 4 Munf. 499.

Amendment of a Judgment—Clerical Error.—In following an old form, a judgment in ejectment was entered for "the term yet to come." It was held no error for a court to allow an amendment of this judgment, so as to conform with the modern action of ejectment, which is adapted to try title to land.

as well as to get possession of it. Alvey v. Cahoon, 86 Va. 173, 9 S. E. Rep. 994.

Judgment by Confession in Ejectment.—A confession of judgment in an action of ejectment, by one of several co-defendants, was held valid, where the confession was not obtained by any unfair means, and was not made with intent to embarrass the other defendants. Va. & Tenn. Coal & Iron Co. v. Fields, 94 Va. 102, 26 S. E. Rep. 426.

A judgment by confession in an action of ejectment cannot be corrected by motion; but only by appeal to a higher court; judgment by confession not being included in the statute allowing correction of judgments by default by simple motion. Stringer v. Anderson, 23 W. Va. 482.

Joint Judgment in Ejectment.—In an action of ejectment, parties defended it jointly and neither of them entered a disclaimer, but on the contrary gave notice with their plea of not guilty, that they jointly claimed the premises in controversy, and would rely on a contract between the plaintiff and one of the defendants, as a defence at the trial. It was held that this was an admission that they were in possession, and in possession jointly; and that they would make a joint defence, so a joint judgment was held valid. McClung v. Echols, 5 W. Va. 204.

Where there were three defendants in ejectment, who appeared at different times: the first pleaded and, as to him, issue was joined; the second was admitted a defendant, but did not plead; the third pleaded, but no issue was joined; and in this state, the cause was tried, and verdict and judgment were given for the plaintiff; it was not error, notwithstanding there was no plea for the second defendant; nor issue as to the third; for their rights remained untouched, and may be tried when issues are made up as to them. Hambleton v. Wells, 4 Call 213.

Judgment for Costs.—A general judgment for costs against two defendants in ejectment, is proper, though one of them did not enter himself a defendant until there had been one trial of the cause, and a large portion of the costs had been incurred. Middleton v. Johns, 4 Gratt. 129.

Reversal of a Judgment—Validity.—Where there were two judgments in an action of ejectment, one in favor of some of the plaintiffs, against the defendants, and one in favor of the defendants, against the other plaintiffs, it was held that where the defendants appealed from the former judgment, that it might be reversed without disturbing the other judgment. Strader v. Goff, 6 W. Va. 257.

Office Judgment—Inquiry of Damages Necessary.—An office judgment in an action of ejectment does not become final without the intervention of the court or jury. The defendant in ejectment may, upon notice to the plaintiff, appear at the next term of the court, and move the court to set aside the judgment, and allow him to plead therein. Smithson v. Briggs, 33 Gratt. 180; James River, etc., Co., v. Lee, 16 Gratt. 424.

X. MESNE PROFITS AND IMPROVEMENTS.

Claim for Mesne Profits Entered after Filing of the Plea.—Where a plaintiff in ejectment filed a claim for mesne profits under sec. 30, ch. 90, Code of West Virginia, after the defendant had entered his plea, he was not allowed to recover in the same action, because it might have operated as a surprise or fraud upon the defendant. Witten v. St. Clair, 27

W. Va. 762; McCann v. Richter, 34 W. Va. 186, 12 S. E. Rep. 497.

Interest upon Mesne Profits.—Prior to the act, Code, ch. 177, sec. 14, p. 673, interest could not be allowed by a jury in an ejectment upon the profits; and where the jury allowed such interest it was held mere surplusage, and the judgment was given for the principal sum and interest from the date of the verdict. Hepburn v. Dundas, 13 Gratt. 219.

Assessment of Mesne Profits.—In an action of ejectment, after the plea of not guilty was filed, the plaintiff filed an account of rents and profits, and after the suit had been pending a number of years, an agreement was entered into between the parties to the suit, whereby the defendant agreed to let judgment go by default in the suit, and the plaintiff agreed to waive all claims to damages sustained by destruction of a dwelling house, timber, etc., and the defendant agreed to pay the plaintiff all legal costs and rents in said suit. The action of ejectment remained pending for several years and was dismissed under the four-year rule, without the said rents having been ascertained in the action. In an action of covenant brought on the agreement, by the plaintiff in said action of ejectment, to recover the rents and costs, it was held that as the rents had never been assessed in either of the modes provided by statute, covenant could not be maintained for them. McCann v. Richter, 34 W. Va. 186, 12 S. E. Rep. 497.

Improvements—Who Can Recover—Bona Fide Claimants.—Where land is recovered in ejectment, the evicted defendant in order to recover for his improvements must have been a bona fide holder as claimant of the land; and he must have reasonable grounds to believe that he had a good title at the time he made the improvements. Constructive notice, by the recordation of the deed, is sufficient to prevent him from being a bona fide claimant. Dawson v. Grow, 29 W. Va. 333, 1 S. E. Rep. 564; Hall v. Hall, 30 W. Va. 779, 5 S. E. Rep. 260; Burton v. Mill, 78 Va. 468.

Where land has been recovered in ejectment, and the defendant goes into chancery, to obtain compensation for improvements, he will not succeed if he had notice of the plaintiff's title at the time of making the improvements. McKim v. Moody, 1 Rand. 58; Southall v. McKeand, 1 Wash. 336; Morris v. Terrell, 2 Rand. 6.

If a person purchase land with notice of an equitable title in another, but that other neglect to assert his right for a long time, during which time valuable improvements are made on the land, the purchaser shall not in equity, lose the value of his improvements; but if the right is asserted before the improvements are made the purchaser will lose them. Southall v. McKeand, 1 Wash. 336.

Improvements—Juries.—If a defendant in ejectment claims for improvements on the land, the plaintiff may at any time before a judgment is rendered on the assessment of the value of the improvements, though after the jury which tried the issue or passed upon the defendant's claim for improvements has been discharged, require that the value of his estate in the premises, without the improvements, shall also be ascertained. And this enquiry is to be made by another jury. The value of the plaintiff's estate in the premises without the improvements, is to be ascertained as at the time when the assessment of the value of the improvements was made. Goodwyn v. Myers, 16 Gratt. 336, and foot-note.

In actions of ejectment, if there is a claim by the plaintiff for mesne profits and damages for waste, and by defendant for improvements under §§ 30 and 32 of ch. 135 of the Code, both claims must be passed upon by the same jury. Where the statements are filed with the declaration and plea, the jury sworn to try the issue in ejectment may make all the enquiries required at the same time that they try the issue, or the enquiries may, if the court should so order, be made by the same jury after the verdict on the title is recorded; or by a new jury to be empanelled. Goodwyn v. Myers, 16 Gratt. 336.

In an action of ejectment, the same jury which tried the case on its merits was allowed without objection from either side, to fix the value of the land, the rent and profits thereof, and the value of the improvement claimed by the defendant. It was held too late after verdict, to object to this action of the court. Corr v. Porter, 33 Gratt. 278. See foot-note to Goodwyn v. Myers, 16 Gratt. 336.

April Term, 1854, Richmond.

1. Issue Out of Chancery—No Exception to Verdict—Effect in Appellate Court.—Where an issue is directed in a chancery cause, and a verdict is found to which no exception is taken, and a decree is rendered thereon, the facts found in the verdict must be regarded in the appellate court, as the established facts of the case.

2. Legacies—Case at Bar.—Testator gives a legacy to a nephew, but directs that he shall account for the amount of certain bonds and receipts of the nephew which the testator had paid off for him as his security. After making his will, testator, shortly before his death and in contemplation of that event, delivers to the nephew the bonds, &c. with the view of their becoming his absolute

Issue Out of Chancery—No Exception to Verdict—Effect in Appellate Court.—The principal case and Fitzhugh v. Fitzhugh, 11 Gratt. 210, were cited in Nease v. Capehart, 15 W. Va. 305, for the proposition laid down in the first headnote.

Same—Object of Issue.—In Hickman v. Railroad Co., 30 W. Va. 301, 4 S. E. Rep. 657, it was said: "In Nease v. Capehart, 15 W. Va. 300, this court, following the law as settled in Virginia and elsewhere, decided, that 'the object in directing the issue is to satisfy the conscience of the chancellor, but that conscience must be satisfied with the verdict of the jury upon an issue properly directed, where no errors have been committed during the trial thereof, either by the court or by the jury, to the prejudice of either party.' Carter v. Campbell, Gilmer 159; Lee v. Boak, 11 Gratt. 182; Fitzhugh v. Fitzhugh. Id. 210; Henry v. Davis, 7 W. Va. 715."

Case Submitted to Court—Bill of Exceptions.—In Joslyn v. State Bank, 86 Va. 289, 10 S. E. Rep. 166, the court cites the principal case and Paul v. Paul, 2 H. & M. 525, as authorizing the proposition that in the case where the whole matter of law and fact has been submitted to the court, as well as in the case where there has been a verdict, there must be a bill of exceptions pointing out the alleged error, and a certificate of evidence showing what testimony was before the court or jury. property in the event of the testator's death, and for the purpose of discharging the nephew from all accountability for the same as one of his legatees, in his settlement with the executor. HELD:

1. Same—Advancement in Satisfaction of—Case at Bar.—The intention of the testator being that the nephew shall not account for the moneys paid by the testator for him, the gift of the bonds and receipts is not an advancement in satisfaction of the legacy to the nephew.

2. Gifts Mortis Causa—Bonds.†—A bond may be the subject of a donatio mortis causa, whether it be the bond of a stranger or the donee: and in this case the donation was valid.

Samuel Lee, by his will, recorded in 1842, directed his estate to be sold by his executors, and the fund arising therefrom, after the payment of his debts, to be distributed among a large number of nephews and nieces; giving to four of them, of whom the appellee William L. Boak was one, each two shares thereof, subject, however, as to the share of the said Boak, to a deduction therefrom of all moneys theretofore paid by the testator for him as his security. In 1845 Boak filed his bill against Throck-

†Gifts Mortis Causa—Choses in Action.—In Seabright v. Seabright, 28 W. Va. 470, the court said: "But it is now perfectly well settled at least in this country, that a promissory note, a bond or any instrument in writing, which creates a liability against a third person, and which is held by the donor and is his property either legal or equitable, is the subject of a valid donatio causa mortis. It is a matter of no importance, whether the chose in action, the subject of the donatio causa mortis, be the note or bond of a third person, or whether, if a note, it be payable to bearer or be endorsed in blank, or whether it be payable to the donor only, and he does not endorse it; it not being now regarded as at all necessary, that the legal title to the chose in action should pass by the delivery of it by the donor to the donee as a gift causa mortis, but it being sufficient, that by the delivery of the chose in action by the donor to the donee as a gift causa mortis the equitable title to such chose in action passes and vests in the donee by delivery. (Lee v. Boak, 11 Gratt. 182; Wells v. Tucker, 3 Binn. 366; Harring v. Edwards, 11 Md. 424; Constant v. Schuyler, 1 Paige 319, 318; Westuto v. DeWitt, 36 N. Y. 340; *Holly's Administrator v. Gifts—Delivery.—The principal case is cited several times as authorizing the proposition that all gifts, except by will, must be attended by delivery of possession to make them valid. See Thomas v. Lewis, 89 Va. 62, 15 S. E. Rep. 389; Spooner v. Hilbish, 92 Va. 341, 23 S. E. Rep. 751; foot-note to Morrison v. Grubb, 23 Gratt. 342.

morton, executor, and the other legatees of Lee, for an account and distribution of the estate, claiming to be entitled to two full shares thereof, without any deduction on account of money paid by the testator

for him as his security; and averring
183 *that the testator, a short time before his death, and in contemplation thereof, when in full possession of his faculties, delivered to the complainant, to be canceled and destroyed, all the bonds evidencing such payments; expressly placing this act of delivery and donation upon the ground that it would be harsh and unjust, considering the past relations between them, to charge the complainant with such payments in the distribution of the estate.

The executor filed his answer, in which he expressed the opinion, that at the time of the alleged delivery and donation, the testator was incapable of knowing the meaning and consequence of the important act of releasing the complainant from the whole of his large indebtedness; if he was to get, besides, his legacy under the will. The amount paid by the testator as security for Boak, was upwards of six thousand dollars, and was greatly more than two full shares of the estate. Sundry depositions were taken and filed on both sides, as well in regard to the delivery of the bonds, &c., as in regard to the capacity of the testator to do such an act. A cross bill and answer were also filed. The cause was then heard; and the court, regarding the case as a proper one for the decision of jury, directed two issues to be tried. The issues were accordingly tried; and the jury found, "that the testator Samuel Lee deceased, shortly before his death, and in contemplation of that event, delivered to the complainant William L. Boak the bonds, receipts and other evidences of debt for moneys paid by him as the security of the said Boak, with the view of their becoming his absolute property in the event of the testator's death, and for the purpose of discharging the complainant from all accountability for the same, as one of the legatees of the estate in his future settlement with the executor; and further, at the time of such delivery and donation, 184 the said Samuel Lee was *of sound and disposing mind and memory, and capable of understanding the full effect and consequence of such an act." No exception was taken to the verdict; and a decree was rendered for a settlement of the executorial account and distribution of the estate; recognizing the right of Boak to two shares of the estate. From that decree this appeal was taken by Throckmorton, the executor.

R. T. Daniel and Brooke, for the appellant.

Faulkner, for the appellee.

MONCURE, J., after stating the case, proceeded:

The appellant has no cause to complain, and does not complain, of the decree of the court below directing the issues. No exception having been taken to the verdict, and the court having rendered a decree thereon, the facts found therein must be regarded as the established facts of the case. Whether the testator stood in loco parentis, in relation to his nephew Boak; and whether the legacy was a portion, and the donation of the bonds, receipts and other evidences of debt was of such a nature as that, standing by itself, it would have been considered an advancement in satisfaction of the legacy; are questions which need not be answered in this case. For assuming them to be answered in favor of the appellant, that is in the affirmative, I am still of opinion that, according to the facts found by the jury, the case is in favor of the appellee. If from the mere fact of the donation of the bonds, receipts, &c., an intention on the part of the testator to satisfy the legacy to Boak would have been presumed, certainly the presumption would have been repelled by proof of a contrary intention. This is admitted by the counsel for the appellant. The question is one of intention, on all the facts of the case.

The verdict expressly finds a contrary
185 intention *in this case. It finds not only the fact of the donation of the bonds, &c., but that they were given for the purpose of discharging Boak from all accountability for the same as one of the legatees in his future settlement with the executor. The will had directed that Boak should be charged with the bonds, &c., in the settlement of his legacy. The established purpose of the donation was to discharge him from all accountability for the bonds, &c., in such settlement. The necessary consequence is that he is entitled to the legacy without any deduction on account of the bonds, &c.: just as if the debt had been paid by Boak, instead of given up to him; or as if the testator had made a codicil, releasing the debt and saying it was not to be deducted in the settlement of the legacy. The testator, by giving the legacy subject to a deduction of the debt, did not deprive himself of the power of afterwards receiving the debt; or giving it to the debtor, by a donation inter vivos, or mortis causa, or by a codicil: And if so received or given, the debt would be discharged, that part of the will directing a deduction of the debt from the legacy would be revoked, and the debtor would be entitled to the legacy without such deduction: Unless indeed the debt were given in satisfaction of the legacy; in which case the legacy itself would be revoked. I do not see how this matter can be made plainer by argument or by authority: And I do not think there can be any room for doubt as to the right of Boak to the legacy without any deduction for the debt if the donation to the debt was a valid donation. That question I will now proceed briefly to consider.

Whether the donation was valid or not, depends upon whether there was a sufficient delivery of possession to perfect the gift. All gifts, except by will, must be attended by delivery of possession to make them valid. Until such delivery they are 186 inchoate and revocable; *indeed mere nullities. The donation in this case, as found by the jury, was a donatio mortis causa. But there is no difference in this respect between donations mortis causa and inter vivos. The same kind of delivery of possession which is necessary to make good the one, is necessary to make good the other. 1 Roper on Legacies, 19; Ewing v. Ewing, 2 Leigh, 337, 341 and 344. The cases are conflicting in regard to the donation of a debt by the delivery of a bond, note, or other evidence of the debt. I deem it unnecessary to review them, as most or all of them may be seen by reference to 1 Roper on Legacies, by White, ch. 1; 1 Story's Eq. Jur. § 423, note 3; 2 Id. § 706, 793 a, and notes. The distinction taken by Lord Hardwicke in Snellgrove v. Baily, 3 Atk. R. 214, between a gift by delivery of a bond and a note; saying that the former would be good as a donation mortis causa, but not the latter, though since followed in England, has been repudiated in several of the United States; in which it has been held that bonds, bills of exchange, promissory notes and other choses in action are all equally proper subjects of a valid donation as well causa mortis as inter vivos. 1 Roper on Legacies, p. 16, note 7; 4 Kent's Com. 447; Wright v. Wright, 1 Cow. R. 598; Constant v. Schuyler, 1 Page's R. 316; Borneman v. Sidlinger, 15 Maine R. 429; Wells v. Tucker, 3 Binn. R. 366. In some of the states, Massachusetts, and perhaps Connecticut, for example, the distinction taken by Lord Hardwicke seems to have been recognized. Parish v. Stone, 14 Pick. R. 198. In Virginia, bonds, bills, promissory notes, and all other writings obligatory, are assignable, and the assignee may sue in his own name. If they are transferred without a written assignment, the transferee may sue at his own cost, in the name of the party in whom is the legal title; and his right will be recognized and protected by the court against the release or other act of such party. His remedy 187 is *complete at law, and he has no occasion to ask the aid of a court of equity. The principle that a court of equity will not assist a volunteer to complete his title, which in England may defeat a voluntary transfer of a chose in action not negotiable, would seem to have no application in this state; but a bill, note, or other writing obligatory, is as proper a subject of a valid donation as a bond. Elam v. Keen, 4 Leigh 333, is the only adjudication in this state which seems to have a particular bearing on the subject. In that case, A having a bond in suit, told B he might have it, and gave him the attorney's receipt. The executor of A received the money, and B brought an action against him for money had and received. The action was sustained, though B had given no consideration for the bond; the delivery of the attorney's receipt being considered a sufficient delivery to complete the gift of the bond. Judge Carr recognized the distinction taken by Lord Hardwicke in Ward v. Turner, 2 Ves. sen. 431, between such a constructive or symbolical delivery as was sufficient to pass the right to a chattel sold, and put it at the risk of the vendee, and such a delivery as was necessary to consummate a gift. But he said, "there are many things of which actual manual tradition cannot be made, either from their nature or their situation at the time; it is not the intention of the law to take from the owner the power of giving these; it merely requires that he shall do what, under the circumstances, will, in reason, be considered equivalent to an actual delivery." He then refers to the case of Jones v. Selby, Prec. in Chan. 300, in which the delivery of the key of a trunk was held to be a sufficient delivery to make a valid gift of a tally of £500 contained in the trunk; and also to Noble v. Smith, 2 John. R. 52, in which Chief Justice Kent said, "the cases in which the delivery of a symbol has been held sufficient to perfect the gift, are those in which it was considered 188 *equivalent to actual delivery; as the key of a room, or of a ware-house, which was the true and effectual way of obtaining the use of the subject." Judge Carr considered the receipt as the representative of the bond, which, being in court, could not be delivered; and that, as in the case of the key, the delivery of this receipt was the true and effectual way of obtaining the use of the subject." These remarks are very appropriate to the case under consideration, and the principle of Elam v. Keen is, I think, decisive of this case.

In the case of Ewing v. Ewing, 2 Leigh 333, a gift of a bond to the obligor was held to be invalid for want of delivery: If the bond had been delivered the gift would have been sustained. This is obvious from the opinions of Judges Carr and Green. The former said, "Here it is expressly proved that the bond never was delivered nor any written transfer made." The latter said, "In the case before us neither the bond in question, nor the money due upon it, could be effectually given or forgiven, or released to the obligor, but by the obligee's canceling or destroying it with that avowed intention, or surrendering it to the obligor, or to some other for him, or by some instrument in writing to that effect." See also the case of Dunbar's ex'ors v. Woodcock's ex'or, 10 Leigh 628, decided by a Special court of appeals.

A donation of a debt to the debtor himself is entitled to at least as much favor as a donation of the debt to a third person: and a delivery of the evidence of the debt is at least as valid delivery of the debt itself in the former as in the latter case. The delivery of the evidence of the debt to a stranger donee, merely enables him to obtain possession of the subject of the gift; while such a delivery to a debtor donee, ipso facto puts him in possession of the subject; or converts to his own use the possession, which he had hitherto held for the use of his creditor. Indeed, a dona-

189 tion of *a debt to the debtor himself has been more favored by courts of equity than a donation to a stranger. It is believed there has been no case in which a court of equity has enforced an imperfect gift to a stranger; while there have been various cases in which that court has enforced an imperfect gift of a debt to the debtor. Some of these cases are cited and commented upon in 2 Story's Eq. Ju. § 705 a, 706 and 706 a; and "they proceed (says Story) upon the distinct ground that the transaction was one exclusively between the creditor and the debtor; and that taking all the circumstances together, it was clearly the intention of the creditor to treat the debt as in equity forgiven and released to the debtor himself. But cases of this sort (he further says), are clearly distinguishable from purely voluntary imperfect gifts or assignments of debts or other property to third persons."

I think there was a valid donation of the debt in this case; and it follows that I am for affirming the decree.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Moncure, J.

Decree affirmed.

190 *Richardson's Adm'r v. Prince George Justices.

Poindexter's Adm'r v. Same.

April Term, 1854, Richmond.

1. Judgments—Scire Facias—Variance—Case at Bar.—

A judgment is recovered in the name of B H and three others, justices of P. G. county, for the benefit of the marshal of the Superior court of chancery for the Williamsburg district. The defendant being dead, a scire facias issues to revive the judgment, which, after setting out the plaintiffs, and the recovery of the judgment for the benefit of the marshal, adds, which marshal was W. HELD: This is not a variance.

2. Same—Same—Surplusage—Case at Bar.—

In this case the marshal being dead, the scire facias recites that it was awarded at the instance of M his administrator. Though it might have been more regular for the scire facias to recite that it was awarded at the instance and on behalf of the plaintiffs on the record, yet as it would have been good if the averment at whose instance it had issued had been wholly omitted, the recital was mere surplusage, and does not vitiate the scire facias.

3. Same—Same—How Regarded—Case at Bar.—

Neither the scire facias nor any other part of the record, showing what was the character of the obligation or other liability upon which the judgment was rendered, and the defendant's plea not averring that it was such a statutory bond as required that there should be a relator in any action brought upon it, and that the relator should be the party, having the legal right to sue, it must be regarded as a common law bond or liability subject to be sued on in the names of the payees without a relator, or for the benefit of the holder or any party entitled to the benefit of it; and whether W was marshal or M was his administrator, is a question in which defendant has no interest; and it cannot be raised by him by plea in bar to the plaintiffs' claim.

4. Same—Same—Suspended by Injunction—Surplusage.—

The scire facias stated the judgment had been suspended by injunction. This was an unnecessary allegation, and may be treated as surplusage; and a plea that the judgment had not been suspended by injunction, offered no bar to the scire facias.

5. Same—Same—Dissolution of Injunction—Immaterial Issue.—

The scire facias further stated that the injunction had been dissolved. A plea that the injunction had not been dissolved, is bad, and an issue made up upon it is immaterial. Therefore, though the court admits improper evidence upon it, offered by the plaintiff, it is not cause for reversing the judgment.

191 6. Same—Death of Judgment Creditor—Pending Injunction.—

The dependency of an injunction to a judgment at law, will not prevent the revival of the judgment upon the death of either the plaintiff or defendant; and the injunction operates upon the judgment on the scire facias, to restrain and prohibit the issue of execution thereon.

These two cases are precisely the same except in the names of the defendants below, who are the appellants. The statement of one is therefore the statement of the other.

In April 1847 a scire facias was issued from the clerk's office of the Circuit court of the county of New Kent, which recited, that whereas Benjamin Harrison, Thomas Cock, Nathaniel Colly and William Baird, justices of Prince George county, who sue for the benefit and at the cost of the marshal of the Superior court of chancery for the Williamsburg district, which marshal was Charles L. Wingfield, at a Superior court of law begun and held for New Kent county on Monday the 4th of October 1830, by the judgment of said court recovered against Holt Richardson and John L. Poindexter, on a motion for a judgment and award of execution upon a bond given for the forthcoming and delivery of property on the day and at the place of sale, taken by virtue of the plaintiff's execution sued out of said court against the goods and chattels of the defendant Richardson and one Thomas H. Terrell and John H. Christian, the sum of eight hundred and thirty-four dollars and forty-two cents, the penalty of said bond, and their costs by them in that behalf expended. But the said judgment was to be discharged by the payment of four hundred and sixteen dollars and twenty-one cents, with interest thereon, to be computed after the rate of six per cent. per annum, from the 6th day of September 1830 till paid and the costs, one dollar and eighty-six cents. Whereof, &c. And *Judgments—Scire Facias—Pending Injunction.—In Hutsonpiller v. Stover, 12 Gratt. 592, it is said that the pendency of an injunction to a judgment does not prevent the suing out of a scire facias. Citing Richardson v. Prince George Justices, 11 Gratt. 190.

whereas a certain Charles L. Wingfield was the said marshal, and since the 192 rendition of the judgment *aforesaid, the execution of which has been suspended by an injunction obtained by the said Holt Richardson, the said Charles L. Wingfield and the said defendants Holt Richardson and John L. Poindexter have all departed this life, the said Richardson having died intestate as it is said; and administration on the estate of the said Charles L. Wingfield has been in due form of law granted to P. P. Mayo; and administration of the said Holt Richardson has been in due form of law granted to Theophilus A. Lacy, as we have been informed. And now in behalf of the said P. P. Mayo, administrator as aforesaid of the said Charles L. Wingfield, it is said that although judgment be given as aforesaid, and the injunction granted staying the execution of said judgment has been dissolved, yet execution of the debt, interest and costs still remain to be made. Therefore, at the instance of the said P. P. Mayo, administrator of the said Charles L. Wingfield, we command you, that you make known to the said Theophilus A. Lacy, administrator of the said Holt Richardson, that he be at the clerk's office, &c., on the first Monday in August next, to show cause, if any he can, why the said P. P. Mayo, administrator of the said Charles L. Wingfield, ought not to have execution against him the said Theophilus A. Lacy, administrator of Holt Richardson, of the debt, interest and costs aforesaid, according to the judgment aforesaid.

The scire facias having been returned executed, the defendant appeared and demurred to it, and moved to quash it; and also tendered five pleas: 1st. Nul tiel record. 2d. That P. P. Mayo was not the administrator of Wingfield. 3d. That the execution of the judgment in the scire facias mentioned was not suspended by injunction. 4th. That at the time of the rendition of said judgment, Charles L. Wingfield was not the marshal of the Superior court of chancery for the Williamsburg district. 193 5th. That the injunction *in the scire facias mentioned, by which the said judgment was enjoined, had not been dissolved.

The court overruled the demurrer, and refused to quash the scire facias, and on the motion of the plaintiffs, excluded the second, third and fourth pleas tendered by the defendant, but admitted the first and fifth. And the defendant excepted. There was a general replication to the first plea, and issue; and the plaintiffs replied to the fifth plea, that the said injunction had been dissolved; and this they were ready to verify by the record. And the defendant took issue on the replication.

On the trial of the issue joined on the first plea, the plaintiffs introduced the judgment and award of execution; and the defendant objected to the introduction of this evidence, without the production also to the court of the forthcoming bond on which the judgment and award of execution were awarded; also the execution on which the forthcoming bond was taken, and the whole record of the suit out of which these had their origin. But the court overruled the objection, and gave judgment on that issue for the plaintiffs.

Upon the trial of the issue on the replication to the fifth plea, the plaintiffs moved the court to try it without the intervention of a jury; to which the defendant objected. But the court overruled the objection, and determined to try the issue without a jury. The plaintiff then offered in evidence a part of a record of a chancery suit lately pending in the Circuit court of New Kent. This was the proceedings in cause which had been commenced in the Chancery court of Williamsburg, but was afterwards transferred to the Circuit court of New Kent. The part of the record filed commenced with an amended and supplemental bill filed by Holt Richardson in a suit which he had instituted in that court, as administrator of John Forth against William Spragins and Polly his wife; and the 194 *object of this supplemental bill was to enjoin proceedings upon a judgment recovered against him on a forthcoming bond in the Circuit court of New Kent. But the part of the record nowhere shows who were the plaintiffs, or what was the amount of the judgment. This injunction was granted, and was afterwards dissolved. Upon this evidence the court gave a judgment for the plaintiffs on this issue. And the defendant excepted to the opinion of the court overruling his objections to the evidence upon the issues upon the first and fifth pleas, and also to the opinion of the court overruling his objection to the trial of the last issue by the court without a jury: And applied to this court for a superseas, which was allowed.

LEE, J. It is no doubt true that if a scire facias for the purpose of reviving a judgment, be found to vary in a material matter from the judgment in the description which it undertakes to give of it, advantage may be taken of it in the proper mode, and the variance will prove fatal. But waiving the question whether a proper mode of making such an objection could be by a general demurrer or motion to quash, I am of opinion that no such variance appears in the present case. It is true the judgment was in the names of four persons described as justices of Prince George county, suing for the benefit of the marshal of the District court of chancery held at Williamsburg, without giving his name, while the scire facias avers that his name was Charles L. Wingfield. But this is no variance. It is intended to furnish an additional means of identification of the person for whose benefit the judgment had been rendered, and to show the right of the party at whose instance the present 195 proceeding *was taken. It is an averment in nowise repugnant to, but strictly consistent with, all the terms of the judgment, while the names, sums, dates and other elements of description, which the judgment affords, are found accurately given in the scire facias. The objection that the scire facias recites it was awarded at the instance of P. P. Mayo, administrator of Charles L. Wingfield, instead of Benjamin Harrison, and the other three parties who are the plaintiffs on the record, is one rather of form than of substance. It might have been more regular for the scire facias to recite that it was awarded at the instance and on behalf of the plaintiffs on the record, but as it would have been good if the averment at whose instance it had issued had been wholly omitted, I regard it as mere surplusage, and not serving to vitiate; and the rather because the requirement of the process is that the defendant shall show, if anything he can, why execution should not be awarded against him "according to the judgment aforesaid," thus contemplating conformity to the judgment in the manner of the process sought, while it recognizes the right of the party for whose benefit it was designed to be taken. I think the demurrer and motion to quash were properly overruled.

It does not appear from the scire facias, or in any other part of the record, what was the character of the obligation or other liability upon which the original judgment was rendered. It may have been a statutory bond, made payable to the plaintiffs in their official character, or though payable to them in such character, it may not have been a statutory bond, though good as a common law obligation; or it may have been a bond or other contract, payable to the plaintiffs, in their individual character, the words justices of Prince George county being added as "designatio personarum." Nor do the defendants' pleas, or any of them,

196 allege that it was such a statutory bond as required that *there should be a relator in any action brought upon it, and that the relator should be the party having the legal right to sue. In the absence of any such information as to the character of the obligation, and of any averment that it was of the nature above indicated, we must regard it as a common law bond or liability, subject to be sued on in the name of the payees, without any relator, or for the benefit of any party who may be the holder, or lawfully entitled to the benefit of it. Thus the questions whether Wingfield was marshal and whether Mayo was his administrator, are questions between the latter and the plaintiffs on the record, with which the defendant has no concern, because the demand being treated as a common law and not a statutory liability, and the proceeding being to revive a judgment on such a liability in the name of the payees, a judgment upon this scire facias for whose use soever, will be a complete bar in favor of the defendant to any future action. At most, if the defendant desired to call in question the right of Mayo to use the names of the original parties, and to prosecute the scire facias for his own benefit, the proper mode was to apply to the court for its summary interference by rule. Howard v. Rawson, 2 Leigh, 733, and authorities cited in the opinion of Judge Summers. He could not make such matter the subject of a plea in bar to the plaintiff's action. I think the pleas that Wingfield was not marshal, and that Mayo was not his administrator, tendered immaterial issues, and were properly rejected by the court.

The plea that the judgment had not been suspended by an injunction, offered no bar to the scire facias. It but served to point to another matter which might be made the subject of a plea in bar, and which, if not successfully answered, would defeat the action. It is true the scire facias does allege that execution of the judgment had 197 been suspended by an injunction; but *this allegation was unnecessary, and may be treated as surplusage; and a naked traverse of such a matter offers no sufficient defence to the action. If the defendant desired to set up the statute of limitations in his defence, it was his duty to plead it distinctly and directly: He could not be entitled to the benefit of it upon a collateral issue. If the plea were strictly true and there never had been an injunction, it does not follow that the judgment could not be revived. And if the defendant had pleaded the statute of limitations, the plaintiffs might have replied some matter (other than the pendency of the injunction) which might serve to take the case out of its operation, but of the benefit of which, upon the issue tendered, they might be deprived. I think, therefore, this plea also was properly rejected by the court.

The fifth plea tendered by the defendant (that the injunction had not been dissolved) was received by the court, and an issue made up upon it. And if this could be regarded as a good plea, or the issue joined upon it as material, it might admit of question whether the court did not err in admitting the imperfect and incomplete record offered by the plaintiff in evidence, in support of the issue upon his part. For although, as has been decided by this court in the cases of White v. Clay's ex'ors, 7 Leigh 68, and Wynn v. Harman, 5 Gratt. 157, a decree or other extract from the record may be given in evidence without the production of the whole record, yet from the case of Masters v. Varner's ex'ors, 5 Gratt. 168, we learn that this is to be so understood where the decree or extract so offered itself satisfactorily establishes the fact it is offered to prove. And in this case the portion of the record offered by the plaintiff was scarcely sufficient to identify the judgment the injunction to which was thereby dissolved, as that upon which the

198 scire facias in question had been sued out. But I do not regard *the plea as a good bar, nor the issue joined upon it as material. I can perceive no good reason why a party plaintiff, whose judgment has been enjoined, may not be permitted, upon the death of the defendant pending the injunction, to revive it against his personal representative. Such a proceeding can be no breach of the injunction, the object of which is to restrain the party from enforcing the judgment by execution, and reaping its fruits, until the matters of equity alleged can be heard and considered. All that the court of chancery intends to restrain is execution. The plaintiff may proceed so far as to be able to take out execution the instant the injunction is dissolved. 1 Eden on Injunct. 97. Now, where the defendant dies after the injunction, unless the plaintiff can go on and revive against his representative, he will not be in a situation, upon the dissolution of the injunction, to issue his execution, but must then be delayed till he can sue out his scire facias and obtain the order of revival; and thus, by the supervening death of the defendant, he is placed in a worse condition than when the injunction was allowed; while, if he is allowed to go on and revive his judgment, notwithstanding the injunction, he is merely reinstating himself to the right which he then had of issuing his execution as soon as the injunction is dissolved. In fact, the right to sue out execution upon its dissolution, is the very condition of an injunction to a judgment; and if the judgment creditor die pending the injunction, the court of chancery will in a summary way impose it as a condition on the complainant to consent to revive at law, under the penalty of having his injunction dissolved if he refuse. Medley v. Pannill, 1 Rob. R. 63. And there can be no conceivable difference in this respect whether the necessity for the revival is occasioned by the death of the judgment creditor or the judgment debtor. The 199 inconvenience to be remedied *is precisely the same in both cases: and what the court of chancery would itself enforce in a summary way by a rule, it surely would not regard as a breach of the injunction when sought to be accomplished by the ordinary process of law. The judgment creditor must take care to stop with the order reviving his judgment. Thus far may he go but no farther; and the judgment of the court upon the scire facias is to be regarded as in strict subordination to the injunction to the original judgment of which it is the mere continuation.

I regard this as the reasonable and sound doctrine upon this subject; and I have seen no case which should be considered as disaffirming it. It is true Judge Baldwin, in delivering his opinion in the case of Smith's adm'r v. Charlton's adm'r, 7 Gratt. 425, 466, intimates that pending a writ of error or injunction or cessat, an action of debt or scire facias cannot be brought upon the judgment. He cites no authority for the proposition, and so far as it respects the injunction, it is an intimation thrown out arguendo and by way of illustration. He probably did not advert to the distinction between the nature and effect of an injunction and that of a writ of error or cessat. At all events it was a point not at all material to the decision in that case, and the remark of the judge as it respects the injunction, must be regarded as obiter merely. On the other hand, there are several cases to be found in the English chancery, from which the right to revive a judgment by scire facias upon the death of the judgment debtor pending an injunction may be fairly deduced. Thus, where there is an interlocutory judgment, as by default or upon demurrer, and an injunction is allowed, the plaintiff may, notwithstanding, go on and ascertain his damages. Morrice v. Hankey, 3 P. Wms. 146. So where the defendant at law had put in a frivolous plea, to 200 which the plaintiff demurred, *and there was an injunction allowed; and pending the injunction, the plaintiff went on and obtained judgment, it was held by Lord Macclesfield that this was no breach of the injunction. Sidney v. Hetherington, 3 P. Wms. 147 n. So where there had been an award made under a reference which had been made a rule of court, and an injunction was allowed, it was held by Lord Roslyn that the party might go on at law, take his rule to show cause why an attachment should not go for performance of the award, and proceed to make his rule absolute without being guilty of any breach of the injunction, provided he did not execute the attachment. Franco v. Franco, 2 Cox R. 420. And in a case where there was judgment against a defendant as executor quando acciderint, an injunction was allowed, the plaintiff at law pending the injunction, took out a scire facias to enquire after assets: this was held by Lord King to be no breach of the injunction, being only a continuation of the old action on the same record. Morrice v. Hankey, 3 P. Wms. 146. In all these cases the object of the party was simply to place himself in a condition to sue out execution as soon as the injunction should be dissolved: and such is the purpose for which a party may well be permitted to revive his judgment where the defendant has died pending the injunction.

It is objected that the judgment on the scire facias, awarding execution, is in favor of Mayo, administrator of Wingfield, when it should have been in favor of Harrison and the other plaintiffs on the record. It might have been more regular that it should have been in terms in favor of the latter, for the use and benefit of Mayo, administrator, &c.; but as the judgment is to be understood with reference to the scire facias on which it is founded; and as that goes for award of execution according to the original judgment, it may be regarded as in effect an award of 201 *execution to be sued out in their names for the use of Mayo administrator of Wingfield, according to the suggestions contained in the scire facias. The objection goes rather to form than to substance, and does not call for a more grave consideration.

I am of opinion to affirm the judgment.

The case of Poindexter's ex'or v. Wingfield's adm'r is in all respects similar to the foregoing, being a proceeding to revive the judgment against the representative of the other defendant Poindexter, who had also died after the injunction. The same defence was made and the questions arising in this case are precisely the same as those in the former.

I am of opinion that this judgment also should be affirmed.

ALLEN, MONCURE and SAMUELS, Js., concurred in the opinion of Lee, J.

DANIEL, J., dissented. He thought the fifth plea of the pendency of the injunction a good plea; and that the proof admitted by the Circuit court of its dissolution was not sufficient.

Judgment affirmed.

April Term, 1854, Richmond.

1. Fraud of Decedent—Action against Personal Representative.—An action on the case for fraud in selling to the plaintiff an unsound slave, which he was induced to purchase by means of a false and fraudulent warranty of soundness; or by means of a fraudulent concealment of the unsoundness of the slave, cannot be maintained against the personal representative of the vendor.

2. Same—Same—Judgment for Plaintiff—Jeofails.—In such an action against the personal representative of the vendor though there is a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, the error will not be cured by the statute of jeofails. 1 Rev. Code of 1819, ch. 128, § 103, p. 511.

3. Same—Same—Verdict for Plaintiff—Judgment.†—In such a case, though there is a verdict for the plaintiff, judgment should be rendered for the defendant, notwithstanding the verdict.

4. Statute of Jeofails—When Action Misconceived in Sense of Statute.—An action is misconceived in the Torts—Survival of Action.—In Lee v. Hill, 87 Va. 601, 12 S. E. Rep. 1052, the principal case was disapproved. In that case, the true rule as to the survival of tort action was said to be as follows: Where the cause of action is a tort unconnected with contract, and affects the person only, and not the estate, such, for instance, as assault, libel, slander and the like, the action dies with the person; but, where the action is founded on contract, it is virtually ex contractu, although nominally in tort, and, in such case, the action survives.

†Judgment Non Obstante Verdicto.—In Duval v. Malone, 14 Gratt. 27, it was said: "The court of its own motion, even after verdict, may disregard the finding of immaterial facts; and in a proper case judgment may be rendered non obstante verdicto; or, if the case be not in a condition to warrant a judgment, a repleader may be awarded. 1 Rob. Prac. (Old Ed.) 222; Beale's Adm'r v. Botetourt Justices, 10 Gratt. 278; Boyles' Adm'r v. Overby, 11 Gratt. 202, and the cases there cited."

sense of the statute, only in a case wherein upon the trial the proofs show a cause of action fit to be asserted in a form different from that adopted. The defendant is held liable upon proof showing a liability; and if no objection is made to the form of the action until after verdict, the defect is cured thereby.

5. Same—Interpretation of.—To hold a defendant liable upon a cause of action not asserted, is going to the utmost verge of the law, even where such cause of action is proved. But to hold him liable for such cause when not proved, or proved by evidence not admissible if the suit had been brought for that cause, is going beyond the letter and spirit of the law.

6. Practice at Common Law—No Cause of Action Set Forth—Effect of Statute of Jeofails.‡ The statute, though it will aid defects whether of form or substance in pleading, where a portion of the matter pleaded is appropriate, does not apply to cases in which the matter pleaded is, in all its parts, merely nugatory, setting forth no cause of action or no ground of defence.

This was an action on the case in the Circuit court of Patrick county, brought by Allen S. Overby against the administrator of William Boyle deceased. The declaration contained two counts. The first set out that the plaintiff bargained with Boyles in his life time, to buy of Boyles a negro girl slave, and that Boyles, by falsely warranting and representing the said 203 negro *to be sound, falsely and fraudulently induced the plaintiff to buy, and that he did buy of the said Boyles the said negro for, &c.; whereas the said ne-

‡No Cause of Action—Effect of Statute of Jeofails.—In Robrecht v. Marling, 29 W. Va. 774, 2 S. E. Rep. 831, it is said: "If there had been no legal cause of action in the declaration alleged, and no demurrer to the declaration, and evidence taken to support such declaration and verdict and judgment rendered, upon writ of error to such a judgment it has often been held that, notwithstanding our strong statute of jeofails, the judgment and verdict would be set aside, and judgment entered in the appellate court for the defendant non obstante verdicto. Mason v. Farmers' Bank, 12 Leigh 84; Davis v. Com., 13 Gratt. 150; Ross v. Milne, 12 Leigh 204; Boyles v. Overby, 11 Gratt. 202; Holliday's Ex'rs v. Myers, 11 W. Va. 276."

See principal case also cited for this proposition in Roanoke, etc., Co. v. Karn, 80 Va. 595; Long v. Campbell, 37 W. Va. 671, 17 S. E. Rep. 198. In this last case, it was said: "Where a declaration states a case imperfectly, the statute (of jeofails), after judgment without objection to the defect, intends to cure it; but not where the declaration states no case at all. The opinions of JUDGE LEE in Kennaird v. Jones, 9 Gratt., at page 189, and in Hitchcox v. Rawson, 14 Gratt., at page 538, and of JUDGE MONCURE in Boyles v. Overby, 11 Gratt. 202, in their construction of the statute, are to same effect. See Land Co. v. Karn, 80 Va. 589, 595." For other cases where the statute of jeofails was held inapplicable because no cause of action was stated, see Ross v. Milne, 12 Leigh, 204, 37 Am. Dec. 646; Mason v. Bank, 12 Leigh 84.

See the principal case distinguished in Spengler v. Davy, 15 Gratt. 397, 398; Holliday v. Myers, 11 W. Va. 287, 289, 290, 291.

gro, at the time of said warranty and sale, was not sound, &c. The second count set out that the plaintiff was induced by Boyles to buy the said slave, by falsely, deceitfully and fraudulently suppressing and concealing from the plaintiff the fact that the slave at the time of the sale labored under an incurable disease called consumption, which said unsoundness was well known to said Boyles.

Whilst the case was pending the administrator of Boyles was removed from his office, and administration de bonis non was granted to Clark Penn; and on his motion, he was admitted a party defendant.

On the trial of the cause there was a verdict for the plaintiff for two hundred and eighty-six dollars and fifty cents, upon which the court rendered a personal judgment against Penn: And he thereupon applied to this court for a supersedeas, which was awarded.

Grattan, for the appellant.

There was no counsel for the appellee.

SAMUELS, J. The plaintiff's cause of action is set forth in a declaration of two counts.

In the first count he alleges a deceit by Boyles the intestate, in the sale of a diseased slave; and alleges that the plaintiff was induced to purchase by means of a false and fraudulent warranty of soundness.

In the second count he alleges a deceit in the sale of an unsound slave by Boyles the intestate, by means of a fraudulent concealment of the unsoundness of the slave. There is nothing in the record to show upon what proof the verdict was rendered.

These causes of action, and each of them, died with the vendor Boyles; if suit thereon had been brought *in his life time, it must have abated by his death. The suit brought against his administrator, and revived against the administrator de bonis non, was for causes of action no longer in existence. This appears from the plaintiff's own showing; and judgment should have been rendered for the defendant, notwithstanding the verdict, unless the statute of jeofails, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, § 103, p. 511, may require a different judgment.

It is obvious to remark that notwithstanding the comprehensive terms of the statute, it was not thereby intended to cure all cases occurring before verdict: If such had been the purpose of the legislature, a simple and direct enactment to that end would have been the mode adopted. Instead of this, an enumeration is given of particular errors, which, after verdict, shall not be relied on to stay or reverse the judgment; amongst them are these: "Any mistake or misconception of the form of action;" or "any other defect whatsoever in the declaration or pleading, whether of form or substance, which might have been taken advantage of by demurrer, and which shall not have been so taken advantage of."

fore us, we may discard the second count of the declaration; that is clearly beyond the reach of help from the statute. The first count, in alleging the fraud, sets forth that it was perpetrated by means of a false warranty; and it has been suggested that this action on the case in form ex delicto, for the tort, the fraud in the deceit, was misconceived for an action on the warranty, and therefore is cured by the verdict. This I conceive cannot be so. The legislature cannot have intended to sustain a judgment because in a different form of action, and upon proof of other facts, a judgment might have been had for damages assessed by a different rule; 205 and *thus, almost necessarily, different in amount. The verdict in this case was rendered upon proof of fraud; for without such proof it could not have been rendered at all. See Trice v. Cockran, 8 Gratt. 442. Yet in an action on the warranty, fraud cannot be proven, being wholly immaterial to the cause of action. The ex'ors of Evertson v. Miles, 6 John. R. 138. In an action on a warranty of soundness, the measure of damages is the difference between the real value and the price paid. Tuck. Com. book 2, ch. 25, p. 353 of new edition; Thornton v. Thompson, 4 Gratt. 121. In case for deceit there is, perhaps, no fixed rule for the assessment of damages; they are not limited, however, as in an action on the warranty; if so, they may go beyond those recoverable in an action on the warranty. Rice v. White, 4 Leigh 474; Brown v. Shields, 6 Leigh 440. An action is misconceived only in a case wherein, upon trial, the proof shows a cause of action fit to be asserted in a form different from that adopted; the defendant is held liable upon proof showing a liability; if no objection be made to the form of action until after verdict, the defect is cured thereby. To hold the defendant liable upon a cause of action not asserted, is going to the utmost verge of the statute even where such cause of action is proven; but to hold him liable for such cause when not proven, or proven by evidence not admissible, if the suit had been brought for that cause, is going beyond the letter and spirit of the law.

The other clause of the statute of jeofails, above referred to, will not sustain the judgment. This clause was intended to aid defects of form or substance in pleading: If, however, a declaration sets forth no cause of action whatever, or a plea sets forth no defence whatever, the statute can give no aid. It extends to cases in which a portion of the matter pleaded is 206 *appropriate, but not to cases in which the matter pleaded, in all its parts, is merely nugatory.

The plaintiff having shown no cause of action whatever, I am of opinion to reverse the judgment; and on the authority of Brown v. Shields, 6 Leigh 440; Mason v. Farmers Bank at Petersburg, 12 Leigh 84; Ross v. Milne & wife, 12 Leigh 204; Tomkins v. The Branch Bank, 11 Leigh 372, to enter judgment for the defendant, notwithstanding the verdict.

MONCURE, J. Case and assumpsit are concurrent remedies for a breach of a warranty contained in a simple contract of sale. Formerly case was the remedy, generally, if not always pursued. Recently, it has been found more convenient to declare in assumpsit, for the sake of adding the money counts. In Williamson v. Allison, 2 East's R. 450, Lord Ellenborough, C. J., said: "The more modern practice had not prevailed generally above forty years. No other proof was required to sustain the former mode of declaring than the warranty itself and the breach of it." The scianter was not necessary to be averred; nor, if averred, to be proved. The action, though in form ex delicto, was in substance ex contractu. It could probably have been maintained at common law against an executor on the warranty of his testator, although the general issue is "not guilty," and the general rule, as laid down by Lord Mansfield in Hambly v. Trott, Cowp. 371, was, that an action in which "not guilty" was the general issue was a personal action which died with the person. Being formerly the general, if not the only, form of action in such cases, it was probably used as well against executors as others. In Powel v. Layton, 5 Bos. & Pul. 370, Mansfield, C. J., seemed to be of opinion that case would lie against the executor of a carrier, the foundation of the action being essentially contract. The same principle would apply, at least as strongly, to an action on the case for a breach of warranty.

But however this may be, I think the action might have been maintained under the equity of the statute, 1 Rev. Code of 1819, p. 390, § 64, which declared that "actions of trespass may be maintained by or against executors or administrators for any goods taken or carried away in the life time of the testator or intestate." This section is an extension of the statute, 4 Edw. 3, ch. 7, de bonis asportatis, so as to embrace actions brought against, as well as by executors and administrators. Vaughan's adm'r v. Winckler's ex'or, 4 Munf. 136; Lee v. Cooke's ex'or, Gilm. 331. The statute of Edw. 3 altered the rule, actio personalis moritur cum persona, only in its relation to personal property, and in favor of the personal representative of the party injured. But to that extent it has always received a very liberal construction. "It has been observed that the taking of goods and chattels was put in the statute merely as an instance, and not as a restriction to such injuries only; and that the term trespass must, with reference to the language of the times when the statute was passed, signify any wrong; and accordingly the statute has been construed to extend to every description of injury to personal property by which it has been rendered less beneficial to the executor; whatever the form of action may be; so that an executor may support trespass or trover, case for a false return to final process, and case or debt for an escape, &c. on final process;"—"or debt against an executor suggesting a devastavit in the life time of the plaintiff's testator; or case against the sheriff for removing goods taken in execution, without paying the testator a year's rent." 1 Chit. Pl. 69. Our statute being, as before stated, but an extension of the stat. of Edw. 3, should be construed in the same manner; extending to defendants the same rule of construction which, under the limited terms of that statute, had been applied only to plaintiffs. That such has been the case, is shown by the decisions already cited and others to be found in our reports.

But even if I be wrong in all this; and if, instead of an action on the case, the plaintiff should have brought an action of assumpsit against the administrator of Boyles in this case; yet, the defendant not having demurred to the declaration, but having pleaded the general issue, and verdict and judgment having been rendered thereon; I think the defect was cured by the statute of jeofails, 1 Rev. Code, p. 512, § 103; being, at most, but a mistake or misconception of the form of action, which is expressly embraced in that statute. The only difficulty I have had on the subject has arisen from the fact that the declaration contained two counts, one for a false warranty and the other for a deceit. The latter of course cannot be supported against an administrator; and if it had been the only count in the declaration, the defect would not have been cured by the verdict. But as the plaintiff, by proving the breach of a warranty by simple contract of the defendant's intestate, would have shown a good cause of action under the first count, though not in that form; and as the defendant could by motion have had the plaintiff's evidence confined to that count, or an instruction to the jury to disregard the other count; and as every reasonable presumption should be made in favor of the verdict, I think the verdict must be regarded as having been rendered on the first count, and the defect is therefore cured.

If the form of the action were the only objection to the judgment, I would therefore be for affirming it. But it was erroneously rendered against the appellant de bonis propriis; and it would be necessary on that ground to reverse it, and render a judgment of the goods of the intestate.

*I have not considered the objection taken to the judgment on account of the exclusion of portions of the depositions, deeming it unnecessary to do so, as the case is decided by a majority of this court on other grounds.

LEE, J., also dissented from the opinion of Samuels, J., though he was of opinion that the personal judgment against the administrator was erroneous; and on that ground it should be reversed.

DANIEL, J., concurred in the opinion of Samuels, J., except as to the measure of damages on a warranty of soundness.

ALLEN, J., concurred with Samuels, J.

Judgment reversed, and entered for the appellant.

210 *Fitzhugh's Ex'ors v. Fitzhugh:

April Term, 1854, Richmond.

1. Deed of Trust upon Slaves—When Equity Will Refuse to Enforce—Case at Bar.—Money lent by a bachelor uncle to his nephew, to secure which a deed of trust upon slaves was executed, was held under the circumstances to have been forgiven and released by the uncle to the nephew, so that a court of equity would refuse to enforce the trust at the suit of the executors of the uncle.

2. Appellate Practice—Issue Out of Chancery—No Exception to Verdict—Effect.—Upon an issue directed out of chancery, the verdict of the jury is conclusive, where there is no exception spreading the facts proved upon the record.

This was a suit in the Circuit court of Fauquier county, instituted in 1844 by the executors of Thomas Fitzhugh against Dudley Fitzhugh, to enforce a deed of trust executed by the latter in September 1823, to secure two debts amounting to eleven hundred and fifty dollars due to Thomas Fitzhugh. The bill sets out the deed and alleges that no part of the debt had been paid. It alleges that one of the executors of Thomas Fitzhugh is the trustee in the deed and interested in his estate, and therefore cannot sell under the deed; and that the plaintiffs do not know what number of slaves embraced in it are still in the possession of the defendant. They therefore ask for a discovery of the slaves in the possession of the defendant; that they may be sold and the proceeds applied to the payment of the debt; that there may be a personal decree against the defendant for any residue of the debt, and for general relief.

Dudley Fitzhugh answered the bill. He admits the execution of the deed of trust, but denies that the whole or any part of the sums of money mentioned therein, was due to Thomas Fitzhugh at his death.

211 *He states that when the said sums of money were obtained by him, Thomas Fitzhugh had no intention of exacting their payment. That the sum of seven hundred and fifty dollars was obtained on the 10th of March 1819, the sum of four hundred dollars on the 20th of August 1823, and no note or memorandum in writing was executed or required to be executed, as a testimonial of the debts; and it was not until the 22d of September 1823, that the defendant, finding his pecuniary condition embarrassed, volunteered, without the knowledge of Thomas Fitzhugh, to execute and put upon record the said deed. He avers that Thomas Fitzhugh never in fact accepted the deed, nor regarded the same as a valid security for the repayment of the sums of money aforesaid. That the deed embraced all the slaves owned by the defendant; and some time after its execution, the pressure of the defendant's pecuniary difficulties compelled him to raise large sums of money, which he effected by sales of certain of these slaves: and he names eight slaves that he had sold and the prices amounting to three thousand two hundred and ten dollars. All of which sales were made, as he alleges, with the privity and knowledge of Thomas Fitzhugh. That the purchaser required that Thomas Fitzhugh should be applied to and advised of the intended sales; and on every occasion he disclaimed any right or interest in the deed of trust or the property therein mentioned. That in this way repeated sales of the said property were made, until there only remained an old man, an old woman and a small girl, whose aggregate value does not exceed four hundred and fifty dollars. That defendant verily believes that when the said sums of money were advanced, Thomas Fitzhugh had no intention of exacting their repayment, but intended the same as gifts. But however this may be, that after the said sums of money were advanced and the deed of

212 trust executed, *the defendant rendered to said Thomas Fitzhugh, through a series of years, valuable services, which were regarded and accepted by him as full satisfaction for said sum of money, or furnished a motive for the donation thereof, so that in any view at his death no debt existed against the defendant on account thereof. That Thomas Fitzhugh was possessed of a very large estate, was unmarried and without children, was one of a very numerous family, lived to an advanced age, and many of his heirs and distributees were scattered in distant states, and personally unknown to him. That his property consisted chiefly of lands and slaves, divided into four distinct establishments, upon neither of which did he employ an overseer. The defendant was his nephew, lived within a short distance of his residence; enjoyed his confidence and affection; and for many years before his death, when he had become incapable of active exertion, was in the daily practice of rendering assistance in the management of his affairs. Had an account been kept of these services, at a moderate value, they would have greatly exceeded the demand now sought to be established against the defendant; and if it shall become necessary for his protection, he prays that an account of his said services may be taken, and the value thereof set off against the demand of the plaintiffs.

The deed of trust referred to in the bill and answer bears date the 22d day of September 1823, and recites that the grantor, Dudley Fitzhugh, is indebted to Thomas Fitzhugh in the sum of one thousand one hundred dollars, with interest on seven hundred and fifty dollars, a part thereof, from the 10th day of August 1819, and with interest on four hundred dollars, the residue thereof, from the 20th of August 1823. It provided for the execution of the trust at any time after the 1st of January 213 1824, if the money *was not paid by that time: and it was executed by the grantor, the cestui que trust and the trustee, and was recorded upon their acknowledgment in the clerk's office of the County court of Fauquier.

The defendant examined two witnesses, both of them nephews of the testator of the plaintiffs. One of them, Thomas H. Fitzhugh, stated, that he had a conversation with the testator some four or five years before his death, in relation to the deed of trust. The witness had gone over to Thomas Fitzhugh's, at the instance of the defendant, to obtain his permission to sell three of these slaves. When he named the object of his visit, Thomas Fitzhugh, contrary to witness's expectations, readily acquiesced, merely remarking that he was sorry defendant's necessities were such as to require the course; that in so doing he was depriving himself and wife of all means of support when it was in his power so well to avoid it, and keep his negroes. It was true he said Dudley had executed this deed, but that he (Thomas Fitzhugh) never claimed or expected any benefit therefrom. In fact in all his conversation he throughout clearly expressed himself as having no claim to the property specified in the deed of trust. And he remarked that he had permitted Dudley to sell all that were worth anything. In answer to a question whether in his conversations with the testator he seemed to regard the defendant as his debtor for the amounts advanced to him, or did he treat the money as a gift: He answered, that he always understood it as a gift. The other witness stated that in a conversation with Thomas Fitzhugh he mentioned that the money was given to Dudley Fitzhugh, and he never expected anything but his services as compensation. The last conversation passed a short time before his death at his own house.

It was proved that Thomas Fitzhugh died at an advanced age, probably over 214 eighty years. He was an *old bachelor, lived entirely alone, about three miles from the residence of the defendant. That he was very wealthy, having four large estates; and had not kept an overseer for twenty-five years. That the defendant was often called upon by him for his assistance in the adjustment of his accounts, and frequently in regard to other matters concerning his business; and that he was a favorite nephew.

When the cause came on to be heard the court directed an issue to be made up between the parties, and tried by a jury to be impaneled before the court, on the law side thereof, to ascertain: 1st. Whether the defendant rendered any services to the testator of the plaintiffs, at any time between the 22d day of September 1823 and his death. 2d. How much the defendant deserved to have for such services, if any were rendered.

Upon the trial of the issues, the jury found that the defendant had rendered services to the testator of the plaintiff within the time specified: And that he deserved to have for such services one hundred and fifty dollars per annum from the 22d of September 1823 until the death of the testator in November 1843, with interest thereon from the end of each year respectively. And the court being satisfied with the verdict, directed it to be certified to the chancery side of the court. The plaintiffs filed various exceptions to the issue directed, and the proceedings under it; but none of them have reference to the correctness of the verdict upon the evidence.

After the verdict was certified to the chancery court, another witness was examined by the defendant, by whom it was proved that Thomas Fitzhugh recognized his obligations to the defendant for services he had rendered and was rendering to him, equal and more than equal to the money advanced to him.

The cause came on to be finally 215 heard in October *1847, when the court below, being of opinion that it was the understanding of the defendant and the testator of the plaintiffs, that the services rendered by the former to the latter should be a satisfaction of the sums advanced from time to time, and mentioned in the deed of trust; that those services were continued up to the time of the death of the testator; and the jury having found that they were more than adequate to the satisfaction of the demand set up by plaintiffs, decreed that the bill be dismissed with costs. And the plaintiffs thereupon applied to this court for an appeal, which was allowed.

Patton, for the appellants.

Morson, for the appellee.

ALLEN, P. This case is one of the first impression in this court, and I have had some difficulty in arriving at any conclusion satisfactory to my own mind. The difficulty has been somewhat increased by the conflicting pretensions relied on by the appellee to defeat the claim. The allegations of the answer that the testator had no intention of exacting payment when the money was advanced, and that the appellee without his knowledge executed the deed of trust and spread it upon record, are refuted by an exhibition of the deed itself. From that, as it appears in the record, it seems that the deed was actually executed by all the parties, including the testator, and recorded upon their acknowledgment. The debt must therefore have been considered as an actual debt at that time, and the deed accepted as a security for it. And as to the claim that the debt was actually paid by the services rendered to his uncle by the nephew: No account for them seems ever to have been kept or charge made for them; and although they may with other considerations have operated on the creditor

216 in *inducing him to forgive the debt,

I do not think the evidence shows that either party treated those services in the light of business transactions entering into the accounts of the parties.

I think, however, in view of all the circumstances of this case, and the relation in which the parties stood towards each other, enough appears to show that if the debt has not been actually released, yet that the creditor in favor of his debtor, has himself treated it as released, or in the language of the books, dead in point of effect. That whether the uncle contemplated a gift or not when the deed was executed, or united in the transaction not with the intention of exacting payment of the money really advanced, but to protect the property of the nephew from other claims, it is, I think, manifest that long before his death he treated this debt as released and forgiven. In the case of Wekett & ux. v. Raby, 2 Bro. Par. Ca. 386, the circumstances were not as strong. There the deceased on his death bed desired his executrix and residuary legatee not to trouble his debtor for a bond debt, saying that he did not deliver up the bond, for he might want it more than the debtor, but when he died the debtor should have it; he should not be asked or troubled for it. The debtor had been counsel for the creditor, but a dispute had occurred between them when the bond was executed, and they had not been friendly thereafter. Lord Macclesfield decreed that the bond should be surrendered to be canceled and satisfaction acknowledged; and his decree, upon appeal to the house of lords, was affirmed.

In the recent case of Flower v. Martin, 2 Milne & Craig 459, 14 Cond. Eng. Ch. R. 459, the case of Wekett & ux. v. Raby was approved and followed. In the last case a father had taken a bond from the son for advances under circumstances which in-

217 duced the court to believe he did not intend to exact payment, *or to hold it as a security to be put in force against his son for the benefit of his estate, but rather as a check upon his future conduct. In these and other cases referred to in 2 Story's Eq. Jur. § 705 a, 706, 706 a, the debt was secured by bond or note, and its existence as a valid claim was undisputed. In the leading case of Wekett v. Raby it was regarded and treated by the creditor as a subsisting debt, which he, at the time of making the declarations on his death bed, had still a right to enforce; but not intending that it should be regarded as a debt due from his debtor to his estate, and to be put in force accordingly, the court gave relief. In the case before us, the uncle was a bachelor of advanced age, and owning a large estate, the nephew resided near him, was a favorite nephew, and apparently poor and embarrassed with debt. When the money was advanced, no note or bond seems to have been required or given, and the deed of trust contains no covenant to pay the debt. More than twenty years elapsed between the execution of the trust deed and the uncle's death. During all this time no demand was made for payment. The only evidence we have that the deed was regarded as a subsisting security by anybody, arises out of the fact, that the debtor being desirous of selling some of the slaves for his own benefit, applied to the uncle for his permission to do so. It was readily given until the security was nearly exhausted, it being shown by the proof that sales were made from time to time, and the answer averring that nearly all the slaves were so disposed of, and but three, not exceeding four hundred and fifty dollars in value, remained unsold. When applied to for his permission, the uncle declared that he never claimed or expected any benefit from the deed, and that he had permitted his nephew to sell all the slaves of any value. The fact that he did assent to such sales until 218 the security was nearly exhausted, *proves the truth of his declaration that he did not claim any benefit from the deed, the only security or evidence of debt he held. In addition to this the uncle, on another occasion, is proved to have observed to another nephew, who was desirous of borrowing money from him, that the services of the appellee were equal and more than equal in value to him, to the money advanced.

The fact, that services through a long course of years were rendered, is placed beyond doubt by the verdict of the jury upon the issues directed in the cause. There being no exception spreading the facts upon the record, we must take it that they justified the finding of the jury. They find that the appellee rendered such services from the date of the deed in September 1823 to the death of the uncle in November 1843; and estimate their value at one hundred and fifty dollars per annum through the whole period. Without regarding these services in the light of payments or legal offsets, the fact that they were rendered, that they were regarded by the creditor as valuable, equal according to his declarations to the money advanced, is a circumstance tending strongly to confirm the conviction produced by all the other circumstances, that the uncle regarded the debt released and forgiven to his debtor. Such services furnished an additional inducement for the uncle so to regard the debt. It is a circumstance not appearing in the cases referred to, and makes this a much stronger case for relief than any of them. Taking into consideration the relationship between the parties; the fact that the appellee was a favorite nephew; the omission of the creditor to assert any claim under the deed during his life time, though he lived twenty years after its execution; the sales from time to time, with his knowledge and consent, for the debtor's benefit, of nearly all the slaves conveyed; his declaration that he 219 *claimed no benefit from the deed; his admissions that the services of his nephew to him were equal in value to the money advanced; the fact established by the verdict of the jury, that valuable services were rendered, extending over the whole period intervening between the deed and the death of the creditor; I feel satisfied, that looking at this transaction as one exclusively between a creditor and his debtor, it was the intention of the former to treat the debt as forgiven and released to the debtor. I think, therefore, it is a case in which a court of equity might properly stay its hand, and refuse its assistance to the executors of the creditor seeking its aid to enforce this deed for the benefit of their testator's estate.

for that would be a very strong ground in support of a testamentary act. Further, there must be proof that the act was obtained by this coercion, by importunity which could not be resisted; that it was done merely for the sake of peace, so that the motive was tantamount to force and fear.' This is the definition given by an eminent author, Jarmyn on Wills, page 29, supported by numerous authorities, and approved by this court in Parramore v. Taylor, 11 Gratt. 220; Redf. Amer. Cases upon the Law of Wills, 280, 725, 735-6-7, 741; Greer v. Greers, 9 Gratt. 830." Several other cases, citing the principal case, also approved this definition. See Carter v. Carter, 82 Va. 641; Orr v. Pennington, 93 Va. 273, 24 S. E. Rep. 928; Forney v. Ferrell, 4 W. Va. 743.

In Nicholas v. Kershner, 20 W. Va. 257, JOHNSON, P., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The court further instructed the jury for proponents, that 'although the jury may believe, that the testator was fickle and inconstant, and that at one time he favored one or more of his children, and at other times disliked those and favored others; still if they believe he acted freely and had the capacity to understand, what property he had, and to whom he was giving it, the will is not invalid on that account; and if they believe his will was caused by the extreme kindness and attention of the devisees, that will not constitute undue influence, which will invalidate the will.' This instruction is correct. It amounts to saying, that a free and competent testator may give his property to whom he pleases, and the kindness and attention of those, who are the recipients of his bounty, however extreme that kindness and attention may have been, cannot be regarded as 'undue influence' exerted upon the testator. It would show a greater reason for making such a will. It is natural, that a father, should prefer a kind and attentive child to one who was unkind, thankless and ungrateful. Forney v. Ferrell, 4 W. Va. 742; Parramore v. Taylor, 11 Gratt. 220; Simmerman v. Songer, 29 Gratt. 24; Remsen v. Brinckerhoff, 26 Wend. 840." See also, "Instructions in the Daingerfield Will Case," 5 Va. Law Reg. 149-157.

§Wills—Attestation—In Whose Presence.—It seems well settled in Virginia that the statute prescribing the mode of executing a will does not require that the witnesses shall subscribe their names in the presence of each other. As further authority for this proposition, see the principal case cited and followed in Beane v. Yerby, 12 Gratt. 239; Green v. Crain, 12 Gratt. 252. But the West Virginia Code declares that the subscribing witnesses "shall subscribe the will in the presence of the testator, and of each other." Code of West Virginia, ch. 77, sec. 3.

The statute both in Virginia and West Virginia requires that each witness shall subscribe the will in the presence of the testator (Va. Code 1887, sec. 2514; W. Va. Code 1899, ch. 77, sec. 3). As to what is in the presence of the testator, see a somewhat extended foot-note to Sturdivant v. Birchett, 10 Gratt. 67.

room, and T again acknowledges the paper as his will and requests B to attest it, who does so, C being present when T acknowledges the paper to B, but not subscribing it or recognizing his subscription at that time: The whole, however, being done within a few minutes. The will was duly attested.

At the October term 1851 of the Circuit court of Accomack county, a paper purporting to be the will and codicil thereto of Thomas T. Taylor deceased, was propounded for probat by Edward W. Taylor, one of the nominated executors therein; and its admission to probat was opposed by Thomas H. Parramore and Sarah A. his wife; and Thomas H. Parramore dying during the controversy in the Circuit court, the opposition to the probat was continued by Sarah A. Parramore, who and the propounder of the will were the only children of Thomas T. Taylor. The will bears date the 24th of June 1851. It was written by James S. Corbin, and is attested by him and by Edward C. Bloxom and Littleton Walker. The codicil bears date the 7th of September 1851, and was also written by Corbin, and was attested by him and Robert J. and 221 *William T. Silverthorn. The proceedings in the cause, and the facts on which the opinion of the court is founded, are stated by Judge Moncure in his opinion. The court below admitted the will and a part of the codicil to probat; and from that sentence Mrs. Parramore obtained an appeal to this court.

R. T. Daniel, for the appellant.
Patton, for the appellee.

MONCURE, J. This is an appeal from a sentence of the Circuit court of Accomack, admitting to probat two testamentary writings purporting to be the will and codicil of Thomas T. Taylor. They were propounded by his son Edward W. Taylor the appellee, who is the principal devisee and legatee, and named executor; and were contested by his daughter Sarah A. Parramore the appellant, and her husband Thomas H. Parramore, who is since dead; the said son and daughter being the testator's only children and heirs at law. They were contested on the grounds of, first, incapacity; secondly, undue influence; and thirdly, defective execution.

The case was first tried by a jury; but it was unable to agree, and was discharged. Afterwards it was agreed to submit the whole case, upon the law and the evidence, to the court, from whose sentence either party might appeal; and that in the event of an appeal, it should be specially certified to the Court of appeals, that the judge sitting on the trial of the issue heard, and was present at the examination of, all the evidence in the cause. The court decided to admit the will and codicil to probat, with the exception of a part of the codicil considered by the court to have been improperly inserted therein. The examinations of the witnesses and the documentary evidence were certified as the facts proved on the 222 trial, and were *ordered to be made a part of the record in the cause. The whole case is now before this court for revision of the sentence of the Circuit court thereon.

I will consider the grounds of opposition to the probat in the order above stated. But it seems to be proper in the first place, to enquire, whether the testimony of James S. Corbin is to be regarded as credible. He is by far the most important witness in this cause; and if his testimony is to be believed, it conclusively settles at least two of the three questions arising in the case. He was the scrivener who wrote both the will and the codicil, as well as a prior will; was present at the execution and acknowledgment of all of them, and was a subscribing witness to all. It was of vital consequence to the contestant, therefore, to overthrow, if possible, the testimony of this witness; and an attempt was accordingly made to do so; or to weaken the force of the testimony as much as possible. The means mainly used for that purpose was a very long and close cross examination. No witness was introduced, no question asked, to impeach his general character for veracity or otherwise. The only evidence offered tending in any way to discredit him was that of Mrs. Young, a cousin of Mrs. Parramore, and it would seem, a sister of her husband Thomas H. Parramore. She testified that when the witness Corbin was formerly in attendance at court to prove the will and codicil, he dined with her husband Dr. Young; and in a conversation between them on the subject, Corbin, in answer to a question of the doctor, whether the testator had to reflect in disposing of his property, said "No, he recited or read it off as a school boy would a lesson; he (Corbin) said his brain was such that any impression might be made upon it." It is remarkable that her husband, who was also examined as a witness, and in answer to whose question the alleged statement of Corbin 223 was *made, did not remember it. The recollection of Mrs. Young as to the other circumstances of the visit and conversation was very indistinct. She said she did not know why the words of Corbin before stated made so strong an impression on her mind, unless it was confirming her in what she thought before, that her uncle was child-like. She admitted that Mrs. Parramore was a favorite cousin, and that she wished the will overthrown, because she thought, if left to himself, her uncle would never have made such a will. I have no idea that Mrs. Young, in giving her evidence, said anything that she did not believe to be true. But I think she was insensibly influenced by feelings of partiality, and misunderstood, or misconstrued, or did not rightly remember, the words of Corbin. The words, as stated by her, would have been in direct conflict with his sworn testimony given in court on the same day, and which seems to be substantially the same with his subsequent testimony in the case. Though subjected to the test of a close cross examination, his testimony is consistent in itself, and materially variant from none of the other testimony in the case. His intelligence appears from his evidence, and his general character for veracity is strongly sustained by several witnesses who have long known him, and whose testimony appears to be entitled to much weight. He ought, therefore, to be regarded as a truthful witness in the decision of this cause. I will now proceed to consider the grounds of opposition to the probat. And

First, as to the alleged incapacity of the testator.

The testator appears to have been a man of good common sense, and to have been prudent and careful in the management of his affairs. He was about seventy-five years of age when he died, and for some time previous to his death had been in the habit of drinking freely, and perhaps many times to excess. It is not pretended, how-

224 ever, that he was incapacitated by the ordinary *effects of old age, or drunkenness; or that he was under the influence of ardent spirit, or any other kind of stimulant, at the time of the execution of the will or the codicil. The only ground of the alleged incapacity relied on is, that for a few months before his death, and until his death, he was supposed to be affected by a disease of the brain, which produced occasional convulsions and partial paralysis, and that two of these convulsions or fits actually occurred while he was engaged in dictating the will to the scrivener. The commencement of the disease appears to have been early in June 1851. The will was executed and acknowledged on the 24th of that month, the codicil on the 7th of September thereafter, and the testator died on the 29th of the latter month. Dr. Joynes, a witness apparently of great intelligence, skill and scientific information, attended him during his last illness, and gives a minute account of the disease, and of the condition of the patient during his several visits; which were on the 17th and 19th of June, on the 29th and 31st of August, and on the 4th of September 1851. The disease with which he believed the patient was affected was "softening of some part of the left side of the brain." And the account which he gives of its nature and effects is as follows:

"That disease is a softening, that is to say, a diminution of consistence of one or more parts of the brain, generally limited in extent, varying generally from the size of a pea to that of an orange: in a few cases affecting an entire half of the brain, rarely if ever the whole of it. It makes its attack in a variety of forms; sometimes the symptoms are very much those of ordinary apoplexy; the patient falling senseless and motionless, and dying in a few hours; in some instances, after the disease has commenced in this way, the patient, after a time, recovers his senses, but remains palsied in one or more limbs, 225 with frequently *more or less impairment of mind. In another class of cases, the disease begins with symptoms of inflammation of the brain, there being headache, fever, delirium, sometimes partial, convulsive movements, frequently with rigid contraction of one or more limbs, which is generally followed by palsy of the same limbs. In numerous cases, the approach of the disease is more gradual, the patient, perhaps, after suffering for a time with headache and giddiness, experiences some unusual sensation in one or both limbs of one side of the body, such as pain, tingling, &c. After a time the power of movement and the faculty of sensation in those limbs become impaired; this impairment increases until a total paralysis of those parts is the effect: partial convulsions may or may not precede or alternate with this palsy; sometimes in the beginning of such cases there is a gradual impairment of the mental faculties—though in many instances they remain unaffected until the last moments or hours of life. It must be understood that the foregoing is a very general account of some of the leading forms of the disease, and that the symptoms themselves and their order of succession vary a good deal in different cases. Its usual termination is in death; though the interval between the first attack and death may vary from a few hours to several years."—"If the disease be limited to a small portion of the brain, I believe that it may continue for a considerable time without destroying the testamentary capacity of the individual." Being asked by the contestant in the cross examination, "Do you refer the disease of the testator to that class attended with inflammation and delirium, or to that in which there is no inflammation attending the softening of the brain?" the doctor answered, "I refer his case to that in which there is no inflammation." And in answer to another question of the contestant, he said,

"I believe that softening of the brain

226 *may, without producing disorder of the intellect, produce a weakening of the will; an impairment of steady purpose; and a liability to be influenced by others. I also believe it possible that such disease might produce a perversion of the ordinary affections and dispositions."

In regard to the condition of the testator at the several visits, the doctor says that at his first visit, which was on the 17th of June, "The principal circumstance which attracted my attention was the occurrence of convulsions affecting the right half of his body at intervals. These convulsions continued for a minute or less at each return, and were followed by partial palsy of the right limbs and of the tongue; and this palsy gradually passed off in the intervals of the convulsions; so that before the return of the convulsion he had perfect use of all the limbs and of the tongue. A minute or two after the cessation of the fit, he would utter the word 'basket' two or three times, somewhat indistinctly, and then begin to talk, at first rather thickly, and afterwards with sufficient distinctness. In fact, after some time, his speech was entirely distinct and unaffected. The left side of his body seemed to be entirely unaffected either by the convulsions or by the temporary palsy which followed them. He complained of some feeling of fullness about the head, but I do not recollect that he complained of pain."—"I cannot speak with precision as to the intervals between the fits; but I would say, in general terms, that it was about an hour, more or less, while I saw him. As to the regularity of their return and duration, I am unable to speak, because he had only two, or at most, three fits during my first visit. The duration of each fit in which I saw him seemed to be about the same."—"As to the state of his mind during these convulsions, I know nothing; after a convulsion had passed off, and the faculty of speech returned, his mind seemed clear."

227 *In the perfect intervals of the fits he communicated with the doctor as a sane and intelligent patient. The doctor was with him, on this visit, about three hours and a half, and does not think there was more than a quarter of an hour of the time in which his mind was not apparently clear. The next visit was on the night of the 19th of June, just five days before the execution of the will. "At that time (says the doctor), the convulsions had ceased; the palsy had disappeared, and the other symptoms, which I have previously mentioned, were less marked; he seemed much better in all respects."—"I next saw him on the night of the 29th of August about 10 or 11 o'clock; he was then laboring under a palsy, complete or nearly so, of the parts which had been affected at my first visit, except the tongue, which was only partially paralyzed, leaving his articulation, although somewhat thick and difficult, yet easily understood."—"The palsy, during the visit of which I speak, was permanent; it was neither absent nor diminished at any time during my visit, as far as I recollect. His mind was clear. I detected no delirium, incoherence, or other manifest disorder of the intellect. There was no convulsion during this visit, which lasted until shortly after sunrise next morning. I was in the room with Mr. Taylor some two or three hours of this time." The next visit was on the 31st of August; "his physical symptoms were much the same as at the visit of the 29th of August; nor do I think the state of his mind was materially different."—"He had no convulsions at this time."—"My next and last visit was on the 4th of September, about 11 or 12 o'clock in the morning; it continued probably two hours. At this time the tongue was much more affected by the palsy than at my two preceding visits. I experienced much difficulty in conversing with him. I was sometimes obliged to repeat a question two or three times before a clear answer could be

228 obtained; and sometimes it *required the assistance of persons standing around the bed to enable me fully to understand what he said. In other respects, I recollect nothing particular to be noted in reference to his physical condition as differing from what it was at my previous visit. As it respects the state of his mind, I am not able to speak with as much confidence as at previous visits, because, owing to the great difficulty of speech, I conversed with him but little, and obtained most of the information, which I desired in regard to his condition, since my last visit, from members of the family. So far as I conversed with him, his answers were rational. Another reason why I held but little conversation with him was, that he seemed but little disposed to talk. He appeared low spirited and somewhat fretful and irritable, and disposed to find fault with persons in the room if every attention was not promptly bestowed; he was also quite restless, requiring to be frequently lifted up and down." This visit was three days before the execution of the codicil.

Dr. West was the family physician of the testator at the time of his death; attended him during his last illness; thinks his mental condition was good about the period of the date of the will; thought he conversed as rationally as ever; saw no reason to doubt his capacity to transact ordinary business, and of disposing of his property in any way; thought he was capable of transacting his own business, such as paying and receiving debts, settling accounts, and giving and taking receipts up to the last time he visited him, which was about a week before his death; and of course about a fortnight after the date of the codicil.

I have stated thus fully the evidence of the attending physicians, because it is entitled to great and peculiar weight in determining the question now under consideration. On this subject see the opinion of Carr, J., in Burton v. Scott, 3 Rand. 399, 403.

James S. Corbin, the draftsman of 229 the will and codicil, *had always known the testator; was well acquainted with him for the last thirty years of his life; lived within three or four miles of him for the last twenty years; and was intimate with him the larger portion of the time; thinks that at the time of making his will and codicil he was as capable or competent mentally to make a will as at any previous time. The facts stated by this witness fully sustain his opinion of the capacity of the testator. He says, "I wrote two wills for the testator; this in court is the second. At the time I wrote the first will, he had before him his bonds and notes and a copy of his wife's will. After reading over the copy of his wife's will attentively, he remarked to me that he had promised his wife to make up his daughter's portion of land equal to his son's; but he believed she had already as many acres as he (Edward) had. I replied, 'yes; but her land, a large portion, was not worth more than four or five dollars an acre, and Edward's, a portion of it, worth from twenty to thirty dollars an acre.' Here he used a slight exclamation, what I do not recollect. He then proceeded to add up the amount of his bonds and notes; after doing this, he said, with a long sigh, or breath, or something of the kind, 'I will make a will to please them, but, I expect there will be a squabble over it.' This was the time of making the first will. Some ten or twelve days after this I was again sent for to go down to his house, and he told me he wished to make some alterations in his will. I asked him if it would not be better to destroy the first will and make a new one. He answered that he thought it would. He then directed me to destroy the old will, which I did, and he took his seat at the table and dictated the will now in court, which I wrote for him. During the time I was writing the will, and just before, he had an attack of paralysis or palsy, or whatever you may call it; he 230 said he was *like some old man, whose name he mentioned, who made a will and gave all his property to himself, and said he thought too much of his property to give it to any person while living. He had, I think, while writing the last will, two short attacks of paralysis, but appeared to me perfectly rational as soon as he could speak, and would commence dictating as soon as he could speak, with as much composure as he did before he was struck."

The witness was engaged two hours or more in preparing the will, and after finishing it, read it carefully and slowly to the testator, who said, "Well, that will do," or words to that amount. It was then signed by the testator, and attested by two witnesses; after which, the testator handed it to his son Edward, and told him to put it away. At sometime between the writing of the will and the codicil, Edward W. Taylor told the witness he had shown the will to Mr. Fisher, a lawyer, who thought it was not explicit enough in regard to the bonds and notes, and said that his father wished to make a codicil to explain the nature of those gifts. Witness replied, that he would write it, if the testator requested it. Afterwards, the witness having been sent for by Edward W. Taylor, went to the house of the testator for the purpose of writing the codicil. After he had been there some short time, Edward W. Taylor said, "Father, Captain Corbin is here, and if you wish to make a codicil to your will, he will write it for you." The testator replied, "let it alone till morning."—"Some time after this (says the witness), when all or nearly all the other persons who were present had retired to bed, I suppose, and when there were no persons present except the testator and myself, and perhaps Mr. Robert J. Silverthorn (one of the witnesses to the codicil), the testator said to me, 'Edward wants me to make him executor 231 alone, and to explain about the property given to him.' I replied, *'well;' and he went on to say, 'I intended to give him all the balance of my property which I had not given away before.' I said to him, 'Did you intend to give him all the negroes or not?' And he said 'yes, everything except what I had given away before.' I may have mentioned to him the bonds and notes, but do not recollect every particular word or words that were passed between us that evening."

The witness Corbin and Robert J. Silverthorn staid there that night. Next morning Edward W. Taylor came into the bed room of the witness, and said that his father then wished him to go down and write the codicil to his will. The testator was lying in bed, and witness wrote the codicil at a window not more than eight or ten feet from the bed. Testator did not redictate to witness what he said the over night, except in one general expression, which was, "Write what I told you last night." Witness wrote the codicil according to what he understood from testator the night before, except the following clause: "He also states that the loan of a plantation to his daughter Mrs. Sarah A. Parramore was intended as a consideration for her thirds in a plantation called Poplar Grove, now owned and occupied by David Taylor, which interest the said Sarah A. Parramore and Thomas H. Parramore are to convey to David Taylor, and in case of failure, to forfeit an interest in this will to that amount." In regard to this, the witness says the testator "did not dictate it to me. I think I received it from Mr. Edward W. Taylor, who was standing at his bed-side, and to whom I supposed at that time the testator had communicated it; but when I read the codicil to the testator, he objected to that clause, and said it ought not to have been put there; that he Major Taylor would send for Mr. and Mrs. Parramore, and have that matter settled. I offered readily to 232 strike out the clause from the codicil, and left the bed-side where he *was, where I had been standing reading, and walked towards the window with the intention of striking it out, but remarked that if they did convey, that clause would be of no force. He Major Taylor replied, let it alone until they come. Consequently, I did not strike it out." When witness was writing the codicil he and testator could distinctly hear each other in a common tone of voice. Does not know where Edward was during the larger portion of the time; thinks he had been out of the room a part of the time. When he spoke to witness about the clause in relation to Mrs. Parramore, he was much nearer the testator than witness was, and much nearer to testator than to witness. His position then, as witness thinks, was casual or accidental. Witness did not hear testator dictate the clause in question to Edward, and does not suppose that he dictated it at that time, at all events. Edward said to witness, "Father wants you to put in a clause to compel sister to convey her thirds in Poplar Grove." The peculiar phraseology of the codicil in this respect was that of the witness. Has no doubt that Edward was distinctly heard by the testator, who made no objection at the moment, or before the clause was written. The codicil was read over to the testator after it was written, witness thinks twice; once before the objection was made, and once afterwards. And it was then executed by the testator, and attested by two of the witnesses. Mr. and Mrs. Parramore were then sent for. They came over very soon after, and witness says, "I think three deeds were shown or handed to them by Mr. Edward Taylor. One of the deeds, I think, was written by Mr. Fisher, (I mean the counsel). I think this deed was intended to be given from Thomas T. Taylor to David C. Taylor. The other two were for the conveyance of Mrs. Parramore's thirds in the plantation called Poplar Grove.

The one, I think, was written by 233 Mr. Edward *W. Taylor, and the other, I think, looked very much like the handwriting of Thomas H. Parramore. They (Mr. Parramore and wife) did not convey, telling Thomas T. Taylor that he was too sick to attend to business. He replied with warmth, looking at Mr. Parramore rather sternly, "What do you mean?" Mr. Parramore replied that he only meant to say that he, Major Taylor, was too sick to attend to business. And I was not called on afterwards to strike out the clause." The deeds were handed to Mr. and Mrs. Parramore in testator's presence, and witness thinks, at his request; and testator said to them, "I wish you to fix this business." The testator had no convulsion when the codicil was written. One side of him, witness says, was completely paralyzed, and it was with much difficulty he could articulate his words. There were many words that he would attempt to articulate, and the persons present were compelled to pronounce them for him. He could articulate many words almost distinctly, and most of the words sufficiently to be understood by any person of common understanding.

The foregoing seem to be substantially the testimony of this important witness, so far at least as it affects the question of capacity. His examination was very much protracted, and he was made to repeat the same thing several times. I have endeavored to give his statement of the material facts, in their proper sequence. I think they fully sustain his opinion of the capacity of the testator, both at the time of making his will and his codicil. That opinion is also sustained by the evidence of the other attesting witnesses, and a great deal of other evidence in the case, which it is unnecessary to detail. No witness, I believe, expresses the opinion that the testator's mind was at any time unsound, except on the day of his death. No fact is proved from which unsoundness of mind at any prior time can be fairly inferred. The disease of 234 which he *died, while it paralyzed one-half of his body and impaired his speech, seems to have had little or no effect upon his mind. I am of opinion, therefore, that he had sufficient capacity to make the will and codicil.

Secondly. As to the alleged undue influence exercised upon him by his son Edward W. Taylor.

The only material evidence on this subject, I believe, is to be found in the testimony of the witness Corbin, before stated; and in the fact that at the time of the testator's death, and for several years before, Edward W. Taylor and his wife and child or children lived with him, and seem to have constituted his family. Mr. Corbin was a connection and near neighbor of the testator, and very intimate with him; and doubtless had as good an opportunity as any other person of knowing whether such undue influence existed or not. He says, "I know of nothing of the kind, of my own personal knowledge. I have never seen anything of the kind, and have no reason to believe there was, from any circumstance or occurrence coming under my own immediate knowledge or observation." Being asked, "Was there not a very long, strong and uninterrupted relation of affection between the testator and his only son Edward W. Taylor?" he answered, "I verily believe there was." And being further asked, "Did not that son fear and reverence that father, and did he not always obey him to the day of his death?" he answered, "I believe he did." Mrs. Young, a sister, it appears, of Mr. Parramore, and niece of the testator, had also no doubt a good opportunity of knowing whether such influence existed or not. When asked, in cross examination, "Do you know of any fact of undue or improper influence, either by fraud or force, which caused Thomas T. Taylor to make this will," she answered, "No, sir, I do not." In regard to the will, there is nothing in the record from which it can be inferred that he had any 235 *agency in causing the testator to make it or to adopt any of its provisions. The testator seemed to be anxious to make his will, and twice requested that Mr. Corbin should be sent for. It does not appear that Edward W. Taylor knew what would be the contents of the will until after it was written, but rather the contrary, as he expressed something like surprise at some of its provisions. By the will the testator lends the land to his son for life, and gives it to his heirs at his death. He remarked to the draftsman of the will that Edward was not to be trusted with a large estate; that he would lend it to him, and then give it to his children. Edward was not present when the will was written, he and the witness Bloxom having been sent out of the room by the testator. It does not appear that there was a great deal of difference between the two wills which Corbin prepared; nor which, upon the whole, was more favorable to Edward, though it seems probable the first was.

In regard to the course of Edward in showing the will to counsel, Corbin, when first requested by the testator to write his will had said, "You have a large estate; why do you not send for a lawyer, and have your will written in proper form?" To which the testator replied, "You can write one now, and if I get better, I can do so." There can be no doubt of the intention of the testator to include his negroes and the balance of his bonds and notes, after paying his debts and legacies, in the residue of his property given by his will to Edward. Corbin says, that after he had written all but the last clause of the will, the testator remarked, "Give all the residue to Edward." Corbin enquired, "Do you intend to give your son Edward all your negroes?" He replied, "Yes, they are worth nothing; give them to Edward." Corbin then wrote the last clause; and read the will slowly to the testator, who expressed his satisfaction with, and executed *it. The words of the clause would no doubt be construed according to the intention of the testator. The residue is described as "consisting of negroes, household furniture, and stock of horses, cattle, sheep, &c." The balance of the bonds and notes was probably not particularly mentioned, because it was supposed the amount would be small, after paying debts and legacies. The will was placed by the testator in the custody of Edward; and it is not improbable that it was shown by the latter to a lawyer at the former's request, in pursuance of the suggestion of Corbin and the purpose indicated to him by the testator, as before stated. But even if shown to a lawyer by Edward of his own accord, I see nothing in the fact from which fraud can be inferred, or which can be of much if any importance as a link in the chain of circumstances relied on to prove the fraud. The contents of the will were not intended by the testator to be concealed from Edward. It was handed to him open or unsealed. He knew his father's intention, but did not know that it was so clearly expressed in the will as to be free from doubt. He may, therefore, of his own accord, have shown it to a lawyer; and when advised that the residuary clause was not sufficiently explicit, he naturally desired that it should be explained by a codicil, so that there might be no room for future controversy. The codicil, then, gave him nothing that was not given, or intended to be given, him by the will. Its main object was to remove all room for doubt in regard to the meaning of the will. It nominates Edward sole executor, the will having made him coexecutor with W. Parramore. That matter was first mentioned to Corbin by the testator, who said, "Edward wants me to make him executor alone, and to explain about the property given to him." Having given Edward the largest portion of his estate, made him residuary legatee, and directed him to pay his 237 *debts, it seemed to be fit that Edward should be sole executor, and he naturally desired to be so. The circumstance in the case which most materially affects the propriety of the conduct of Edward W. Taylor in regard to the will and codicil, is his connection with the insertion in the codicil of the clause in relation to Poplar Grove. It seems there had been an agreement between the testator and Parramore and wife, that the latter would release to the former Mrs. Parramore's dower interest in Poplar Grove, containing three hundred acres, in consideration that the former would convey to the latter another tract of three hundred acres. Accordingly, the testator had conveyed the former tract to David C. Taylor, and the latter to Parramore and wife, whom he desired to release her interest in the former to him; and a deed was prepared to be executed by them, which, with the other two conveyances, were the deeds before mentioned as having been handed to them on the day of the execution of the codicil. The testator and his son were both interested and anxious to have the deed executed by Parramore and wife; who, for some cause not disclosed by the record, were unwilling, or had failed, to execute the deed. It is probable they had had some conversation on the subject of putting something in the codicil to compel Parramore and wife to make the deed. The testator must have heard his son, standing by his bed-side, say to Corbin who was drawing the codicil, "Father wants you to put in a clause to compel sister to convey her thirds in Poplar Grove," and by his silence he assented to what was said. It is true that when the codicil was read to him he objected to that clause, and said it ought not to have been put there, and that he would send for Mr. and Mrs. Parramore, and have that matter settled. The ground of his objection does not appear. It may have been the phraseology of the 238 clause, which was that of the *draftsman. He determined, however, after the effect of it had been explained by Corbin, to let it remain as part of his codicil.

The tract of land loaned to Mrs. Parramore for life by the will, seems to be the same land conveyed to her and her husband for life in consideration of her interest in Poplar Grove. In both the will and deed the land is described as occupied by Thomas Only. When the testator made his will he told Corbin that he loaned this land to Mrs. Parramore, in consideration of her thirds in Poplar Grove. When Corbin wrote the clause in the codicil, he wrote nothing more than what the testator had previously informed him was his actual intention, and what he had, under all the circumstances, every reason to believe the testator then wished to be embodied in his codicil. The testator would have preferred having the matter in regard to the release settled in his life time; but failing in that, seems to have been willing to settle it by his will. I cannot, therefore, see in this circumstance, taken by itself, or in connection with all the other circumstances, sufficient ground for condemning the will and codicil, or either, as having been obtained by fraud or undue influence. The testator certainly made by his will a very unequal distribution of his property between his two children, and the record does not disclose any better reason for his having done so than that it was his will; which is an all-sufficient reason with courts of justice, however they may admire the rule of equality. The violation of that rule, without apparent good cause, may put them on the alert, and cause them to scrutinize the testamentary act with greater care. But being satisfied that it is the act of a competent testator, free from the undue influence of another, they are bound to give it full effect. Judge Carr has made some appropriate observations on this subject in Boyd v.

Cook's ex'or, &c., 3 Leigh, 32, 50, 51, 239 *which I will not repeat. It is not uncommon for fathers to prefer their sons to their daughters; especially when they come to make their wills. The testator manifested such a preference otherwise than in making his will. He seems to have supposed too, that in giving property to his daughter he was giving it to her husband. Another circumstance which may have operated upon him was that he had been the guardian of her husband, who had sued him for a settlement of his guardianship account; though this circumstance does not appear to have produced any ill feeling between them; or if it did, the wound appears to have been healed before his death. But it is needless further to enquire about his motive for the preference. The nature of the disease under which the testator labored at the time of the testamentary act is another circumstance which requires of the court of probat the greatest possible care in determining whether or not the act was the offspring of a sound mind, free from undue influence of others. I have endeavored to give due weight to all these circumstances in coming to my conclusions on the subject; and I am of opinion, not only that the testator's mind was sound when the act was done, as I have already said, but that it does not appear that any undue influence was exercised upon him by his son to induce him to execute the act, or any part of it. "The influence to vitiate an act (says a writer of high reputation), must amount to force and coercion destroying free agency; it must not be the influence of affection and attachment; it must not be the mere desire of gratifying the wishes of another; for that would be a very strong ground in support of a testamentary act; further there must be proof that the act was obtained by this coercion; by importunity which could not be resisted; that it was done merely for the sake of peace; so that the motive was tantamount to force and fear." 1 Williams on Ex'ors, p. 39;

1 Jarm. on Wills, p. 29, note 1.

240 *The opinion I have expressed on the two questions I have been considering is greatly strengthened by the fact that it accords with that of the Circuit court; except so far as relates to a portion of the codicil to which I will again advert. The weight to which the opinion of the court which saw and heard the witnesses is entitled in such cases, is shown by the cases of Dudleys v. Dudleys, 3 Leigh 436; Jesse v. Parker, 6 Gratt. 57; Nock v. Nock's ex'ors, 10 Gratt. 106, 111.

Thirdly. As to the ground of defective execution.

And 1st, as to the will. Corbin was sent for in the night, and requested by the testator to write his will. It was probably written between eleven or twelve, and one or two o'clock that night; the draftsman being engaged about two hours in writing it. The table and writing materials were brought by the direction of the testator, who then requested his son and Bloxom (one of the attesting witnesses) to step out of the room a little while. They accordingly went out, and the door was shut. The will was then written by Corbin, read to and approved by the testator, who signed it in Corbin's presence, and requested him to witness it; which he accordingly did, by subscribing it in the presence of the testator. Corbin says, "After witnessing the will myself, he (the testator) said, 'call in Mr. Bloxom and get him to witness it too,' or words to this amount. I left the will on the table, and opened the door of the room with the intention of going after Mr. Bloxom myself; but I think I saw some of the family in the passage, and requested them to call Mr. Bloxom in. Immediately afterwards Mr. Bloxom came into the room, and the testator said to Mr. Bloxom, as I now think, either 'here, or there is my will,' I want you to witness it; and he, Mr. Bloxom, did witness it in my presence. Mr. Bloxom soon after this, either ordered, or requested Mr. Taylor to order his horse and carriage, and he and his wife left for home. Major Taylor then handed the 241 will to his son Edward W. *Taylor, and directed him to put it away. I had before this folded up the will and handed it to the testator. Mr. Edward Taylor took the will, and as I now think, put it in the drawer of the bureau or chest of drawers in the room in which the testator was then lying. Next day morning Mr. Littleton Walker came over to Thomas T. Taylor's house, and I think that he and Edward Taylor and myself went from the porch to the room of the testator together. Mr. Edward Taylor got out the will; Major Taylor acknowledged it, and requested Mr. Walker to witness it. Mr. Walker turned to me and said he could not write his name, and requested me to write it for him. This I did, and he made his mark. This occurred about 7 o'clock in the morning. The testimony of Bloxom and Walker substantially agrees with that of Corbin in regard to their respective attestations. The will was subscribed by each of them in the presence of the testator. Corbin was present when the will was acknowledged to, and subscribed by Bloxom and Walker respectively, but neither of them was present when it was subscribed by Corbin, who did not subscribe it after either of the subsequent acknowledgments. Thus the will was twice acknowledged before two witnesses present at the same time, and these witnesses subscribed it in the presence of the testator. But one of the two witnesses subscribed prior in time to either of the two acknowledgments, and did not actually subscribe it in the presence of the other. On these two grounds it is contended that the execution is defective, and that under the new statute of wills, Code, p. 516, § 4, which governs this case, the will must be subscribed by at least two competent witnesses after it has been signed or subscribed in their joint presence; and must be subscribed by them not only in the presence of the testator but in the presence of each other.

The words of the section are, "No will shall be *valid unless it be in writing and signed by the testator, or by some other person in his presence and by his direction, in such manner as to make it manifest that the same is intended as a signature; and moreover, unless it be wholly written by the testator, the signature shall be made or the will acknowledged by him in the presence of at least two competent witnesses present at the same time; and such witnesses shall subscribe the will in the presence of the testator, but no form of attestation shall be necessary."

It is contended by the counsel for the appellant that this part of the statute is almost a literal transcript of the statute, 1 Vict. ch. 1, § 9, which, before the enactment of our new Code, had been construed by the English courts according to the view maintained by him on each of the two grounds above mentioned; and that our statute ought to receive the same construction.

It is certainly true, as a general rule, that when an English statute, especially one of long standing, is adopted in this state, the settled judicial construction which it had received in that country at the time of its adoption in this, is also adopted along with it.

But that rule hardly applies to the revision of 1849, in which our whole code of laws, civil and criminal, was revised and re-enacted. The rule which would seem to be more applicable to that revision is that the old law was not intended to be altered, unless such intention plainly appears in the new Code. The legislative mind was fixed on the then existing law as the text, to be altered only as occasion might seem to require. Great alteration was made in words and phraseology, while comparatively little was made in substance. The codes and statutes of other states were consulted and made contributory to some extent; but not with any intention of losing sight of our own, and adopting altogether the system of another state or *country on any branch of the law.

Spencer, J., in delivering the opinion of the Court of errors of New York in Taylor v. Delancey, 2 Caine's Cases 143, thus speaks of the rule which is applicable to such a case as this: "Where the law antecedently to the revision was settled, either by clear expressions in the statutes, or adjudications on them, the mere change of phraseology shall not be deemed or construed a change of the law, unless such phraseology evidently purports an intention in the legislature to work a change. A contrary construction might be productive of the most dangerous consequences." The same principle has been recognized in other cases. Yates' Case, 4 John. R. 317, 359; Matter of Brown, 21 Wend. R. 316; Theriat v. Hart, 2 Hill's N. Y. R. 380.

The 4th section of our present law of wills seems to differ, in substance, only in one or two respects from our former law, according to its settled construction. The first and perhaps most important difference is that the present law requires all wills to be in writing, with an exception made by the 6th section. The next, and perhaps only other, difference arises from the introduction of the words "present at the same time" after the word "witnesses" in the new law. It had been well settled under the old law, that a will might be acknowledged before the witnesses at different times. In Dudleys v. Dudleys, 3 Leigh 436, the will was attested by one witness in 1818, and by the other in 1825. The evil arising from this construction was, that the testator might be capable of making a will at the time of one of the attestations, and incapable at the time of the other, and only one attesting witness could prove the important fact of mental capacity at either time. Wills are frequently, if not generally, executed by persons in extremis, whose powers of mind as well as of body are gradually sinking. They are often capable one day, and incapable *the next, of making a will. The words in question were introduced to remedy this obvious evil. There seems to have been considerable opposition in the legislature even to this change. The words "present at the same time," in the report of the revisors, were stricken out by a committee of the whole house of delegates; but were restored by the house itself. The provision in the new law that the will should be signed "in such manner as to make it manifest that the name is intended for a signature," was no change of the old law; but merely an express adoption of the judicial construction it had received in Waller v. Waller, 1 Gratt. 454. The words in the new law authorizing the will to be acknowledged by the testator in the presence of the witnesses, were not in the old law, but they only embodied the long settled construction of that law. The words "but no form of attestation shall be necessary," in the new law, effected no change; no form of attestation being necessary under the old law. Pollock & wife v. Glassell, 2 Gratt. 439.

On the other hand, there are some material differences between the 4th section of our new law and the 9th section of 1 Vict. ch. 26. 1st. The latter requires the will to be "signed at the foot or end thereof;" the former requires it to be signed "in such manner as to make it manifest that the name is intended as a signature." 2dly. The latter requires that "such signature shall be made or acknowledged by the testator," in the presence of the witnesses; the former requires that "the signature shall be made or the will acknowledged by him," in the presence of the witnesses. 3dly. The latter does not even require the witnesses to be "credible," as the statute of Charles did, but on the contrary, the 14th section enacts "that if any person, who shall attest the execution of a will, shall, at the time of the execution thereof, or at any time afterwards, be incompetent to be admitted a witness to *prove the execution thereof, such will shall not on that account be invalid." The former requires the witnesses to be "competent;" thus working no change in the old law, but merely substituting in the new law a more appropriate word, "competent," for the word "credible," in the old law, which had been judicially construed to mean "competent." 4thly. The words "shall attest" in the latter (which were perhaps merely superfluous) are not in the former. 5thly. The former does not require a will, "wholly written by the testator," to be authenticated by attesting and subscribing witnesses; the latter makes no such exception.

Thus it will be seen that there is a closer correspondence, in substance at least, between our old and new law, than between the latter and the statute of Victoria. And I can see no good reason for giving to the decisions of the English courts upon their statute any greater weight in the construction of ours, than they are intrinsically entitled to. If they appear to be founded on good reasons, and are not in conflict with our own decisions, they ought to be followed by us; otherwise not.

I will now proceed to consider the two grounds on which it is contended that the execution of the will and codicil in this case was defective: And

1. That the subscription of each of the two attesting witnesses must be made after the signature or acknowledgment by the testator in the simultaneous presence of both; whereas in this case the subscription of one of them was made before.

In support of this ground the counsel for the appellant relied on three decisions of Sir Herbert Jenner Fust, viz: Allen's Case, 7 Eng. Ecc. R. 131; Simmond's Case, Id. 374; and Moore v. King, Id. 429. The first two were ex parte motions. In each of the three cases the will was subscribed by the two witnesses on different days; but the first witness was present *at the acknowledgment before, and subscription by, the second; though he did not then resubscribe the will. In the last case there was this additional feature, that the first witness pointed out her signature to the second when the latter was about to subscribe the will. In each of the cases the decision was against the will. Whether that would have been the decision if, as in this case, the transaction had occurred at one and the same time, but one of the witnesses had signed an instant before the acknowledgment by the testator in the simultaneous presence of both, is perhaps not certain: though I think it may fairly be inferred that it would, from what was said by the judge in those cases, and in Olding's Case, Id. 341, and Cooper v. Bocket, Id. 537; in which two latter cases he decided that a will must be signed by a testator before it is subscribed by witnesses, whether the two acts occur at the same or different times. The opinion of this learned judge seems therefore to be in favor of the appellant on the question under consideration.

I must say, however, that I do not consider that opinion reasonable, and if it were unopposed by any countervailing decision, I would not be willing to follow it. But there are three decisions of this court which I think are in conflict with that opinion, and against the appellant on this question. It is true they were decisions under our old law; but I do not think there is any material difference between the old and new law in this respect. These decisions are Pollock & wife v. Glassell, 2 Gratt. 439; Rosser v. Franklin, 6 Id. 1; and Sturdivant v. Birchett, 10 Id. 67.

In Pollock & wife v. Glassell, the name of the first witness was signed diverso intuitu, and whether in the presence of the testatrix or not, does not appear; though it was certainly not signed at her request, and was signed before the name of the testatrix was signed. The authority of that case cannot be weakened *by saying that the question was not discussed by the counsel nor considered by the court. It cannot be supposed that the able counsel who argued, and learned judges who decided that case, would have overlooked so important a question, or passed it by without notice, if they had entertained a doubt about it. Nor can the authority of the case be weakened by saying that the codicil was executed under a power of appointment; for the whole settlement creating the power superadded a requisition not made by the statute of wills; it did not dispense with any of the statutory requisitions; and it was not pretended that a compliance with any of them was unnecessary. The question considered by the court was, whether the codicil was well executed according to the statute of wills, and had also the superadded requisition? The court, consisting of four judges, decided the question unanimously in the affirmative.

In Rosser v. Franklin, the testatrix made her mark after the subscription of the witnesses. It was argued by the learned counsel against the will, that the witnesses must attest a perfect, not an imperfect instrument; a will signed by the party, and not a paper without a signature. And he cited Olding's Case, 7 Eng. Ecc. R. 341, and Byrd's Case, Id. 391, in which the precise question arose, and was adjudicated in that way, although both the attestation and signing occurred at the same interview, and the one immediately preceded the other. It was held by the court, however, in disregard of these decisions of the Ecclesiastical court, that "the fact whether in the order of time the testatrix made her mark before or after the subscription of the witnesses, is, under the circumstances, in nowise material, in so much as the whole transaction must be regarded as one continuous, uninterrupted act, conducted and completed, within a few minutes, while all concerned in it continued present, 248 *and during the unbroken, supervising, attesting attention of the subscribing witnesses."

In Sturdivant v. Birchett, the will was subscribed by all the witnesses out of the presence of the testator; but they immediately returned to his presence with the will. Their subscription was invalid until their return; and was made effectual by what then occurred, though they did not resubscribe the will.

These decisions of our own court are strongly sustained by cases decided elsewhere. The case of Swift v. Wiley, 1 B. Monr. R. 114, goes farther than any of our own cases in favor of the validity of a subscription by witnesses before the signing or acknowledgment by the testator. In that case two of the witnesses subscribed the will some hours before it was signed by the testator; but having remained with him until it was signed by him in the presence of themselves and another, and having then again acknowledged their respective signatures as subscribing witnesses, their subscription was held to be valid. To resubscribe their names, said the court, "would have been a superfluous and puerile act of mechanical repetition, not necessary for identification; because they had once subscribed the same paper in the presence and at the request of the testator, and which fact was recognized by him as well as by themselves, after his own name had been subscribed, and when the document thus recognized and identified, was finally and conclusively published as his will; nor can we perceive any other end of either utility or security that could have been promoted by again subscribing names already sufficiently subscribed." For the other cases on the subject, I refer to the opinion of Judge Lee in Sturdivant v. Birchett, in which they are fully collected and commented on.

The case under consideration is stronger in favor of the will than either of the 249 four last cited. In this *case these important circumstances concur, some one or more of which did not exist in either of those cases, viz: both of the witnesses subscribed their names as such to the will in the presence and at the request of the testator, after it had been perfected by his signature, and he then acknowledged it in their joint presence: The whole transaction having been begun, continued and ended at one time and without interruption. And I think there existed in neither of those cases a single essential circumstance which did not exist in this. For though there was no verbal recognition by Corbin of his signature after the acknowledgment by the testator in the joint presence of the two witnesses, there was an actual recognition of it by him, at least as effectual as words could make it.

I conclude, therefore, that both reason and authority are against the appellant on the first ground on which he rests his objection to the execution of the will; and I will now consider the other ground, which is 2dly. That the witnesses must subscribe the will in the presence of each other.

The old law certainly did not require the witnesses to subscribe in the presence of each other. As the acknowledgment might be made before them separately and at different times, it followed necessarily that they might subscribe separately and at different times. Nor does the new law expressly require them to subscribe in the presence of each other. But it is contended that this is implied by certain phraseology used in the new law, and not to be found in the old. That phraseology is, that the acknowledgment by the testator must be "in the presence of at least two competent witnesses, present at the same time; and such witnesses shall subscribe the will in the presence of the testator." The statute of Victoria uses nearly the same words; the only difference being that the word "competent" in our law is not in that 250 statute *and the words "shall attest and," which in that statute precede the words "shall subscribe," are omitted in our law; but that difference is merely verbal in regard to the question under consideration. It is admitted that the two laws in this respect are substantially identical; and it would seem they ought to receive the same construction. There has yet been no judicial construction of our law. But a case has been recently decided by the judicial committee of the queen's privy council in England which was much relied on by the counsel for the appellant, and is supposed to have conclusively settled that the statute of Victoria requires the witnesses to subscribe in the presence of each other. That case is Casement v. Fulton, decided in 1845, and reported in 5 Moore's Privy Council Cases, p. 130. It was an appeal from the Supreme court of judicature at Calcutta; and arose on the 7th section of the India will act, which is a copy of the 9th section of the statute, 1 Vict. ch. 26, except that, like our law, it omits the words "shall attest."

The case was this: A testator signed his will in the presence of a witness who subscribed it in his presence; about two hours afterwards, upon the arrival of another witness, the testator in the joint presence of the former witness and the other subscribing witness, acknowledged his signature at the foot of the will. The second witness then subscribed the will, and the first witness, in his and the testator's presence, acknowledged his subscription, but did not resubscribe. It was held by the judicial committee, (affirming the sentence of the Supreme court at Calcutta,) that the requirements of the act had not been sufficiently complied with; it being necessary that both witnesses should be jointly present at the same act of the testator, and jointly subscribe it in his presence. Lord Brougham in delivering the opinion of the committee, said, "We think the words 251 admit of no other construction, *for it is, 'and such witnesses shall subscribe.' Now this forms one sentence with the preceding words, 'present at the same time,' and 'such' must plainly be read, 'such present witnesses, or such witnesses so being present at the same time.' 'Such' describes not merely the names of the witnesses, but all that is previously enacted respecting them. One quality of these witnesses is, their being present at the same time. Therefore, we cannot limit the meaning of the large word of reference, 'such,' to the mere names or persons of the witnesses; it must embrace what had just been said of their presence; it must mean the witnesses, &c. present at the same time."

It will be observed that in Casement v. Fulton the will was signed by the testator and subscribed by one of the witnesses at one time, and the acknowledgment by the testator, in the joint presence of both witnesses, was at a different and subsequent time. And it had been decided by the English Ecclesiastical court in the cases before cited, that such an attestation was not sufficient; even though the first witness acknowledged his signature at the time of the acknowledgment by the testator in the joint presence of both witnesses. If these cases were regarded as authority, there seems to have been no necessity for deciding, if it was decided, in Casement v. Fulton, that the witnesses must subscribe in the presence of each other; for the attestation was otherwise insufficient. It will also be observed that there is a very important difference between that case and the one under consideration, in this, that in the latter the whole transaction occurred at one and the same time; there being no breach of continuity, and little if any greater interval between the different parts of the transaction than the necessary order of sequence required. The decision of the committee might possibly have been different, if the facts before it had been like 252 the facts of this case, *with the single exception that both of the witnesses had signed after the testator: a fact decided to be material by the English courts, but immaterial by ours. But whatever would have been its decision in such a case, and whatever may have been its actual decision in the case before it, there can be no doubt, from the language used by Lord Brougham, that in the opinion of the committee the statute requires the witnesses to subscribe their names in the presence of each other. The opinion is certainly entitled to great respect: And if it had been before the legislature when the present law of wills was enacted, it might have had a very important influence in the construction of our law.

But that opinion was not before the legislature; and it is almost certain that not a member of that body had then any knowledge or information of any such opinion, or that any such case had been decided. The case had not, I believe, been reported in any form in this country. There has yet, I believe, been no American edition of Moore's Privy Council Cases; and the London edition of that work has, during the present year, for the first time, been added to our state library. The 5th volume of the work, which contains that case, embraces the decisions of the committee during the years 1845-47, and could not have been long published even in England when the new law of wills was enacted in this state. The last volume of Reports of English Probat Cases, which had then been published in this country, was 7 Eng. Ecc. Rep. containing 2 and 3 Curteiss. While that volume, as we have seen, contains several cases bearing upon the first ground of objection to the will in this case, it contains none which can have any material effect upon the second ground of objection now under consideration. Nor is there any such case in any prior volume of English Probat Cases. Indeed I believe 1

253 Curteiss commences *about the time that the statute of Victoria went into operation. On the contrary, it is manifest from the decisions of Sir Herbert Jenner Fust, in some of the cases before cited, that in his opinion the statute does not require the witnesses to subscribe in the presence of each other; though he is of opinion that it requires both of them to subscribe the will immediately after it is signed by the testator, or his signature acknowledged in their joint presence. In Cooper v. Bockett, 7 Eng. Ecc. R. 542, he expressly says, "By the 9th section of the act of parliament, it is absolutely necessary that the deceased shall have signed the will, or have acknowledged his signature, in the presence of two witnesses present at the same time, and that they should have attested it in the presence of the testator, though not of each other." While Casement v. Fulton was unknown to the legislature when the present law of wills was enacted, Cooper v. Bockett was reported in a volume which had some years previously been published in this country, and was then in the state library. If the construction given in either case can be considered as having been tacitly adopted by the legislature in the enactment of our law, it is that given in the latter, rather than that given in the former case. The opinion given in the former is, therefore, entitled to no other consideration in this case than that which is always due to the opinion of learned jurists, and that which may be due to the reasons on which it is founded.

Giving to the opinion expressed in Casement v. Fulton all the consideration to which it is entitled, I must say that I cannot see the force of the reasons on which it is founded. It seems, almost entirely, to rest on the import of what is called "the large word of reference, such;" which, it is supposed, "describes not merely the names of the witnesses, but all that is previously enacted respecting them." It "must 254 plainly be read; *(says Lord Brougham,) such present witnesses, or such witnesses so being present at the same time." Admitting this to be the true import of the word "such," I think it by no means follows that, according to the grammatical construction of the sentence, the witnesses are required to subscribe in the presence of each other. "Such witnesses so being present at the same time" when the signature is made or acknowledged, surely need not of necessity subscribe in the presence of each other.

But whatever may be said of that case, I think the legislature of Virginia, in the enactment of our new law, did not intend to require the witnesses to subscribe the will in the presence of each other. It was a very important change in the law to require them to be together when the will is signed or acknowledged. Good reasons existed for that change; and yet, as I have before remarked, it was strongly opposed in the legislature. Surely no greater change was intended than the words express. If the supposed change had been intended, it would have been made plainly, and not by mere implication, or the use of a word of equivocal import. The obvious mode of making it would have been, by the insertion of the words "and each other;" so as to make the sentence read "and such witnesses shall subscribe the will in the presence of the testator and each other." The express requisition that they shall subscribe "in the presence of the testator," seems to exclude any implication that they shall subscribe "in the presence of each other." There would have been as much reason for expression in the one case as the other, if both had been intended. The word "such" would have had as much efficacy in requiring the act to be done by the witnesses in the presence of the testator, as in requiring it to be done in the presence of each other. The law of wills should be 255 plainly written, and no room should be left *for doubt or implication. It is a law of almost universal application, and must often be acted on by unlearned persons, in a situation which precludes the possibility of obtaining professional aid. The most important family settlements, which are often postponed to the last day or hour of life, may depend upon an observance of its requisitions. How important then that it should impose no needless requisition; none that is not productive of some substantial good; and that it should plainly express what it means. A requisition that the witnesses shall subscribe in the presence of each other, would be a fruitful source of litigation, would defeat many fair wills, and would, I think be productive of no corresponding good. It would very much clog the exercise of the testamentary power, without throwing around it, so far as I can perceive, a single additional safeguard. It would render it necessary to enquire in every case, whether the witnesses, when they subscribed the will, were not only in the presence of the testator or in the range of his vision, but also in the presence of each other or in the range of each other's vision. It would be questionable whether range of the vision would be sufficient in regard to the witnesses inter se, and whether actual sight would not be necessary. For though a testator may dispense with actual sight of the witnesses if they are in the range of his vision, it being his own matter, it would for that very reason, be doubtful whether the witnesses could dispense with actual sight of each other. Nothing is more common or natural than for a scrivener to subscribe a will as a witness before his fellow witness is called in to join him in the attestation; or, for a witness called on to attest a will, after doing so, to turn his back and walk off without noticing what is done by others afterwards. No case could present a more striking illustration of the application of these remarks and 256 the ill effects of *such a requisition than the case under consideration. The two attesting witnesses, Corbin and Bloxom, being in the room with the testator, the latter requests Bloxom to step out awhile. The testator and Corbin being then alone in the room, the door is closed, and the will is written by Corbin, signed by the testator, and subscribed by Corbin in the presence of the testator, and at his request. The testator then requests Corbin to call in the other witness, that he may subscribe it also. Bloxom is accordingly called in from another room; comes immediately in, and the three being then alone in the testator's room, and the will lying on the table with the names of the testator and Corbin thereto just subscribed; the testator acknowledges the will, and at his request Bloxom subscribes it in the presence of the testator and Corbin, and the will is then handed by Corbin to the testator. If this will were defeated because the witnesses were not in the presence of each other when Corbin subscribed it, then indeed might it be said that substance would be sacrificed to form, and the end of the law to the means used for attaining it. But I think form as well as substance, the means as well as the end, sustain the validity of this will, and that its execution is not defective on the second, any more than on the first ground relied on by the appellant.

2dly. As to the codicil.

The facts in regard to the execution of the codicil are very much like those in regard to the execution of the will. Many of them have been already stated, and need not be repeated. Corbin and Robert J. Silverthorn, two of the subscribing witnesses, spent a night together at the testator's. Early next morning the codicil was written by Corbin, who signed the testator's name thereto in his presence, and at his request; the testator made his mark in the presence of Corbin, who, in his presence and at his request, subscribed it 257 *as a witness. R. J. Silverthorn, who had not come down stairs, was then called in by Corbin to witness the codicil also, and accordingly came in; when Corbin took up the will and carried it to the testator, who according to Corbin's testimony, said, "I acknowledge this, and want you to witness it;" or, according to R. J.

Silverthorn's testimony, Corbin asked the testator if he acknowledged it, and the testator said he did. R. J. Silverthorn then subscribed it in the presence of the testator and of Corbin.

The grounds of objection to the execution of the codicil are the same as those taken to the execution of the will; and the facts in regard to each being substantially the same, I am of opinion that the codicil was well executed, for reasons which have been already given. I think it makes no difference whether the instrument was called a codicil or not by the testator at the time of its acknowledgment, and that the principle, declared in the cases of The British Museum v. White and Rosser v. Franklin, is at least as applicable to the new law as to the old. It is necessary that the testator should understand the contents and nature of the instrument when he executes or acknowledges it; but not that he should call it by any particular name, or even by any name at all. The old law, by judicial construction, accepted acknowledgment, in lieu of signature, by the testator in presence of the witnesses, and did not require the instrument to be named in the acknowledgment. The new law adopts that construction, by expressly authorizing such acknowledgment, which may be made in any form in which it might have been made under the old law. No formula of acknowledgment is prescribed by law.

I am therefor of opinion that there is no error in the sentence of the Circuit court to the prejudice of the appellant. This opinion, however, is intended to 258 *be referred and confined to the peculiar facts of this case; and especially the important fact that the whole transaction in regard to the execution and attestation of the will occurred at one and the same interview, and without any breach of continuity. The same observations apply to the codicil. I do not mean to say that either would have been well executed and attested if there had been a substantial interval of time between the acknowledgment by the testator in the joint presence of the two witnesses, and the subscription by the witnesses or either of them. As was said by my brother Lee in Sturdivant v. Birchett, "It will be quite time enough to decide that question when a case requiring it to be decided shall come before us for adjudication."

My opinion is intended to have no reference to the attestation of the will by Walker, or the codicil by William T. Silverthorn; but to be confined to the attestation by the other two witnesses to each.

But I think there is an error in the sentence to the prejudice of the appellee, in refusing to admit to probat that clause of the codicil which relates to Poplar Grove. Though the testator at first objected to that clause, and said it ought not to have been put there, and that he would send for Mr. and Mrs. Parramore and have that matter settled; yet it does not appear that any fraud was used in having the clause inserted;

and when the effect of it was explained to him by Corbin, the testator refused to let it be stricken out; and executed and acknowledged the codicil containing the clause as part thereof. The execution was not conditional but absolute; and the codicil was not afterwards revoked in whole or in part.

The result is that I am for affirming so much of the sentence as admits the will and part of the codicil to probat; for reversing 259 *so much as refuses to admit the residue of the codicil to probat; and for admitting such residue to probat also; with costs to the appellee as the party substantially prevailing.

LEE and SAMUELS, Js., concurred in the opinion of Moncure, J.

ALLEN and DANIEL, Js., dissented.

Sentence reversed in favor of the appellee.

April Term, 1854. Richmond.

1. Foreign Bills of Exchange—Protest—Sufficiency of Case at Bar.—The notarial protest of a foreign bill of exchange states that the notary took the bill to the counting-house of the drawee, and there exhibited it to a clerk of the drawee, and demanded acceptance thereof; and that the said clerk replied that the same could not be accepted. Held. That the protest is sufficient to bind the endorser.
2. Same—Acceptance—Parol Evidence.—Parol evidence that the clerk was authorized to refuse acceptance of the bill, is admissible in an action by the holder against the endorser.
3. Same—Same—Same.—As the protest is sufficient itself to bind the endorser, if parol evidence was not admissible to prove the authority of the clerk to refuse acceptance of the bill, yet its admission could not injure the defendant; and therefore, it is no ground for reversing the judgment.
4. Foreign Bills of Exchange—Notice of Dishonor—Sufficiency of—Case at Bar.—A bill drawn in Petersburg, Virginia, on a house in London, was protested for nonacceptance on the 5th of April 1843. The next Cunard steamer sailed from Liverpool for the United States on the 19th of that month, and notice of the dishonor of the bill was sent by that steamer. At that time these steamers carried the mail between the two countries under a contract with the British government; and it was the usual mode of transmitting letters. There were, however, regular lines of sailing packets between London and Liverpool and the United States, for which letter bags were made up at the London post office, and such packets sailed from London or Liverpool on the 7th, 10th and 17th of April 1843. But it was probable that the steamer of the 19th would arrive before any of them. Held: The notice was sufficient.

This was an action of assumpsit in the Circuit court of Petersburg, brought by the Bank of Virginia against Littleberry E. Stainback, upon a bill of exchange for one thousand pounds sterling, drawn by F. C.

Stainback of Petersburg upon T. W. Clagett of the city of London, endorsed by the defendant, and protested for nonacceptance. Upon the trial the plaintiff introduced the bill of exchange, which bore date the 20th of February 1843, and was made payable sixty days after sight; and then offered in evidence the protest, which stated that on this day, the 5th of April 1843, at the request of Call, Martin & Co. of London, bankers, bearers of the bill of exchange whereof a true copy is on the other side written, I, John Harrison of the city of London, a notary public, &c., went to the counting-house of T. W. Clagett, Esquire, within this city, upon whom the said bill is drawn, and speaking to the clerk, exhibited unto him the said bill, and demanded acceptance thereof, whereunto he answered that the same could not be accepted. Therefore I, the said notary, at the request aforesaid, have protested, &c.

The plaintiffs also offered evidence in respect to the presentment and dishonor of the bill, and the usage of London as to the mode of presenting bills for acceptance. The defendant objected to this evidence, and also to the protest, but consented that it should be heard, it being agreed by the court and the counsel for the plaintiffs, that all objections to the evidence might be made after it was heard, as if made before.

The plaintiffs then offered evidence to prove that it is, and was in April 1843, the usage of merchants and bankers in London to leave a bill for acceptance on one day, and to call for it on the next, leaving it with the drawee in the meantime; that if the bill be returned without acceptance, the holder puts it into the hands of a notary, who again presents it at the place of business of the drawee for acceptance, and, in case of refusal to accept by the drawee, or by a clerk, or other person employed therein, makes out the protest; and that a refusal by a clerk to accept under such circumstances, is, by the custom of London, a sufficient dishonor to charge the previous parties; and that the usage had been observed in this case.

The plaintiffs further offered evidence to prove, that in April 1843 the steamers of the Cunard line sailed from Liverpool for Boston twice, the days of sailing being the 4th and 19th days of the month; that the steamers of that line then carried the mails between Great Britain and the United States, under a contract made in 1841 with the British government; that it had been the usage of the London post office, since that contract, to forward all letters addressed to the United States, by that line, unless specially directed to be forwarded by other vessels, notwithstanding that in the interval between the delivery of any letter into the office and the sailing of a steamer of that line, one or more other vessels, steam or sailing, might leave Great Britain for the United States; and that merchants generally, if not invariably, receive their letters from Great Britain by that line, and did so in April 1843; that it was the usage of merchants, bankers, &c., of the city of London, in April 1843, to forward notices of protest to parties in the United States by the steamers of that line, and that such notices are, by the usage of London, considered sufficient, if dispatched by the first mail made up in London after the dishonor of the bill, for conveyance to the United States by that line.

The defendant offered evidence to prove, that in April 1843, there were five regular lines of sailing packets between New York and Liverpool, the regular days of sailing each way being the 1st, 7th, 13th, 19th and 25th days of each month; that at the same time there were two regular lines of sailing packets between New York and London, which sailed from London on the 7th, 17th and 27th days of each month; and from Portsmouth, on the 1st, 10th and 20th days of each month; that it was the usage of all these packets at that time to carry letter bags which were made up at the post office, and that such is still the usage; and that it was, in April 1843, and still is, the usage of the London post office to issue, daily, a sheet called the "Packet List," announcing the days of sailing of packets from London and Liverpool for the United States and other foreign countries.

The defendant also offered evidence to prove that it was, in April 1843, the usage of merchants and bankers in London and in New York to forward notices of dishonor across the Atlantic by the first regular packet after the dishonor, whether using sails or steam, or both; that the usage of London was, and had long been, to deposit in the post office, the next day after the dishonor of a bill, a notice addressed to the party in the United States, to be forwarded by the next mail, and that the usage in London did not require or authorize the notice to be withheld for Cunard's line if a packet of any other regular line sailed in the interval.

The evidence on both sides being closed, the defendant objected to the protest as evidence in the cause, on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient, if true, to make out the dishonor of the bill for nonacceptance, and moved the court to exclude the same from the jury; or, if, the court should admit the protest as evidence, to instruct the jury that it is not competent for the plaintiffs to add to or explain the protest, or to prove the facts of presentment, demand and refusal, or either of them, or the circumstances of either, by parol or other extrinsic evidence.

Whereupon the court permitted the said protest to go in evidence to the jury, and refused to give the instruction asked for; but instructed the jury that the said protest is sufficient, provided the jury believe from the evidence in the cause, that the clerk to whom the said bill was presented by the notary for acceptance, was authorized by the drawee T. W. Clagett to refuse acceptance thereof.

And then the defendant, by counsel,

264 moved the *court further to instruct the jury as follows: "If you believe that the bill on which this suit is founded was protested for nonacceptance on the 5th day of April 1843, that the letter from the holder, containing notice to the plaintiffs of the nonacceptance, was written on the 17th of April, and forwarded by the Cunard steamer of the 19th from Liverpool to Boston, that being the first steamer of that or any line that left England for the United States after the date of the protest; that during the interval between the 5th and 17th days of April, one or more regular sailing packets left London for New York, by which the holders of the bill might have forwarded the notice; and that during the same interval one or more regular sailing packets left Liverpool for New York, the regular days of sailing of which were known in London, by which the holders of the bill might have forwarded the notice; that mails or letter bags were regularly made up at the London post office for the regular sailing packets from that city, and also for those from Liverpool to New York; then the notice of dishonor was not despatched in due time, and you should find for the defendant. And that this is so, although you find that the Cunard line of steamers carried the mail between the United States and Great Britain, under a contract with the British government; that commercial letters from merchants in Great Britain to their correspondents in the United States, were usually forwarded by that line, and that the steamer of the 19th of April might have been reasonably expected to arrive as soon as any of the sailing packets referred to, or sooner." But the court refused to give said instruction, and instructed the jury that the "notice of the dishonor of the said bill given to the defendant was sufficient, if the jury believe from the evidence that the Cunard line of steamers was the regularly established mail line between

Great Britain and the United States, 265 *and was the regular, ordinary mode of communication generally used and adopted by merchants, bill brokers and other men of business in Great Britain, as the channel of communication from that country to this; and that such notice was transmitted by the first steamer of that line which left Great Britain after the protest of said bill.

To these several opinions of the court the defendant excepted.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs, and assessed the damages at five thousand one hundred and eighty-five dollars and five cents, with legal interest on four thousand seven hundred and eleven dollars and eleven cents from the 24th of February 1843, that being the day when the bill was discounted by the bank, until paid; and the court rendered a judgment according to the verdict. Whereupon the defendant applied to this court for a supersedeas, which was awarded.

Joynes and Patton, for the appellant.
D. May and Stanard, for the appellees.

SAMUELS, J. Two questions are presented by the record before us:

1st. Whether the protest made by the notary is sufficient in itself, or when aided by the parol proof offered, to charge the plaintiff in error as endorser.

2d. Whether the notice of dishonor was duly forwarded to the endorser, so as to charge him.

As to the first: The protest sets forth the facts that the notary took the bill on which the suit is brought, to the counting-house of Clagett the drawee, and speaking to a clerk, exhibited the bill and demanded acceptance thereof; whereunto he answered that the same could not be accepted; and that thereupon the notary protested the bill 266 for nonacceptance. In the *argument here, the plaintiff's counsel made but one objection to the sufficiency of the protest; that is, that it does not state that the clerk of the drawee had authority to refuse acceptance. This objection should not prevail, if the protest had no extrinsic support: The most formal words could not more fully express the notary's opinion of the clerk's authority in the premises, than is set forth in the protest. The notary at the counting-house of the drawee, exhibited the bill to a clerk, demanded acceptance, which was refused, the answer to the demand noted, and thereupon the bill protested. This means that in the judgment of the notary it was proper to exhibit the bill to this clerk, and demand acceptance from him; that the clerk had authority to act on that demand; that his answer was a proper refusal: And upon all this the notary made his protest, which plainly enough expresses his opinion in regard to the sufficiency of every step on which he founded that official act.

The protest in this case is in the same form as that in Nelson v. Fotterall, 7 Leigh 179. In that case the whole court seems to have thought that parol proof was admissible to show the clerk's authority to refuse acceptance; two of the judges thought it necessary in aid of the protest; two others thought it unnecessary, and that the protest of itself was sufficient: It was not intimated by any one, that if the protest did not sufficiently verify the fact of the clerk's authority, parol proof was inadmissible to supply the defect. The court is the proper tribunal to decide what facts are proved by written documents. If the court, as it might have done, had decided that the protest proved a proper demand, and the other facts set forth therein, it was unnecessary, and therefore improper, to hear parol proof in regard to it, unless proof had been previously offered to assail the truth of facts alleged therein.

267 If this be error at all, it certainly is not to *the prejudice of the plaintiff in error here; it can do him no harm, after facts are proved by appropriate written testimony, the truth of which is in nowise impeached, to admit parol proof of the same fact.

Thus, whether we regard the protest as sufficient in itself, or as supported by the parol proof fully showing the clerk's authority and other facts, the court did not err to the prejudice of the plaintiff in error in permitting the protest and evidence to go to the jury: The parol proof established the fact that the clerk had authority to refuse an acceptance.

As to the second: The law requires notice of dishonor of commercial paper to be transmitted to the parties thereto for the purpose of enabling them to do what is needful to protect their interests; to this end it may be important to have early notice, and the law requires it to be given. In the case before us the notice was sent in a mode which would bring it to the hands of the plaintiff in error at the earliest practicable day: Yet it is alleged that it should have been sent by another mode, which, although it might have commenced the transmission at an earlier day, yet would not have delivered it so soon as the mode adopted. If we could yield to the argument of the plaintiff's counsel, we should sacrifice the object of the law. The notice was transmitted in the mail by an ocean steamer belonging to the Cunard line, which line carried the mail from Great Britain to the United States. It was sent by the first steamer which started after the bill was dishonored. This brings the case within the stringent rule of requiring that the notice be sent by the first mail. It appears, however, that there are regular lines of sailing packets from London (the place of the drawee's residence) to the United States; that these packets carried letter bags made up at the London post office; and that the times for their sailing from Great Britain occurred between 268 the day * of the dishonor of this bill and the day of the steamer's leaving. It further appears, that although a sailing packet should leave on the regular day for her departure, and thereafter a steamer should leave on her regular day of departure, the steamer would probably arrive first in the United States. It further appears, that the line of mail steamers is used by a very large majority of business men for the transmission of letters from Great Britain to the United States. There can be no question, that of these two modes of transmission, the proper one was adopted. This one has in its favor the facts that it carries the mail, that it is the ordinary mode of transmission, and that it may be expected to deliver a letter at an earlier day than the other; that other having in its favor the facts that it starts at an earlier day, and carries a letter bag. There is nothing to counterbalance the fact that the other line will deliver the letter at the earliest day. I think the notice of dishonor was duly transmitted.

I am of opinion to affirm the judgment.

The other judges concurred.

Judgment affirmed.

269 *Stainback v. The Bank of Virginia.

April Term, 1854. Richmond.

1. Principal and Agent—Power of Attorney to Draw, Endorse or Accept Bills—Scope of Authority.—A power of attorney to draw, endorse or accept bills, and to make and endorse notes, negotiable at a particular bank, in the name of the principal, in the absence of anything to show a different intention, must be construed as giving authority to act only in the separate individual business of the principal: And an endorsement of a bill by the agent in the name of his principal, for the benefit of the agent, is beyond his authority, and does not bind the principal.
2. Same—Same—Knowledge of Third Party That Agent Is Exceeding Authority—Effect.—A party dealing with the agent, with knowledge or means of knowledge that under such a power he is endorsing the name of his principal for his own benefit, is not entitled to recover from the principal.
3. Same—Same—Same.—The fact that the attorney who was the drawer of the bill upon which he endorsed the name of his principal, held the bill at the time it was discounted by the holder, and that the proceeds were passed to his credit, are of themselves full proof that the attorney was acting for his own benefit, and not that of his principal.

This was an action of assumpsit in the Circuit court of Petersburg, brought by the Bank of Virginia against Littleberry E. Stainback, as endorser of three bills of exchange, each for five hundred pounds sterling, drawn by F. C. Stainback upon T. W. Clagett of London, and protested for nonacceptance. The bills purport to be endorsed by Littleberry E. Stainback, by F. C. Stainback his attorney. Two of them bear date the 6th, and the third the 7th of February 1843. This case presented the same questions as to the protest and notice as arose in the next preceding case, but they are not noticed by this court. The case turned upon questions arising out of the endorsement by the attorney.

On the trial of the cause, after the plaintiffs had introduced in evidence the 270 three bills of exchange, the *protests and the evidence as to the dishonor of the bills and the notice, they introduced a power of attorney in the following terms:

"Know all men by these presents, that I, Littleberry E. Stainback of the town of Petersburg, state of Virginia, have made and appointed Francis C. Stainback of the town of Petersburg, state of Virginia, my true and lawful agent and attorney, for me and in my name and behalf to make, or endorse my name on, any note negotiable and payable at the office of discount and deposit of the Bank of Virginia in Petersburg; also to endorse my name on any bill of exchange negotiable at the office aforesaid, and to subscribe my name to any such bill or note, or to any endorsement

*The principal case is cited in DeVoss v. City of Richmond, 18 Gratt. 363; also, 2 Va. Law Register, 692. See monographic note on "Agencies" appended to Silliman v. Fredericksburg, etc., R. R. Co., 27 Gratt. 119.

thereof, or any acceptance of any such bill; also to draw in my name or sign and subscribe to any check payable and negotiable at the said office of discount and deposit in Petersburg as aforesaid; hereby ratifying, allowing and confirming all and every act that my said agent and attorney shall do in and about the premises. And I the said Littleberry E. Stainback, for myself, my heirs, &c., do hereby covenant with the president, directors and company of the Bank of Virginia, and their successors, that this power of attorney shall continue in full force and virtue until due notice shall be given in writing to the cashier of their office in Petersburg of its revocation; and that all notices of the protests of any bill or note made, endorsed or accepted by me, shall be good and sufficient in law, if given to my attorney aforesaid in my absence from the said town of Petersburg, state of Virginia. In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and seal this 19th day of March 1833.

L. E. Stainback. [Seal.]”

This power of attorney was deposited in the Bank of Virginia at Petersburg 271 when it was executed, and *had remained there ever since, unrevoked, until after the bills of exchange on which the action is founded were discounted by that bank. On the 12th of February 1843 L. E. Stainback addressed a note to the cashier of the bank, directing him to deliver the power of attorney to F. C. Stainback: and on the next day F. C. Stainback, as the attorney of L. E. Stainback, by endorsement on this note, which was attached by wafers to the power, revoked it from that date.

It was proved that F. C. Stainback was born on the 25th of February 1816; that at the date of the power of attorney the defendant was a merchant in Petersburg, and F. C. Stainback, who is his son, was a clerk in his store, and engaged in no business on his own account; that F. C. Stainback had never been engaged in any business on his own account until the partnership of L. E. Stainback, Son & Co. was formed, which commenced business March 5th, 1837; said firm consisting of the defendant L. E. Stainback, F. C. Stainback and James Macfarland, who married a daughter of the defendant. That Macfarland died in the latter part of the year 1841, leaving the defendant and F. C. Stainback surviving him, the latter of whom had the sole charge of settling up the business of the firm. That the bills on which this suit is founded, were received by the Bank of Virginia at Petersburg from F. C. Stainback, and their proceeds passed on the books of the bank to his credit: that two of the bills were lodged with the bank on the 6th, and so passed to his credit on the 7th of February 1843, which was the regular bill day at the bank, and the third bill was lodged with the bank on the 7th, and so passed to his credit on the 9th of the same month, which was a regular discount day at said bank. That at these dates F.

C. Stainback was a merchant in Petersburg, and had been since about July 1842, in good credit, engaged in shipping produce 272 and drawing bills. That *the defendant had been engaged in no active business since the dissolution of the partnership of L. E. Stainback, Son & Co.; had removed to his farm, which lies just beyond the corporation line of Petersburg, and was seldom in town; though he was in February 1843 the owner of ships.

It was further proved by the cashier of the Bank of Virginia at Petersburg, that it was understood by him at the time said bills were negotiated, as a matter generally known at the time in Petersburg, that F. C. Stainback went to Charleston in January 1843 to buy cotton, and that he made large purchases, and that the cashier supposed and believed at the time, that the said bills were drawn on shipments, but he did not know on what shipments; nor did he know for whom the purchases in Charleston had been made. That on the morning of the 7th day of February 1843, the account of F. C. Stainback in the Bank of Virginia at Petersburg was overdrawn, the balance against him being three thousand one hundred and ninety-three dollars and eight cents; that his deposits and discounts on that day amounted to eight thousand five hundred and sixty-two dollars and sixty cents, and his checks to seven thousand nine hundred and eighty-nine dollars and thirty cents, leaving a balance of two thousand six hundred and nineteen dollars and seventy-eight cents against him on the morning of the 8th; that his discounts and deposits amounted on the 8th to three thousand seven hundred and ninety-two dollars and twenty-eight cents, and his checks to six thousand nine hundred and ninety-nine dollars and forty-nine cents; leaving a balance of five thousand eight hundred and twenty-six dollars and ninety-nine cents against him on the morning of the 9th; that his discounts and deposits on that day amounted to four thousand seven hundred and seventy-eight dollars and seventy-eight cents, and that no check of his was 273 paid *or presented for payment on that day; and that his account continued to be overdrawn until the 16th of February 1843.

It was further proved that F. C. Stainback was generally regarded as the agent of his father; that the transactions of L. E. Stainback, Son & Co. had been very large, and after the death of Macfarland, one of the partners, sometimes amounted to one hundred thousand dollars a month at the said bank. That after the death of Macfarland in 1841, about July 1842 F. C. Stainback was in the habit of signing and endorsing the name of the defendant on bills and notes negotiated at said bank, as it is endorsed on the bills in evidence in this cause; but that none of the bills so drawn or endorsed had been dishonored, and that none of the said notes had been taken up by the defendant. That P. C. Osborne, one of the endorsers on the bills on which this action is founded, is a son in law of the defendant, and resided in Petersburg. That from about the month of April 1842 the indebtedness of L. E. Stainback, Son & Co. to the plaintiffs on their accommodation was rapidly reduced, and F. C. Stainback frequently used his own checks, and funds apparently his own, to make payments and deposits for the benefit of that firm; and that F. C. Stainback frequently put his name on paper of L. E. Stainback, Son & Co. as last endorser, so that he might have the control of the proceeds of the discounts. That when the bills in evidence in this case were negotiated, F. C. Stainback had on deposit to his credit at said bank, notes and inland bills considered good, to the amount of upwards of thirty thousand dollars, running to maturity, which were withdrawn by him on or about the 13th of February 1843.

It was also proved by the cashier of the bank at Petersburg, that he was present at the meeting of the board of directors when the bills in this case were 274 *negotiated, and that he had no knowledge that the proceeds of said bills were not to be used for the benefit of the defendant; that several foreign bills drawn by F. C. Stainback after the revocation of the power of attorney, were endorsed by the defendant with his own hand and by P. C. Osborne, and were negotiated by the Bank of Virginia at Petersburg, and the proceeds passed to the credit of F. C. Stainback; one of them for one thousand pounds, being drawn on T. W. Clagett of London; and that in February 1843 there was an account in the name of L. E. Stainback, Son & Co. on the books of said bank, which was, however, merely a continuation of their accommodation at the bank, which was about the 1st of February 1843 reduced, by F. C. Stainback's check for six hundred dollars, to about five thousand dollars.

The said cashier also proved that he was authorized by the board of directors, and that it is not unusual, where large dealers with the bank, especially dealers who are drawing foreign bills, and persons having large deposits of bills and notes to their credit running to maturity, to permit them to overdraw their accounts for a few days in the course of business, where he has reason to believe that a discount will be obtained of the bills or notes lodged with him on next discount day. That the over-drawing aforesaid of F. C. Stainback was known to the said cashier, but was not made known by him, nor, as far as he knows, in any other way, at the time said bills were discounted, to the board of directors by whom they were discounted.

Upon this evidence the defendant moved the court to instruct the jury as follows:

1st. If you believe from the evidence that the bills on which this suit is brought were received by the plaintiffs from F. C. Stainback, and discounted by them for his accommodation; and that the plaintiffs knew or had reason to believe, that the 275 money was *obtained by the said F.

C. Stainback for his individual benefit, then the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover against the defendant by force of the power of attorney given in evidence by them. But if the jury believe that the plaintiffs received the said bills from the said F. C. Stainback, and passed the proceeds to his credit, then it was incumbent on them to satisfy themselves that the money was obtained for the use and benefit of the defendant.

2d. If you believe from the evidence that the power of attorney given in evidence in this case, was made by the defendant whilst a merchant in Petersburg, and F. C. Stainback his son, was under age and a clerk in his store, and engaged in no business on his own account, and that the object of the defendant in making the said power was to authorize his said son to transact his business at the Bank of Virginia at Petersburg, and that this was known to the plaintiffs: And if you believe that the bills on which this suit is founded were not endorsed by the said F. C. Stainback in the course of transacting and attending to the business of the defendant at the said bank, but for the said F. C. Stainback's own use and accommodation, and that the same were discounted by the plaintiffs for the accommodation of said F. C. Stainback, then the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover against the defendant by force of said power of attorney.

3d. If you believe from the evidence that the power of attorney given in evidence in this cause was made by the defendant whilst a merchant in Petersburg, and whilst the said F. C. Stainback his son was a clerk in his store and under age, and engaged in no business on his own account, and that the object of the said defendant in making the said power was to authorize and empower his said son to sign his name to bills, notes, &c., in the business of the said defendant, and not to authorize the said F. C. Stainback to use the name

276 of *the defendant for his the said F. C. Stainback's own benefit, and that this was known to the plaintiffs: And if you believe that the bills on which this suit is brought were not endorsed by the said F. C. Stainback in the business or for the benefit of the defendant, but for the said F. C. Stainback's own use and accommodation, and that the same were discounted by the plaintiffs for the accommodation of said F. C. Stainback, then the said plaintiffs are not entitled to recover against the said defendant by force of said power of attorney.

The court refused to give these instructions or any of them; and instructed the jury as follows:

That the power of attorney offered in evidence in this cause, from the defendant to his son F. C. Stainback to endorse bills, notes, &c. for the defendant at the branch Bank of Virginia in Petersburg, gave the said F. C. Stainback no power to endorse bills or notes for his own benefit, or that of any other person except the defendant himself: that the endorsements made upon the bills exhibited in evidence in this cause, in the manner in which the same are made, are not inconsistent with the power of the said F. C. Stainback to endorse bills and notes for the benefit of the defendant, but within the scope of his authority to endorse bills for that purpose. If, therefore, the jury shall believe from the evidence in the cause, that the plaintiffs discounted said bills without notice of, or just cause to suspect, any intended fraud or misapplication of the proceeds thereof from the use and benefit of the principal, that then the defendant is bound by said endorsements; and any subsequent misapplication of the proceeds of said bills (if there were any) will not defeat the right of the plaintiffs to recover of the defendant. The defendant excepted to the opinion of the court.

There was a verdict for the plaintiffs, and a motion *by the defendant for a new trial, which was overruled, and judgment rendered for the plaintiffs; when the defendant again excepted; and applied to this court for a supersedeas, which was awarded.

Joynes and Patton, for the appellant.
D. May and Stanard, for the appellees.

SAMUELS, J. The several endorsements on which this suit is founded, were made under color of authority conferred by the power of attorney which was the subject of consideration in the case of Stainback v. Read & Co. recently decided in this court. This case, like the case above mentioned, turns upon the questions:

1st. Whether the endorsements were made in the proper exercise of the agent's authority.

2d. If not, whether there is anything in the dealing between the bank and the agent, which should bind the principal, notwithstanding the agent's want of authority.

After the evidence had been heard on the trial in the court below, three several instructions were moved for by the defendant's counsel, predicated upon portions of the evidence tending to show that the agent, in making the endorsements, was not acting in the business of the principal, but for the agent's own benefit, and praying the court to instruct the jury, if they believed this fact, they should find for the defendant. These instructions were refused by the court; and therein the court erred. If the agent did in fact endorse the name of his principal on the bills for the agent's own accommodation, he exceeded his authority, and the endorsements standing alone do not bind the principal.

2d. As to the second question: In the case above mentioned it was declared that under certain circumstances *therein mentioned, a principal might be bound by the act of the agent, although the agent may have exceeded his authority. This modification of the general rule in regard to a power to endorse, &c., applies in the case of an innocent holder for value, who has become such by the act of an agent apparently within the scope of his authority. The court, in the absence of all proof tending to prove the fact, should not have submitted it to the jury to find whether the bank was an innocent holder. So far from showing that the bank might have been deceived and was probably deceived by the agent, the evidence tends strongly to prove the reverse. In legal intendment the bank knew the limits of the agent's written authority; they had that authority in their own keeping; the bills were drawn by the agent in his own name and behalf; the name of the principal, who was the payee, was endorsed by the agent; and yet the bills are found in the hands of the drawer and offered by him for discount for his own benefit, and they are discounted accordingly, and the proceeds applied to the credit of the agent's own individual account. At the time the proceeds of the bills were so applied to the agent's credit, he was indebted to the bank in a large amount; and thus his debt was paid, so far as the proceeds of the bills extended. In every stage of the proceeding with which the bank was connected, it was perfectly apparent that the business of the agent, and not of the principal, was to be promoted.

It will not do to say that the agent might, by a certain disposition of the proceeds, have indemnified his principal; and that the bank could not know that he would not do so. The answer is obvious, that the proceeds of the bills were at once applied to his own benefit on the books of the bank, with its full knowledge and consent. If the possibility that an agent may indemnify his principal against abuse of power *may be relied on to bind the principal, the practical and beneficial effects of limitations in powers will be destroyed; for in every case the agent may possibly indemnify his principal against such abuse.

The remaining questions growing out of the protests, and the mode of transmitting the notices of dishonor, are considered in another case between the same parties; and I refer to what is there said as expressing my opinions on those questions.

I am of opinion to reverse the judgment, and remand the case for a new trial to be had in conformity with the principles herein declared, if on such new trial the proof shall be the same in substance as on the former trial.

ALLEN and DANIEL, Js., concurred.

MONCURE and LEE, Js., dissented.

The judgment was as follows:

It seems to the court here, that the power of attorney from L. E. Stainback to F. C. Stainback, given in evidence at the trial, as between the principal and agent, gave the attorney no authority to endorse the bills given in evidence, with the name of L. E. Stainback, for the accommodation of the attorney; and that parties dealing with the attorney, and having the means of knowing that he, in endorsing the name of the principal and obtaining a discount thereon, did so for the accommodation of the agent and not of the principal, cannot recover of the principal. It further seems to the court, that the facts appearing in the record, that the attorney, who was also the drawer, held the bills at the time they were offered for discount and discounted by the defendants in error, and that the proceeds were passed to the credit of the attorney, the drawer as aforesaid, are of themselves full proof *that the attorney was acting for his own benefit and not that of his principal; all which was known to the defendants. It therefore seems to the court that the Circuit court erred in refusing to give in substance the three several instructions moved for by the plaintiff, and in giving that which was given in lieu thereof.

Therefore, it is considered by the court that the judgment aforesaid be reversed and annulled, and that the defendants pay to the plaintiff his costs expended in this court; that the verdict of the jury be set aside, and the cause remanded, with instructions that if upon any future trial the evidence shall be in substance the same as at the former trial, and if the defendant in the court below shall ask it, the court shall instruct the jury in accordance with the opinion of this court, as herein declared.

281 *Stainback v. Read & Co.

April Term, 1854. Richmond.

1. Powers of Attorney—Construction and Scope.—A power of attorney given to an agent to act in the name and on behalf of his principal, in the absence of anything to show a different intention, must be construed as giving authority to act only in the separate individual business of the principal.

2. Same—Authority to Draw, Endorse or Accept Bills—Scope of Authority.—A power of attorney to draw, endorse and accept bills, and to make and endorse notes, negotiable at a particular bank, in the name of the principal, does not authorize the attorney to draw a bill in the joint names of himself and his principal.

3. Same—Same—Effect Where Bill Drawn on Person Having No Funds of Principal.—Such a power does not authorize the attorney to draw a bill in the name of his principal upon a person having no funds of the principal in his hands. And if such a bill is accepted and paid by the drawee for the accommodation of the drawer, there is no implied obligation of the principal to repay him.

4. Same—Same—Abuse of Power—Notice to Third Persons—Effect.—Such a power does not authorize

Powers of Attorney—Abuse of Power—Notice to Third Persons.—In Dyer v. Duffy, 39 W. Va. 152, 19 S. E. Rep. 541, it is said: "One dealing with an agent under written power must take notice of his powers, as an act not authorized is not binding on the principal. Curry v. Hale, 15 W. Va. 867; Hewes v. Doddridge, 1 Rob. (Va.) 143; Stainback v. Read, 11 Gratt. 281."

the attorney to draw a bill in the name of his principal for the benefit of the attorney; and a party dealing with the attorney, and having the means of knowing that the agent was exceeding his powers in thus drawing the bill for his own benefit, cannot recover of the principal.

This was an action of assumpsit in the Circuit court of Petersburg, brought by C. C. Read & Co. against Littleberry E. Stainback. Upon the trial the plaintiffs introduced in evidence a bill of exchange, which bore date the 14th of December 1842, and was directed to them, whereby they were requested to pay to P. C. & J. D. Osborne & Co. one thousand nine hundred and sixty-nine dollars and forty-two cents. The bill was signed by L. E. Stainback, by F. C. Stainback, attorney, and by F. C. Stainback, and was endorsed by the payees and F. C. Stainback; and was paid by the plaintiffs, who charged the amount on their books to F. C. Stainback and the defendant; neither of whom had at the date of the bill, any funds in the hands of the plaintiffs.

282 *The plaintiffs also introduced in evidence the power of attorney from L. E. Stainback to F. C. Stainback, set out in the next preceding case. They also offered evidence to prove that up to some time about the beginning of 1842 the defendant F. C. Stainback and another, who died in 1841, were in business in Petersburg as merchants under the name of L. E. Stainback, Son & Co. That the defendant is far advanced in life, attends to no business, and that F. C. Stainback had the management and settlement of the business of L. E. Stainback, Son & Co. up to the time of his failure in 1843. That L. E. Stainback, Son & Co. and also F. C. Stainback, had an account at the Bank of Virginia in Petersburg in December 1842, and previously, and that L. E. Stainback, Son & Co. were indebted to that bank until 1843. That on the 15th of December 1842 the bill aforesaid was discounted by said bank, and the proceeds passed to the individual credit of F. C. Stainback, the draft not then having been accepted by the plaintiffs. That in managing the bank business of L. E. Stainback, Son & Co., F. C. Stainback frequently endorsed notes and bills last, that he might control the proceeds.

The plaintiffs also introduced two letters, both of them in the handwriting of F. C. Stainback, and addressed to them. One bears date September 21st, 1842, and is

In Glover v. Ames, 8 Fed. Rep. 357, it is said: "In Stainback v. Read, 11 Gratt. 281, this principle was applied to a case in some respects similar to the present. There a power of attorney was given to an agent to draw bills, indorse notes, etc., but it was held that the agent was not authorized thereby to draw bills for his own benefit, but only for the benefit of his principal."

The principal case is also cited in DeVoss v. City of Richmond, 18 Gratt. 363.

See generally, monographic note on "Agencies" appended to Silliman v. Fredericksburg, etc., R. R. Co., 27 Gratt. 119.

signed L. E. Stainback, Son & Co. The only part of it having any bearing on this case is as follows:

"I enclose some paper, for which please send me your notes, payable at Farmville, viz:

My note dated 2d September, at
90 days, favor L. E. S.	-	-	1619 48
Do. do. 7th do. do.			1941 67
			<hr/> $3561 15

For which be pleased to send me
283 your notes in favor *of L. E. Stainback, Son & Co., dated 1st September, at 90 days, for $1618 38, and dated 8th September, at 90 days, for $1942 77, which will balance. You can use the notes if you wish.

"L. E. Stainback, Son & Co. have $15000 to pay on 4th of next month, and I wish to provide myself with paper in time. Your notes you will make payable in Farmville."

The second letter bears date December 15th, 1842, and is signed F. C. Stainback. In it he says, "I have yours of 10th, handing your check for $1000. Your draft fell due to day, not on 16th, and I had to alter the date to 15th. I would not have used it if I could have avoided it."

"P. S. The draft of $1740 92 is right. We had another discounted to day for about $1900. Will duly take care of them."

The plaintiffs also introduced in evidence certain bills or drafts, one of which was endorsed by L. E. Stainback, by F. C. Stainback attorney, F. C. Stainback, and L. E. Stainback, Son & Co.; and another was signed as the bill on which this action is founded is signed.

The defendant offered evidence to prove that at the date of the power of attorney aforesaid, the defendant was engaged in mercantile business in his own name in Petersburg, F. C. Stainback being a clerk in the defendant's house; and that F. C. Stainback was at that time under age, and engaged in no business on his own account; and that the firm of L. E. Stainback, Son & Co. was formed about 1836 or 1837.

The evidence being through, the defendant moved the court to instruct the jury as follows:

1st. That under the power of attorney given in evidence in this cause, F. C. Stainback had no authority to draw the bill on the plaintiffs, the payment of 284 which *constitutes the foundation of this action; and that the drawing of such bill on the plaintiffs, and the payment thereof by them, did not authorize the said plaintiffs to maintain this action against him.

2d. That if they believe from the evidence, that the bill, the payment of which by the plaintiffs constitutes the foundation of this action, was drawn by F. C. Stainback for his own benefit, and the proceeds thereof went to his own use, that it was not authorized by the power of attorney in evidence in this cause, and that it was the duty of all persons dealing with the said F. C. Stainback as attorney, to notice the limitations of his authority, as the same was conferred by the said power, and that he could only bind his principal in such cases and upon such bills as were included in said authority.

3d. That the power of attorney given in evidence in this cause, gave no authority to F. C. Stainback to bind the defendant, by drawing or endorsing bills, &c., for the benefit of F. C. Stainback, nor unless the same were drawn or endorsed for the benefit and in the business of the defendant.

4th. That if the jury believe from all the evidence in the cause, that the object of the defendant in executing the power of attorney in evidence in this cause, was to enable and authorize his son F. C. Stainback the attorney to attend to and transact the bank business of the defendant at the Virginia Bank in Petersburg, the defendant being then a merchant in Petersburg, and the said F. C. Stainback being under age; and that the bill the payment of which by the plaintiffs is the foundation of this suit, was not drawn by the said attorney in the course of attending to and transacting the bank business of the defendant at said bank, but for his own use and accommodation, then the said attorney had 285 no power to bind the defendant *by the drawing of the said bill, so as to enable the plaintiffs, on payment thereof, to recover the amount from the defendant.

The court refused to give the first and fourth instruction, and gave the second and third; but qualified the same by further instructing the jury, that the agent F. C. Stainback had the power, under the letter of attorney made evidence in the cause, to draw the bill on which this suit is founded, and subscribe the name of his principal L. E. Stainback thereto, in the manner in which it is done; and that if the jury shall believe that the plaintiffs accepted the same, and paid it at maturity, without notice of, or just cause to suspect, any intended fraud or misapplication of the proceeds thereof from the use or benefit of the principal, that then they ought to find for the plaintiffs, though they may believe it was an accommodation acceptance.

And further, that if the jury shall believe that no fraud or collusion with the agent is chargeable on the plaintiffs, then the fact that the said agent executed the bill in the name of his principal L. E. Stainback, designating himself as attorney, is equivalent to a declaration on his part, that he was acting in the business and for the benefit of his principal; and that any misapplication of the proceeds by the agent after they came to his hands (if there was any), would not defeat the plaintiffs' recovery.

To the opinion of the court refusing the first and fourth instructions, and instructing the jury as aforesaid, the defendant excepted. There was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiffs; and thereupon the defendant applied to this court for a superseas, which was awarded.

Joynes and Patton, for the appellant.

D. May and Stanard, for the appellees.

286 *SAMUELS, J. A proper analysis of this case will show that it turns upon two questions:

First. Whether F. C. Stainback had the authority of L. E. Stainback his principal, to draw the bill which is part of the foundation of this suit, or to subject his principal to an action on a collateral contract in regard thereto.

Second. If he had no such authority, is L. E. Stainback still liable for the act of the agent, because of anything in the dealing between the agent and the plaintiffs?

It may be laid down as a rule of law, sanctioned alike by reason and authority, that a power of attorney given to an agent, to act in the name and on behalf of his principal, in the absence of anything to show a different intention, must be construed as giving authority to act only in the separate, individual business of the principal. See Story on Agency, from § 57 to § 143; Atwood v. Munnings, 7 Barn. & Cress. 278; North River Bank v. Aymar, 3 Hill's N. Y. R. 262; Stainer v. Tysen, 3 Hill's N. Y. R. 262; Hewes v. Doddridge, 1 Rob. R. 143.

It is equally well settled that a party dealing with an agent acting under a written authority, must take notice of the extent and limits of that authority. He is to be regarded as dealing with the power before him; and he must at his peril, observe that the act done by the agent is legally identical with the act authorized by the power. See cases above cited; also 1 American Leading Cases 392, in notes.

These rules of law applied to the facts of the case, are decisive of the first question. The bill was not drawn in the business of L. E. Stainback, but in that of F. C. Stainback exclusively. It was not identical with a bill drawn in the separate name of

L. E. Stainback. A joint bill imposes 287 a joint liability on the *drawers in case it be not honored. In case of loss in the business in which the bill is drawn, both parties are bound; and in case one of the drawers be insolvent and the other solvent, as in this case, the whole loss must fall on the solvent party. If, however, a profit be made, it must be divided between those jointly concerned. A contract such as this is widely different from one in which the party liable for a loss, if one occur, is solely entitled to the profit, if one result.

Again: The power in any event must be held to authorize the agent to draw such bills only as L. E. Stainback might himself have rightfully drawn. In the case before us neither L. E. Stainback alone, or L. E. & F. C. Stainback jointly, had any right to draw the bill in question, having no funds in the hands of the drawees; and having, at the time, no other reason to suppose it would be accepted. The drawer of a bill, when he negotiates it, is to be understood as affirming that he has the right to draw. In the case before us L. E. Stainback is made to falsely affirm such right; to commit a fraud by means of the authority conferred by him. Under certain circumstances a principal may be bound by the act of his attorney going beyond his power, yet he can be so bound only to an innocent holder for value. Read and company are not holders at all; they knew perfectly well that L. E. Stainback, either solely or jointly with another, had no right to draw on them; that a power to draw bills rightfully, would not extend to their house, in the then state of business relations between them and the drawers, or either of them.

The letter of attorney authorized the agent to do certain specified acts, including the drawing of bills; this, as already stated, is to be construed as applying to the rightful drawing of bills in the 288 business of the *principal. Within these limits the agent had authority to pledge the credit of his principal, and subject him to the consequent liability. Yet in the case before us the defendant is sued not upon a direct undertaking as drawer, nor upon a liability incident to his position on the bill; he is sued upon an alleged contract to transpose the positions of the drawers and acceptors, to make the drawers liable to the acceptors: And all this is said to be implied in the drawing the bill under the circumstances existing at the time. It cannot be held that an agent may, by implied contract, bind his principal beyond those limits within which he might bind him by express contract; nor can it be held that a power to draw a bill, in itself gives the further power to make another original and express contract to indemnify the acceptor against his acceptance. If the attorney could not make an express contract of indemnity, it is impossible to suppose that it can be implied from his drawing the bill.

The second question has, to some extent, been anticipated in considering the first. There are, however, certain considerations peculiar to this branch of the case, which require some notice. It is well settled that although an agent may in fact exceed his power, yet if he apparently keep within its limits, and deal with innocent parties for value, the principal will be bound. Mann v. King, 6 Munf. 428; North River Bank v. Aymar, 3 Hill's N. Y. R. 262. It is but just that the principal should suffer the consequences of his own misplaced confidence, rather than they should fall on innocent parties. This rule of law, however well established, can afford no aid to Read & Co. upon the facts of this case. They dealt with an agent acting under a power of attorney, and, as already said, must be regarded as dealing with that power before them. They were bound, at their peril, to notice the limits prescribed therein, 289 either by its own terms, or *by construction of law. With this knowledge, they nevertheless make a contract, which is not one of those specified in the power; but an original contract to subject the drawers to a liability not incident to their position on the paper. They accepted the bill, having no funds of the drawers; they knew that their acceptance would make them liable to any subsequent holder for value; they relied upon the undertaking of F. C. Stainback for indemnity; this undertaking is contained in the letter dated December 15th, 1842, the day the bill was discounted, advising the drawees of the bill and its discount, and promising "to take care of it;" obviously meaning thereby to provide funds for its payment at maturity. This undertaking is contained in a letter from F. C. Stainback to Read & Co. given in evidence upon the trial. The letter is signed by F. C. Stainback with his own name only; is wholly upon his own business with them; and must be held to be an express guarantee by F. C. Stainback alone. This excludes all possibility of an implied guarantee by L. E. Stainback, either joint or several.

The law, as here declared, required that the first and fourth instructions should have been given; and seeing that by necessary legal intendment Read & Co. did know the limits of the attorney's power, and that in making the contract sued on he was exceeding his authority, there was no foundation in the facts of the case for the qualification with which the second and third instructions were given. The court, therefore, erred in annexing such qualification.

I am of opinion to reverse the judgment of the Circuit court, and remand the cause for a new trial, with directions to give the four instructions as moved for, if the evidence on the new trial shall be substantially the same as on the former trial, and if the instructions shall be again asked for.

290 *ALLEN and DANIEL, Js., concurred.

MONCURE and LEE, Js., dissented.

The judgment was as follows:

It seems to the court here, that the power of attorney from Littleberry E. Stainback to F. C. Stainback, given in evidence on the trial in the court below, did not give authority to F. C. Stainback to draw the bill given in evidence, binding said L. E. Stainback as a joint drawer with F. C. Stainback; and that the Circuit court erred in refusing to give the first instruction moved for by the plaintiff in error.

It further seems to the court here, that the power of attorney, as between the principal and agent, gave no authority to the agent to draw the bill aforesaid for the accommodation of the agent; and that parties dealing with the agent and having the means of knowing that the agent was exceeding his power in thus drawing the bill for his own benefit, cannot recover of the principal.

It further seems to the court that the facts, that F. C. Stainback held the bill and had it discounted for his own benefit; that he wrote the letter of December 15th, 1842, addressed to the defendants; that they accepted, after receiving that letter, and charged their acceptance to F. C. Stainback; if believed by the jury, taken in connection with the written evidence, were sufficient to show that the defendants had the means of knowing that F. C. Stainback the agent, in procuring the acceptance of defendants, was procuring it for his own accommodation and not that of his principal; and that the principal was not bound: that the court below should have so instructed the jury, and that it erred on plaintiff's second motion to instruct.

It further seems to the court here, 291 that the court *below erred in its action on the plaintiff's third and fourth motions to instruct; that it should have given the instruction above stated as proper to be given on the second motion to instruct.

Therefore, it is considered by the court that the said judgment be reversed and annulled; that the plaintiff recover of the defendants his costs in this court expended; that the verdict of the jury be set aside, and the cause remanded for a new trial to be had therein; upon which trial, if the evidence shall be the same in substance as that at the former trial, the Circuit court shall conform its action to the principles hereby declared.

April Term, 1854, Richmond.

1. Misdemeanor—Free Negro Coming in State—Statute.

—The offence of a free negro in coming into the state and remaining therein in violation of the 28th and 29th sections of chapter 198 of the Code of Virginia, is a misdemeanor, for which he is liable to be prosecuted and punished in the manner provided in said 28th section.

2. Same—Same—Appeal as Matter of Right.—Upon conviction of such a misdemeanor the party is entitled, as of right, under the 15th section of chapter 213 of the Code, to an appeal from the justice's decision to the court of the county or corporation in which his conviction was had: And it is the duty of the justice to allow the appeal, if duly applied for.

3. Same—Same—Same—Refusal—Mandamus.—If in such case the appeal is duly applied for and re-

Mandamus—Cases Relating to.—In Lowther v. Davis, 33 W. Va. 134, 10 S. E. Rep. 21, it is said: "Mandamus is an extraordinary writ, and lies only in cases where the party has no other specific or adequate remedy. 2 Cooley, Bl. Comm. bk. 3, p. 110, note 13; 4 Minor, Inst. pt. 1, p. 362; Justices v. Munday, 2 Leigh 165. It would not lie in a case such as the one before us, because the statute gives a plain and adequate remedy by petition to the court. This remedy did not exist in Virginia when the case of Ex parte Morris, 11 Gratt. 292, was decided, and therefore that case has no application since the enactment of our statute authorizing the circuit court, or the judge thereof, to grant appeals."

fused by the justice, the party may have relief by mandamus from the Circuit court.

4. Refusal of Circuit Court to Issue Mandamus—Supersedeas from Supreme Court.—If the Circuit court refuses to issue a mandamus in such a case, the party may apply to the Supreme court of appeals for a supersedeas or writ of error, and have the action of the Circuit court reviewed and corrected by that court.

William W. Morris a free negro, applied by petition verified by his affidavit, to the Circuit court of the city of Richmond for a mandamus to the mayor of Richmond, to compel that officer to allow to the petitioner an appeal from a judgment pronounced against him. In his petition he stated that on the 1st day of May 1854 he was arraigned before Joseph Mayo, the mayor of the city of Richmond, for remaining in the commonwealth contrary to law, upon the allegation that he had forfeited his right to stay therein by reason of his having once gone beyond its limits, under the 28th and 29th sections of ch. 198 of the Code of Virginia. That upon this charge he was tried by the said mayor, and was required to give bond in the penalty of five hundred dollars, 293 that he would leave *the state within ten days. From this decision he appealed to the Hustings court, and offered any security which might be required of him. But the mayor refused to allow the appeal, and exacted from him the bond aforesaid. He insisted that his right to appeal from the decision of the mayor was absolute. That by § 1 of ch. 199, of the Code, the offence of which he had been convicted is a misdemeanor; and by § 15

In Woodford v. Hull, 31 W. Va. 471, 7 S. E. Rep. 451, it is said: "If the judgment pronounced by the justice, the plaintiff in error, had been one from which an appeal lay to the circuit court, then mandamus would have been the proper remedy. Ex parte Morris, 11 Gratt. 292; Supervisors v. Minturn, 4 W. Va. 300. This was evidently the theory upon which the petitioner, Woodford, and the circuit court, proceeded in this case. But this court having, since the judgment was rendered by the circuit court, decided that no appeal will lie from the judgment of a justice rendered upon the verdict of a jury, whether the defendant appeared and contested the action or not (Hickman v. Railroad Co., 30 W. Va. 296, 4 S. E. Rep. 654), it is plain that mandamus did not lie in this case, and therefore the circuit court erred in overruling the motion of the justice, Hull, to quash the alternate writ. The justice could not be compelled by mandamus, or any other writ, to do that which the law forbids him to do."

The principal case is also cited in Page v. Clopton, Judge, 30 Gratt. 419, and note. Further, upon the subject of mandamus, see the following cases: Com. v. Fairfax Justices, 2 Va. Cas. 9; Dawson v. Thruston, 2 H. & M. 132; Brown v. Crippin, 4 H. & M. 173; Harrison v. Emmerson, 2 Leigh 827 [764]; Manns v. Dickinson, Judge, 25 Gratt. 817, and note; King William Justices v. Munday, 2 Leigh 165; Barnett v. Meredith, 10 Gratt. 650, and note; of ch. 212, the right of appeal from any such judgment is made absolute. He therefore prayed that the court would award a mandamus to compel the mayor to allow to him an appeal to the Hustings court.

The Circuit court refused the writ; and thereupon Morris applied to this court for a supersedeas to the judgment of the court; which was allowed.

Crump, for the petitioner.

LEE, J. The plaintiff in error, who was a free negro, was charged before the mayor of the city of Richmond with remaining in the commonwealth contrary to law, after having forfeited his right to return to the state or remain therein, by going to a non-slaveholding state. Upon this charge he was tried, and being adjudged to have violated the law in this respect, he was required to give bond in the penalty of five hundred dollars, with condition that he would leave the state within ten days. From this sentence he prayed an appeal to the Hustings court, and offered to give any security that might be required; but the mayor not thinking him entitled to an appeal in such a case, refused to grant it. He then presented a petition to the Circuit court of the city of Richmond, setting out the facts, and verified by affidavit, praying a mandamus to compel the mayor to grant him an appeal; but that court, upon consideration of the matter, refused to grant the writ prayed for; and he then 294 *presented a petition to this court praying a supersedeas to the order of the Circuit court refusing the mandamus, which was allowed.

I think there can be no question as to the power of this court to review the action of a Circuit court in refusing to award a mandamus upon an appeal from or writ of error or supersedeas to the order refusing the same. The order is final, and in a case involving a civil right, not a matter of controversy merely pecuniary, and the case is thus within the general terms of the law providing the appellate jurisdiction; and the 9th and 10th sections of the act of June 5th, 1852 (Sess. Acts 1852, p. 53), although they do not in totidem verbis declare that an appeal, &c., shall lie to the Court of appeals from the judgment of a Circuit court in a case of mandamus, yet they do so in effect; for they provide that when a petition for an appeal, &c., in such a case shall be presented, the certificate of counsel as to the propriety of reviewing the decision may be counsel or attorney of the Supreme court of appeals or a District court; and if the appeal, &c., be allowed, that the case shall be docketed in the Supreme court, unless the petitioner ask that it be docketed in a District court; in which case it may be docketed in such last named court, subject to be transferred to the Supreme court of appeals in the manner provided in the act. The review of an order refusing a mandamus is in entire conformity with the long settled previous practice of this court in similar cases. In Mayo v. Clark, 2 Call 276, a District court had refused to grant a supersedeas to an order of a County court concerning a road. The Court of appeals refused to grant a mandamus to compel the District court to grant the supersedeas, but did grant a supersedeas to the order of the District court refusing it. In another case a Superior court of law had refused to grant a mandamus to compel

a County court in which an action
295 *had been brought against a party claiming to be a lieutenant in the navy of the United States and a citizen of Pennsylvania, to remove the case into the United States court pursuant to the act of congress on that subject. The Court of appeals reversed the order of the Circuit court refusing the mandamus, and proceeded to award it. Several other cases may be found in which the Court of appeals has allowed writs of supersedeas to orders of inferior courts refusing to grant writs of mandamus. Dawson v. Thruston, 2 Hen. & Munf. 132; Dew v. Judges of Sweet Springs District Court, 3 Hen. & Munf. 1; Manns v. Givens, 7 Leigh 689.

The 28th and 29th sections of chapter 198 of the Code, p. 745, prohibiting the migration of free negroes into this commonwealth, or the return of one who has once gone to a nonslaveholding state, contain provisions of a highly penal character, to be enforced in the manner therein prescribed. They cannot be called "police regulations" in any other sense than one affecting the state at large. They cannot properly be so called in the usual and restricted sense of those terms, which applies them to the ordinances enacted by the local authorities of a town or city for its internal government, and the preservation of good order within its limits. Any violation of these provisions constitutes an offence against the laws of the commonwealth, for which the party is liable to be arrested and summarily dealt with as the act provides; and it cannot be distinguished from a breach of any other penal enactment embracing the whole state, to be found in the Code. It is true that in this case no other sentence has been pronounced than that the party must give the bond to leave the state, and no order for stripes has been yet made; and if the bond be given, the party is no longer liable to the stripes. But he is under arrest, and if the bond be not given, the order for the stripes may be made at any time, 296 and *may be repeated from time to time. If the bond be given, the penalty is forfeited if he fail to leave the state within the ten days, or if, having left it, he should afterwards return within its limits. And in an action upon the bond to recover the penalty, he cannot defend himself by showing that he was not liable to give such a bond. That is concluded by the judgment of the mayor, whose sentence is accordingly the conviction of the party of the offence charged.

A violation of the provisions of these sections being thus an offence against the laws of the commonwealth, it falls of course within the class of misdemeanors under the first section of ch. 199, p. 750, which declares all offences to be either felonies or misdemeanors; and under the 15th section of ch. 212, p. 788, a negro convicted of a misdemeanor by a justice is entitled to appeal from the decision to the County or Corporation court; and it is the duty of the justice to grant such appeal, if the same be applied for.

The act has made no provision for the case of a refusal by the justice to grant an appeal, where the party is legally entitled to demand it, but he does not thereby lose the benefit of it, though he of course must resort to such remedy as the common law affords. That the mandamus is the rightful remedy, I have no doubt. This lies where there is a distinct legal right, and no other means of asserting it; and the case under consideration is precisely in that category. Here the party has a plain, unquestionable right to appeal from the sentence of the mayor, and that officer has no discretion in the matter. Unless his right to the appeal be asserted, there will be a failure of justice; and there is no mode in which it can be asserted save by a resort to the general power possessed by the Circuit court to "oblige all inferior courts and magistrates to execute that justice to which a party is entitled, and which they are enjoined to do by law; especially 297 if it *be enjoined by statute." That a mandamus will lie from the Circuit court to the justices of the County court, both as members of the court and individually in pais, is shown by numerous cases. Commonwealth v. Justices of Fairfax, 2 Va. Cas. 9; Dawson v. Thruston, 2 Hen. & Munf. 132; Brander v. Chesterfield Justices, 5 Call 548; Brown v. Crippen, 4 Hen. & Munf. 173; Harrison v. Justices of Norfolk, 2 Leigh 764; Manns v. Givens, 7 Leigh 689.

I think, therefore, the Circuit court erred in wholly refusing the prayer of the petition, and that it should have awarded a rule or a mandamus nisi, and upon the return thereof, should have proceeded to investigate the facts of the case, and if found substantially as stated in the petition, should have awarded a peremptory mandamus.

I am of opinion to reverse the judgment of the Circuit court, but without costs; the mayor not having been summoned or otherwise made a party in the Circuit court, and regarding the proceeding hitherto as ex parte merely; and to remand the cause to the Circuit court, with directions to proceed in the manner above indicated.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Lee, J.

The following is the judgment of the court:

The court is of opinion, that it is competent for this court to review the order of the Circuit court refusing said writ of mandamus, upon a writ of error or supersedeas; and if found erroneous, to reverse the same, and make such further order in the premises as shall be right and proper.

And the court is further of opinion, that the offence of a free negro in coming into this state and remaining therein in violation of the 28th and 29th sections 298 *of ch. 198 of the Code of Virginia, is a misdemeanor, for which he is liable to be prosecuted and punished in the manner provided by said 28th section.

And the court is further of opinion, that upon conviction of such a misdemeanor, the party is entitled, as of right, under the 15th section of ch. 213 of said Code, to an appeal to the court of the county or corporation in which such conviction was had; and that in the present case it was the duty of the said mayor to have allowed such appeal, if duly applied for, as alleged in the plaintiff's petition to the said Circuit court.

And the court is further of opinion, that such appeal having been duly applied for and erroneously denied by said mayor, according to the allegations and suggestions of the said petition, the petitioner had no other legal means to assert his right to the same save by mandamus, and that such writ of mandamus was the rightful remedy to be resorted to in the premises.

And the court is further of opinion, that the said Circuit court had full authority and jurisdiction to entertain said application, and to award a mandamus nisi upon the filing of said petition; and upon due return thereof, if the facts of the case were, on proper investigation, found to be substantially as alleged in said petition, it was the duty of the said Circuit court to award a peremptory mandamus.

Wherefore the court is of opinion, that the order of the said court, wholly denying the prayer of said petition, is erroneous.

Therefore, it is considered by the court, that the said order be reversed and annulled, but without costs; the court being of opinion that the said mayor not having been summoned or otherwise made a party to the proceeding in the Circuit court, the proceeding in this court is to be regarded as in the 299 nature of an ex parte proceeding on behalf of the petitioner, in *which the said mayor is no party nor liable for costs. And it is further ordered, that the cause be remanded to the said Circuit court, with directions to award a writ of mandamus nisi in the matter of said petition, and upon due return thereof, to take such further proceedings in the cause as justice and the rules of law shall require. Which is ordered to be certified to the said Circuit court.

and board of negroes, furnished by plaintiff to defendants, as executors as aforesaid, at their special instance and request. The second count, was for attendance upon the slaves of their testator's estate and work and labor done and performed by plaintiff for and about the said slaves, &c., which attendance, work and labor, &c., were done, performed and rendered to defendants as executors as aforesaid, at their special instance and request. The third count was for money paid, laid out and expended by plaintiff for the use of the defendants as executors as aforesaid, at their special instance and request.

The defendant demurred generally to the declaration; but the court overruled the demurrer. The defendant also pleaded non assumpsit, and non assumpsit within five years. And upon the trial he moved the court to instruct the jury, that unless they believe from the evidence, that the charges and items mentioned in the bill of particulars in this case, were furnished and rendered by the plaintiff at the instance and request of the defendant, they must find for the defendant. This instruction the court refused to give, and the defendant excepted; but the bill of exceptions does not set out any of the evidence, so as to show the relevancy of the instruction asked. There was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff: And the defendant thereupon applied to this court for a supersedeas, which was awarded.

Patton, for the appellant.

Morson, for the appellee.

DANIEL, J. It seems to be well established as a general principle, that contracts made with an executor or administrator are personal, and do not bind the 302 *estate of the testator or intestate.

The representative has no power to charge the assets in his hands by contracts originating with himself; nor can any other person reach the assets for claims originating since the death of the decedent, by suit against the representative as such. For such contracts and claims the remedy is against the executor or administrator in his private capacity: Whilst on the other hand, for the contracts of the decedent, the representative is bound not personally, but in his representative capacity. Jennings v. Newman, 4 T. R. 347; Sumner v. Williams, 8 Mass. R. 162, 199.

It is also equally as well settled that promises which charge a man as executor cannot be joined with those which charge him personally: Because the judgment in the one case would be de bonis propriis, and in the other de bonis testatoris. 2 Saund. R. 117 e, note; Epes' adm'r v. Dudley, 5 Rand. 437.

The declaration contains three counts. The charges exhibited by the two first, have all originated since the death of the testator, and unless they can be excepted from the general rule, they lie not against the executor as such, but against him personally. The counsel for the appellee argues that they may be so excepted; that they are of a nature entitling them to stand on the same footing with the funeral expenses of the deceased, for which, he says, a recovery may be had against the executor in his representative character. In the case of Corner v. Shew, 3 Mees. & Welsb. 350, the authorities on the subject were reviewed, and the subject fully discussed and examined as well by the counsel of the respective parties as by the court. The authorities relied on in that case for the proposition that the funeral expenses constituted a charge on the estate and could be demanded of the executor as such, were Tugwell v. Heyman, 3 Camp. R. 298; Rogers v. Price, 303 Young & Jer. 28; and Lucy v. Wal-

rond, *32 Eng. C. L. R. 349. "With respect to the two first cases (Parke B. said), it was no doubt decided by them that there is an implied promise on the part of an executor, who has assets, to pay the reasonable expenses of such a funeral of his testator as is suitable to his degree and circumstances. It was contended, however, at the bar that those decisions were against a prior authority and were wrong, (a question upon which it is not necessary for us to give any opinion,) but that, if they were right, the only point really determined was, that the law implies a contract on the part of the executor personally, and not in his representative character; and we are all of that opinion." And of the last case he disposes by saying that the point was not then discussed, and that the case was decided on the ground of payment of money into court. I have examined these cases, and think that the foregoing views with respect to the authority to be deduced from them, is correct; and that the conclusion to which the whole court, in Corner v. Shew, arrived, viz: that the executor as such cannot be made liable for the funeral expenses of the testator, may now be regarded as the well settled law in England. In this country the weight of authority is in favor of the same conclusion. In Myer v. Cole, 12 John. R. 349, and in Demott v. Field, 7 Cow. R. 58, counts, on promises by the testator, were joined with counts on promises by the executor as such, to pay for the funeral expenses of the testator; and in each case it was held that the declaration could not be sustained; the counts on the promises by the testator requiring a judgment de bonis testatoris, and the counts on the promises by the executor to pay for the funeral expenses, judgments de bonis propriis. The court said that the last mentioned promises were personal; and though the estate of the testator in the hands of the de-304 fendant *would be liable over to him for the funeral expenses, that did not alter the form of the proceeding.

In Hapgood v. Houghton, 10 Pick. R. 154, which was assumpsit against an executor, a count on a promise by the testator, was joined with a count for the funeral expenses, alleging that they were incurred at the request of the executor, and that he as such promised to pay therefor; and the court held there was no good objection to the joinders. It will be seen, however, that the plaintiff mainly relied on a statute, the count for the funeral expenses, after stating that they were incurred with the consent and knowledge and at the request of the defendant, adding "that thereby and by force of the statute in such case made and provided, the said defendant in his said capacity became liable to pay the same, and in consideration thereof as executor promised," &c. And the court, in delivering its opinion, is, I think, fairly to be understood as resting its judgment mainly on the statute. In the case of Parker v. Lewis, 2 Dev. R. 21, it must be conceded the question seems to have been untrammelled by such considerations, and to have been decided on the views which the court entertained of the rule of the common law on the subject; and it was then held that such expenses are a charge on the assets, independently of any promise by the administrator, upon the ascertainment of the fact that they are of that description, and proper for the estate and degree of the deceased. And an instruction given in the court below that the defendant was liable for them in his character of administrator, without a previous request or promise, was sustained. The case, however, stands opposed to the current of decisions on the subject; and I think we are well justified in regarding it as settled that such expenses constitute no exception to the general rule, which charges the executor in his individual and not 305 *in his representative character, for claims against the estate, originating since the death of the decedent. Be this as it may, the authorities seem to be almost uniform in holding that all other services, rendered for the estate after the death of the testator, charge the executor, if at all, personally. And in addition to those already referred to as sustaining the general principle, from which such a rule may be deduced, may be cited the cases of Vaughn v. Gardner, 7 B. Monr. R. 326, and Lovell v. Field, 5 Verm. R. 218, in which the precise question was decided. In the former, it was decided that with promises by the testator to pay for work and labor done and services rendered for him in his life time, might be joined promises to pay for the same, by the executor; whilst promises by the executor in consideration of services performed for him as executor could not be: Because the judgment in both of the first mentioned promises would have to be de bonis testatoris, and on the last de bonis propriis. And in the latter, the same principle was announced. The court said that the administrator could not promise to bind the estate for goods furnished for the benefit of the estate. The promise is his own, and he is personally liable. He may make it on the credit of the estate in his hands; but whether he has a right to pay out of the same depends on its receiving the sanction of the probat court.

It seems to me, from this view of the law, that the promises set forth in the two first counts can create no liability on the executor as such, and charge him only personally. If the third count was of the same kind, the judgment of the court overruling the demurrer might most probably be sustained. For in the case of Corner v. Shew, heretofore cited, it is stated as law, that if the defendant could not, under any circumstances, be liable to the charges made against him as executor, those words, 306 in the declaration, might be *struck out as surplusage, which, however, could not be done in a case in which a defendant could on any supposition be liable in that character to the contract or demand declared on. And in 2 Williams' Ex'ors 1096, it is said that where the nature of the debt is such as necessarily to make defendant liable personally, the judgment will be de bonis propriis, although he be charged as executor. In the case of Sims v. Stilwell, 3 How. Miss. R. 176, the rule is stated in very much the same terms; and in 2 Williams' Ex'ors 1099, it is said that when the executor is personally liable, the naming him executor may be regarded as surplusage.

The third count is for divers sums of money paid, laid out and expended by plaintiff for the use of the defendants as executors. Under such a count facts might have been shown which would have justified a recovery de bonis testatoris. It seems to be now well settled that a count against an executor for money had and received cannot be joined with a count for money due to plaintiff by the defendant as executor upon an account stated with him of money due from him as executor: The first being treated as showing a personal charge on the executor, and the last a charge against the estate. Ashby v. Ashby, 14 Eng. C. L. R. 77. In that case there were three counts against the defendant as executor. The first for money paid, &c., to the use of defendant as executor; the second for money received by defendant as executor to the plaintiff's use; and the third on an account stated. The court holding it clear according to the authorities, that there was an improper joinder of the second and third counts, did not deem it necessary to decide upon the character of the first, though there was a strong intimation of opinion that the first count was for matter which charged the executor in his representative character.

Bayley, J., said, "In the first count of 307 the *declaration before us, the money is stated to have been paid by the plaintiff, to the use of the defendant as executor. That imports that the plaintiff has paid it, not on the personal account of the defendant, but that he has paid it for him because he was executor; that is, as it seems to me, in release of something which would otherwise have been a burden on the assets of the testator. I think that the plaintiff, having paid the money to the use of the defendant as executor, has the same right that before such payment belonged to the person to whom it was made, and consequently, that he (the plaintiff) may charge the assets of the testator. To put a plain case: Suppose two persons are jointly bound as sureties; one dies; the survivor is sued, and is obliged to pay the whole debt. If the deceased had been living, the survivor might have sued him for contribution in an action for money paid; and I think he is entitled to sue the executor of the deceased for money paid to his use as executor." Like opinions were expressed by other members of the court. In the argument of the case of Corner v. Shew, it seems to have been conceded that such was the law; and it was also thus held in the case of Collins v. Weiser, 12 Serg. & Rawle 97. The character of a count for money had and received and of a count on account stated against an executor, had been considered by this court, and adjudged in accordance with the decision in Ashby v. Ashby; it being decided in Fairfax's ex'ors v. Stover, 2 Call 514, that on the former the judgment should be de bonis propriis, and in Epes' adm'r v. Dudley, 5 Rand. 437, that on the latter the judgment should be de bonis testatoris. I see no reason for doubting that the opinion expressed in that case (Ashby v. Ashby) with respect to the count for money paid, &c., to the use of the executor, is also now the law. Such being the case there was an improper 308 joinder of *counts in the declaration; and the court, instead of overruling ought to have sustained the demurrer.

On the trial an exception was taken to the action of the court in refusing to give certain instructions asked by the defendant. The facts of the case are, however, not stated, and in their absence we cannot undertake to decide whether the court did right or wrong in refusing.

I think, therefore, that in accordance with Hale v. Crow, 9 Gratt. 263, and Strange v. Floyd, 9 Gratt. 474, the judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded, in order that the defendant in error may amend his declaration, if so advised; and on his failure to make a motion to that effect, that the court may render judgment for the plaintiff in error.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Daniel, J.

Absent DANIEL, J.

1. Waste and Unappropriated Lands—Entry—Essentials.—An entry of waste and unappropriated land, to be valid, must call for objects which possess that notoriety in themselves, or they must be so particularly described, that other persons, by using due care and reasonable diligence, may readily find them.
2. Same—Same—Descriptive and Locative Calls—Certainty of.*—The general or descriptive calls, and the particular or locative calls, of the entry must possess that reasonable degree of certainty which will put a subsequent adventurer duly upon his guard; and the locative calls must be found to be embraced within the descriptive calls, and they should properly be consistent with the latter and with one another: Though in certain cases, where all the calls of an entry cannot be satisfied, the courts, for the purpose of sustaining it, will reject such as appear vague and repugnant, and hold to those appearing to be certain and consistent.

3. Same—Same—Same.—Where there are several distinct and independent calls in an entry, it is not necessary that all the objects thus called for should be known and recognized by the public; or that they should all be described with that specialty that a subsequent locator can readily find them: But it is necessary that some one or more of the leading calls should be thus known, or so described that other persons, with due care and proper diligence, may be led to ascertain their positions, and thus distinguish the land appropriated from the adjacent residuum.

4. Same—Same—Same—When Court Takes Notice of without Proof.—The objects called for are sometimes so connected with the general history or geography of the country or its legislation, that the courts will take notice of them; and they will be deemed of general notoriety, and sufficiently identified, without further proof: And an entry calling for such objects may be supported without proof of notoriety or identity.

5. Same—Same—Same—When Must Be Proved.—When the objects called for possess but a local notoriety, the party affirming the validity of the entry, must prove the identity of the land intended to be appropriated, and that the calls of the entry are such that a subsequent locator, in the exercise of proper judgment and reasonable diligence, would be enabled to distinguish it from the surrounding lands, so as to appropriate for himself the adjacent residuum.

6. Caveat—Objects Called for Not of Public Notoriety—Special Verdict—Requisites of.—In a caveat, where the objects called for in the entry are not of such *public notoriety as that the courts will take notice of them, a special verdict must find that the objects called for have a real existence, and are such as is required to make it a valid entry; and a finding defective in these respects will not be remedied by finding that the survey was made in conformity with the entry.

7. Same—Party Who Files Must Show Title.—A party who files a caveat must show a title to the warrant under which his own entry and survey were made; and if he fails to do so, his caveat will be dismissed.

On the 23d of July 1849, Benjamin Herold made an entry with the surveyor of Pocahontas county, of three thousand acres of the entry for waste and unappropriated lands, see the principal case cited in Stockton v. Morris, 89 W. Va. 441, 19 S. E. Rep. 583; Simpkins v. White, 43 W. Va. 127, 27 S. E. Rep. 361.

†Caveat—Special Verdict—Certainty of.—In Clements v. Kyles, 13 Gratt. 485, and note, the cause was sent back to the lower court to have a more perfect finding of the facts upon which the rights of the parties depend, citing Cropper v. Carlton, 6 Munf. 277; McNeel v. Herold, 11 Gratt. 309.

land on the waters of the Slate fork and Big Spring fork of Elk river, being the same land embraced in a deed to the said Herold and one David Hanna from Lewis Pennell, recorded in the clerk's office of said county. The entry also described the land as adjoining the lands of G. B. Moffett and five other persons named, and a survey called "Adams' survey;" and it purported to have been made by virtue of part of a warrant of three thousand five hundred and ninety acres, No. 17,826.

On the 27th of April 1850, Herold made a survey, purporting to be on his said entry, but embracing three thousand nine hundred and seventy acres. The local description of the land is the same as in the entry, with the addition of the courses and distances of the lines constituting the exterior boundary, the different kinds and position of timber trees adopted as the corners, and the crossings of water courses intersected by some of the lines. This survey purports to have been made as to three hundred and eighty acres, by virtue of part of a warrant of one thousand acres, No. 18,216, and as to three thousand five hundred and ninety acres, by virtue of a warrant of three thousand five hundred and ninety acres, No. 17,826.

On the 4th of May 1850, Paul McNeel entered with the same surveyor two thousand acres of land on both sides of the Big Spring fork of Elk river, to include all the vacant land between a tract known as 311 the "Sherwood and Pennell land," also as "lot No. 7;" which was believed to corner on a crooked sugar tree, near the old Augusta county line, lands of Samuel V. Gatewood, particularly the old place patented to Jacob Warwick, the land purchased of Rowland, known by the names of "Cherry-tree hollow" and "Tallow knob," an entry made by William Skeen on the 29th of April, an entry made by William H. Floyd of the same date, a survey made for William Sharp on the 22d April, a survey made for John Hanna, David Hanna and Henry Buzzard on the 23d of April, and a survey made for David Gibson on the 24th of April, all of the same year.

On the 22d of January 1851, McNeel made a survey upon his said entry, embracing within its lines one thousand four hundred and fifty acres only.

On the 2d of March 1851, McNeel filed a caveat in the Circuit court of Pocahontas, against the issuing of a grant to Herold upon his said survey, upon the ground of better right in himself to one thousand two hundred acres of the land embraced in Herold's survey, under and by virtue of his entry of two thousand acres, and his survey thereon of one thousand four hundred and fifty acres. The caveat also assigns in detail, the various grounds upon which the caveator claimed to have better right to the said one thousand two hundred acres, all impeaching the regularity and validity on Herold's survey.

In September 1852, the parties came to trial, and a jury was impaneled for the finding of the facts. They found the entry and survey of Herold, setting them out in their finding in hæc verba. They also found an entry made by him on the 7th of August 1850 (after his survey and after McNeel's entry), of nine hundred and seventy acres of land, calling to begin at Adams' corner on the top of Elk mountain, and running with his line to Mathews' survey, and to *embrace all the land between said line and his own survey, adjoining the land of Porter and others. They also found McNeel's entry, setting it out in hæc verba; and they found that he had made a survey upon his said entry; but they do not set out this survey or otherwise describe it than as embraced within the lines shaded pale red on the plat accompanying the surveyor's report made in the cause. They also found "that the defendant's survey was made in conformity with his entry; and that said entry and survey are correctly represented by the lines" shaded green on the surveyor's plat.

The foregoing being all the facts found by the jury, and none appearing to have been agreed by the parties, the caveator moved the court to set aside the finding, because contrary to evidence, because it did not find all the material facts proved by him, and because those which were found were too uncertain and insufficient to authorize a judgment in favor of the caveatee. But the court overruled the motion; and the caveator excepted; setting out in his bill of exceptions the evidence given on both sides at the trial. This consisted of the entries and survey before mentioned of Herold, the entry and survey of McNeel, the deed referred to from Pannell to Herold and Hanna, a grant from the commonwealth to Joseph Pennell for five thousand acres of land, an act of assembly annexing a portion of the county of Augusta to the county of Monongalia, together with parol testimony as to the locality and boundaries of the land granted to Pennell, and of that portion conveyed to Herold and Hanna, and as to the locality of the lands claimed by Moffett, Gibson and others, called for in the entries of Herold and McNeel respectively. The court then proceeding to pronounce on the facts found by the jury, gave judgment in favor of the caveatee; and the caveator obtained an appeal to this court.

313 *Reynolds and Price, for the appellant.
Smith and Caperton, for the appellee.

LEE, J. This is a caveat from the Circuit court of Pocahontas county, under the provisions of the statute in relation to the mode of acquiring title to waste and unappropriated lands within this commonwealth, originally introduced into our system by the act of May 1779, ch. 13, entitled "An act for establishing a land office, and ascertaining the terms and manner of granting waste and unappropriated lands." Neither party has the legal title, but it is a contest of equities, both claiming under entries made with the surveyor of Pocahontas. The entry of the caveatee was made on the 23d of July 1849, that of the caveator was made on the 4th of May 1850. The caveatee, it appears made a second entry for nine hundred and seventy acres of land, under which also he claims; but this was not made until the 2d of August 1850, after he had made a survey upon his first entry, and after the caveator had made his entry. Each party has made a survey conforming, as he claims, to his entry, and as they are found to conflict, the question is, which has the better right? Thus the validity of the respective entries is directly and necessarily involved, and each party has in turn assailed the validity of the entry of the other.

To constitute a valid entry, there must be a reasonable degree of certainty and precision in the description which it gives of the subject intended to be appropriated. In the case of a grant, if the description be such that when verified by the proofs of what is found on the ground, the land can be identified, it is sufficient, and the grant can be maintained: but more is required in the case of an entry. It is not sufficient that the land can be identified by means of 314 the proofs of the land-marks called for, which the private knowledge *of the claimant can supply; but the entry must be made with that degree of certainty and specialty that a subsequent locator may be enabled, by the exercise of due care and reasonable diligence, to appropriate the adjacent residuum. The objects which it calls for must possess that notoriety in themselves, or must be so particularly described, that others, by using such care and diligence, may readily find them. These principles have been repeatedly illustrated in the numerous cases which have been decided by the courts, involving their discussion. Of these I will content myself with referring to the following: Hunter v. Hall, 1 Call 206; Currie v. Martin, 3 Call 28; Miller v. Page, 6 Call 28; Moore v. Whitledge, Hardin's R. 89; Smith v. Smith, Ib. 190; Buckner v. Feagins, 2 Bibb's R. 138; Davis v. Davis, 2 Bibb's R. 134; Bodley v. Taylor, 5 Cranch's R. 191; Finley v. Williams, 9 Cranch's R. 164; Watts v. Lindsey's heirs, 7 Wheat. R. 158; Johnson v. Pannel's heirs, 2 Wheat. R. 206; Matson v. Hord, 1 Wheat. R. 130; McArthur v. Browder, 4 Wheat. R. 438; Littlepage v. Fowler, 11 Wheat. R. 215; Garnett v. Jenkins, 8 Peters' R. 75; Key v. Matson, Hardin's R. 70.

Entries in Virginia and Kentucky, made for the purpose of acquiring title to waste and unappropriated lands, in the mode prescribed by law, usually first refer to some prominent and notorious object which serves to direct attention to the particular neighborhood in which the land is situate, and then call for some particular object or objects which shall describe it with precision. The former has been termed the "general" or "descriptive" call, the latter the "particular" or "locative" call of the entry. Both must possess that reasonable degree of certainty which will put a subsequent adventurer duly upon his guard, and the locative calls must be found to be within the limits embraced by the descriptive calls, and they should *properly be consistent with the latter and with one another: Johnson v. Pannel's heirs, 2 Wheat. R. 206; McDowell v. Peyton, 10 Wheat. R. 454: Though, in certain cases, where all the calls in an entry cannot be satisfied, the court, for the purpose of sustaining it, will reject such as appear to be vague or repugnant, and hold to those appearing to be certain and consistent. Marshall v. Currie, 4 Cranch's R. 172; McIver's lessee v. Walker, 9 Cranch's R. 173; Massie v. Watts, 6 Cranch's R. 148; Shipp v. Miller's heirs, 2 Wheat. R. 316; Evans v. Manson, 1 Bibb's R. 4; Patterson v. Bradford, Hardin's R. 101; Bosworth v. Maxwell, Ibid. 205.

Where there are several distinct and independent calls in an entry, it is not required that all the objects thus called for should be known and recognized by the public, or that they should all be described with that specialty that a subsequent locator can readily find them; but it is necessary that some one or more of the leading calls should be thus known, or so described that other persons, with due care and proper diligence, may be led to ascertain their positions, and thus to distinguish the land appropriated from the adjacent residuum. Garnett v. Jenkins, 8 Peters' R. 75; McCrackin v. Steele, 1 Bibb's R. 46.

The objects sometimes called for are so connected with the general history or geography of the country, or its legislation, that they will be taken notice of by the courts and deemed of general notoriety, and sufficiently identified without further proof: Such are rivers used as public highways, or thoroughfares between different parts of the country, or which are referred to in general laws and designated as boundaries of the counties or other districts of country. Mountains and points on the same may possess this character. And an entry calling for such objects may be supported without proof of notoriety or identity. *Such was the entry in Watts v. Lindsey's heirs, 7 Wheat. R. 158. There the "Ohio river" and "Little Miami river" were regarded as sufficiently notorious and identified without further proof. So the notoriety of the "Lower Blue licks" was presumed. Hart v. Bodley, Hardin's R. 98. In Speed v. Severe, 2 Bibb's R. 131, "Salt river" was regarded as a stream sufficiently notorious to be taken notice of without proof of its course or locality. So of "Licking river," Bowman v. Melton, Ibid. 151. So the "Blue licks," from their connection with the general history of the country were deemed notorious, and sufficiently identified without further proof. McKee v. Bodley, Ibid. 481. So of the "Kentucky river," Winslow v. Holders' heirs, 2 Litt. R. 34.

In other cases, the objects called for possess but a local notoriety or furnish a description of the land which must be verified and applied by means of facts to be ascertained on the spot; and the party affirming the validity of the entry in such a case must make out in proof the necessary facts to show the identity of the land intended to be appropriated, and that the calls which it contains are such that the subsequent locator, in the exercise of proper judgment and reasonable diligence, would be enabled to distinguish it from the lands surrounding, so as to appropriate for himself the adjacent residuum.

The entries of the respective parties in this case are of the class just described; and to maintain their validity, it should be shown that there were such objects to be found as are called for, that their relative positions were such as to mark out and identify the land intended to be entered, and that they or some of them were so well known in the neighborhood as to furnish such a precise and certain description of the land that it could be found by strangers using reasonable diligence and making proper enquiry. But upon examining 317 *the meagre finding of the jury, it will be seen that it is entirely silent upon these most material subjects. It nowhere finds that there are streams known as the "Big Spring fork" and "Slaty fork" of Elk river; or what is the particular or general course of either. It does not find that there is any tract of land known as "Lot No. 7," or as the "Sherwood and Pennell land," its situation and boundaries. It does not find there were such lands claimed by Gatewood, as those referred to and described in the entries, nor any such as are said to be claimed by Moffett, Gibson and others, nor that there were such entries or surveys as those referred to; nor does it ascertain the land said to be embraced in the deed to Herold and David Hanna, nor that there was such a deed either in fact or by general reputation; nor does it ascertain the positions of any of the objects called for. In short, it wholly fails to find the material facts upon which, and upon which alone, the court could safely undertake to pronounce that either entry had been made with the necessary certainty and precision.

No aid is derived from the finding that the entry and survey of Herold are correctly represented by the lines shaded green on the plat of the surveyor, and that those of McNeel are described by the lines shaded light red. The validity of the plat and report of the surveyors is not ascertained, nor are the objects intended to be represented on the plat found as part of the facts of the case. Nor indeed could they have been so found by reference to the plat, because the lands represented are laid down according to the pretensions of the parties respectively; and the plat is only referred to in the finding for the purpose of exhibiting the exterior boundaries of the surveys. Nor is the defect cured as to the entry of Herold by the finding that his survey was made in conformity with his entry; because, as we have seen, an entry 318 might well *be susceptible of identification by means of a survey made by the party himself, and yet its calls might lack that certainty and precision which would be required to render it valid as against a subsequent locator. And moreover, whether a survey does conform to an entry, is a matter to be determined by the court upon the facts found, and not to be disposed of in a summary way by the jury, as in the finding in this case.

Nothing is said in the finding of the jury as to the ownership of the warrants on which the respective entries were made; nor is it found in whose names they were issued. The numbers and quantities of land are the only items of description given. Yet a party who caveats must show a title to the warrant under which his own entry and survey were made, and if he fail to do so, his caveat will be dismissed. Currie v. Martin, 3 Call 28. In that case, it is true the entry of the caveator Martin was made by virtue of part of two warrants issued, one in the name of one McWilliams, and the other in the name of one Goodwin; and it was not proven that they had ever been assigned to Martin. His caveat was accordingly dismissed. Whether upon a special finding of facts in a caveat case the court can infer that the caveator was the owner of the warrant under which the entry was made, where it does not appear in whose name it issued, and no other proof of ownership is offered except that the entry purports to have been made upon it, is a question not free from difficulty. In the view I take of this case, however, it is perhaps not necessary that it should be decided, and I therefore forbear the expression of any opinion upon it.

But there are still other objections to the finding of the jury. I think it is plainly obnoxious to the charge of repugnancy upon its face. Thus it finds that Herold's entry and survey are both correctly represented *by the lines shaded green on the plat of the surveyor; yet it ascertains that the entry is for three thousand acres, while the survey is for three thousand nine hundred and seventy acres, and thus that both quantities are embraced within and bounded by the same identical lines.

Again: The entry of Herold is dated on the 23d of July 1849, and purports to have been made by virtue of part of a warrant of three thousand five hundred and ninety acres, No. 17,826. The survey was made on the 27th of April 1850, and purports to be as to three hundred acres, by virtue of part of a warrant of one thousand acres, No. 18,216, and as to three thousand five hundred and ninety acres, by virtue of a warrant of three thousand five hundred and ninety acres, No. 17,826. But it also finds that the entry of the nine hundred and seventy acres, the excess in the quantity of the survey over the original entry of three thousand acres, was not made till the 7th of August 1850, upwards of three months after the survey of the three thousand nine hundred and seventy acres. Yet it finds that the caveatee's survey was made in conformity with his entry.

It will be found too, upon examining the evidence given on the trial, that the finding is in one and perhaps a very material particular, not to be reconciled with it. Herold's entry, as we have seen, purports to be for the same land embraced in the deed from Pennell, and thus in terms is confined to the land embraced within the boundaries of that deed. McNeel's entry calls to adjoin a tract of land known as the "Sherwood and Pennell land" or "Lot No. 7," and thus is confined to the land lying outside of the boundaries of that tract. The grant for this lot No. 7 of five thousand acres, and the deed for the three thousand acres of land referred to in Herold's entry, are given in evidence, and it distinctly appears 320 that the latter is part *and parcel of the former, being the northeastern portion thereof. Thus the entries are shown to call for wholly different lands, and there should be no conflict between them. Yet the finding of the jury ascertains that the entry of Herold embraces much the larger part of the land entered by McNeel, the interlock being from one thousand to one thousand two hundred acres in extent.

I deem it unnecessary to enquire whether the finding may not be obnoxious to criticism in other respects. I think it must be apparent that the facts which it ascertains were not sufficient to enable the court to render judgment safely and understandingly upon the merits of the case. The only alternatives were to dismiss the caveat or to set aside the finding and award a venire facias de novo. The court adopted the former; and in this, according to the modern and more liberal practice, I think it erred. As the caveator's case may be a good one, though certainly not made out by the facts found; and as the merits of the controversy could not be presented and adjudicated upon the finding of the jury, I think it would have been right to set it aside, and to give the parties an opportunity upon another trial, of presenting the real case between them for adjudication.

I am of opinion to reverse the judgment, to set aside the finding of the jury, and to remand the cause for a venire facias de novo.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Lee, J.

Judgment reversed, and venire de novo awarded.

*Husband and Wife—Witnesses—Competency.—In Warwick v. Warwick, 31 Gratt. 77, and note, it is held that a husband is not a competent witness to prove scribing witness to a deed executed during the marriage, by which real estate is conveyed to his wife, either for the purpose of proving the due execution of the deed when called in question, or for the purpose of having it admitted to record.

2. Deeds—Invalid Recordation—Effect as to Creditors.†
—A deed admitted to record upon proof by the subscribing witnesses one of whom was the husband of the grantee, is null and void as to creditors; not having been duly recorded.

This was an action of ejectment in the Circuit court of Ohio county, in which the lessees of James C. Johnston and Sophia his wife were plaintiffs, and Thomas Slater and John T. Churchill were defendants. The facts are stated by Judge Samuels in his opinion. The parties dispensed with a jury, and submitted the case to the decision of the court. There was a judgment his payments of the debt made out of the trust fund of his wife and children, citing Johnston v. Slater, 11 Gratt. 321, 323; William and Mary College v. Powell, 12 Gratt. 372 (also citing the principal case); Stephoe v. Read, 19 Gratt. 1; Murphy v. Carter, 23 Gratt. 477; Hord v. Colbert, 28 Gratt. 49. The principal case is cited in Taliaferro v. Pryor, 12 Gratt. 289. See generally, monographic note on "Husband and Wife."

†Deeds—Recordation—Validity of.—In Herring v. Lee, 22 W. Va. 672, it is held that, if a record is interlined or erased by some unauthorized person, such alteration constitutes no part of the record and it may be assailed by parol testimony, this is not controverting the absolute verity of the record, but it is simply enquiring what really constitutes the record, and if this were not so a forged record could be imposed upon the court as genuine by a mere intruder or usurper, citing State v. Vest, 21 W. Va. 796; Blas v. Floyd, 7 Leigh 647; Rose v. Humely, 3 Cr. 268; Forbes v. Hyde, 31 Call 347; Turner v. Stip, 1 Wash. 319; Maxwell v. Light, 1 Call 117; *Dawson v. In Bowman v. Hicks, 80 Va. 809, it is said that had a paper witnessed by one witness alone been recorded by the clerk, such paper would not have been duly recorded, and would have given constructive notice to no one, citing Turner v. Stip, 1 Wash. 319; Johnston v. Slater, 11 Gratt. 321; Davis v. Beazley, 75 Va. 491.

In the case of In re Wynne, 30 Fed. Cas. 756, the principal case is cited as authority for the proposition, that registration is not necessary between the parties as a deed; and that it is not necessary as against volunteers or purchasers with notice.

In National Bank of Fredericksburg v. Conway, 17 Fed. Cas. 1204, it is held, that an interested person may take the acknowledgment of a deed when the act is merely ministerial; though if the act be judicial, such as taking the acknowledgment, after privy examination, of a married woman, an interested person cannot take it, citing Harkins v. Forsyth, 11 Leigh 294; Carper v. McDowell, 5 Gratt. 212; Horsley v. Garth, 3 Gratt. 471; Taliaferro v. Pryor, 12 Gratt. 277; Johnston v. Slater, 11 Gratt. 321; *Turner v. for the defendants; from which the plaintiffs obtained a supersedeas to this court.

Baxter and Bibb, for the appellants.

There was no counsel for the appellees.

SAMUELS, J. This cause is brought here by supersedeas to a judgment of the Circuit court of Ohio county, in favor of the defendants, in an action of ejectment, in which the plaintiffs counted on a joint demise by James C. Johnston and Sophia his wife, and on a separate demise by James C. Johnston: Slater and Churchill, on their motion, were admitted defendants.

The plaintiff and defendants respectively relied upon titles to the property in 322 controversy, derived from *Hampden Zane; and the case before the court must be decided by a comparison of those titles. That of the plaintiff is under a deed from Zane, dated April 1842, conveying to Sophia H. Johnston, one of the plaintiff's lessors, the subject in controversy, being a lot or piece of ground in the city of Wheeling in Ohio county. This deed was attested, and subsequently proved by William F. Peterson, W. W. Shriver and James C. Johnston, before the clerk of the County court of Ohio county, in his office, and recorded by him. The witness James C. Johnston, at the time of the attestation, and at the time of proving the deed, was the husband of the bargainee Sophia H. Johnston. The plaintiff's lessors, or either of them, at no time had actual possession of the lot conveyed.

The title of the defendants is derived under a deed from Hampden Zane, dated March 14th, 1844, by intermediate conveyances. By that deed he conveyed to William H. Churchill a large quantity of real property in trust to secure certain creditors certain sums of money due to them from the grantor. At the time of executing this conveyance, neither the trustee nor any of the creditors secured by the deed had any actual notice of the deed of April 1842 to Mrs. Johnston. The parties claiming the legal title derived by conveyances after the deed of March 14th, 1844, and embracing the property in that deed, are shown by the record to have had no actual notice.

In the argument here, the plaintiff's counsel make the question whether the lot conveyed in the deed of April 1842 is embraced by the deed of March 14th, 1844. The record shows that Hampden Zane derived title to all the property embraced by either deed, by devise from his father Noah Zane; and the deed of March 14th, 1844, declares that "it is understood that all the lands and tenements, rights and privileges 323 devised and bequeathed by said Noah Zane to said *Hampden Zane, are hereby conveyed and intended to be conveyed to said William H. Churchill," &c. This description embraces the lot in controversy.

The plaintiffs' counsel earnestly insist that the deed of April 1842 was duly recorded within the true intent and meaning of the registry acts; and that being prior in date, should be held to pass title to the lessor Sophia H. Johnston. The only objection to the registration of this deed is the fact that its execution was proved before the clerk by Johnston, the husband of the bargainee. Was he a witness within the meaning of the statute? The obvious reply is that the legislature must have intended that the witnesses to the deed should be competent to prove the transfer of property from the bargainor to the bargainee: that they should be competent, according to the general rules of evidence, to prove the very fact to which they testify. If Johnston can be held competent to prove the execution of a deed to his wife, it must be held that he would be competent to prove the execution of a deed to himself; from the intimate relation between husband and wife, and from the strong bias of feeling towards each other, the law has provided that neither shall be a witness in regard to any subject in which the other is interested. There are circumstances in which, from necessity or convenience, the evidence of a party himself may be heard; as for instance, to prove cause for postponing a trial, or to prove the loss of papers for the purpose of letting in secondary evidence of their contents; but there is, perhaps, no case in which the evidence of a party can be heard to prove in his own behalf his title to property. If the witness to this deed would have been disqualified by interest as a witness to a deed to himself, the interest of the wife and his own interest consequent thereon, would disqualify him as a witness to this deed. If we look to the consequences of the construction

324 contended for by *the appellants' counsel, we must see strong reasons why it should not prevail. A recorded deed is evidence of itself. Baker v. Preston, Gilm. 235; Pollard's heirs v. Lively, 4 Gratt. 73. By holding that an interested party may by his own oath aid in putting his deed on the record, and thereby absolve himself from the duty of offering further proof when the execution of the deed is thereafter drawn in question, or that thereby he may impose on others the burden of disproving the execution, is to give such party an undue advantage; such as neither the plain letter or the spirit of the statute requires or sanctions.

The cases above cited show a difference between our law of evidence and that of North Carolina, which requires at our hands a different decision from that rendered by the Supreme court of that state in the case of Jones' lessee v. Ruffin, 3 Dev. R. 404.

The plaintiff's counsel, in effect, if not in terms, argued further, that the registration of a deed has two several and distinct functions: 1. To give notice to purchasers. 2. To furnish evidence when the execution of the deed shall be drawn in question. That the first of these functions will be effectually performed, whatever may be the proof upon which the registration was made; that the defect in the proof of execution may be supplied at the trial when the deed is offered as evidence. This argument but carries out the case from North Carolina above cited, and that of McKinnon v. McLean, &c., 2 Dev. & Bat. Law R. 79, to their legitimate results. The argument cannot avail here, in view of our statute and the decisions under it. It is clearly within the scope of the legislative power to declare what shall be essential to making a valid deed between the parties to it, and as against third parties. In the exercise of this power, it has been declared that certain things shall be essential to all deeds; that registration is not necessary be-

325 tween *the parties to a deed; that it is not necessary as against volunteers or purchasers with notice: but it has further declared that a deed shall be void as against purchasers for value without notice, unless recorded upon authentication in one of the modes prescribed. One of these modes is proof by three witnesses, which was attempted in this case. As against such parties registration is equally essential with signing, sealing, delivery, or any other thing required to give validity to the deed. Carter v. Champion, 8 Conn. R. 549.

By holding a deed irregularly registered to be a valid instrument of notice, and that by proving its execution on any trial in which it may be drawn in question, it shall have the effect of a deed, the statute is effectually repealed. There can be no purchaser without notice of such deed. The statute is found, 1 Rev. Code, p. 361-2, § 1, 4; the cases are Turner v. Stip, 1 Wash. 319; Currie v. Donald, 2 Wash. 58; Dawson v. Thruston & als., 2 Hen. & Munf. 132; Manns v. Givens, 7 Leigh 689; Pollard's heirs v. Lively, 2 Gratt. 216; Hodgson v. Butts, 3 Cranch's R. 140.

Adhering to what I regard as the meaning of the statute, and following the cases in this court, I am of opinion that the deed of April 1842 cannot be regarded as a recorded deed.

The record shows distinctly that the parties holding the title and claiming under the deed of March 14th, 1844, had no other notice of the deed of April 1842 than such as might be implied from the registration of that deed; and this registration I have shown was void by the terms of the statute.

The plaintiff's counsel further argued that the parties claiming under the deed of March 14th, 1844, were not purchasers at all; or at least were not purchasers for value. It is well settled that a creditor taking a deed of trust on real estate to secure his debt, is a purchaser

326 *within the purview of the law. Beverley v. Brooke, 2 Leigh 425; Tate v. Liggatt, Id. 84.

That the creditors secured by the deed of March 1844 were purchasers for value, is shown by the fact that their bona fide debts thereby secured amounted in the aggregate to about ten thousand dollars.

The deed of April 1842 having no effect as a recorded deed, the parties to the subsequent deed of March 14th, 1844, at the time it was executed, having no notice of the first, and the parties now holding the legal title derived by intermediate conveyances from the deed of March 14th, 1844, having acquired that title by purchase for value without notice, their title is doubly secured by their own purchase and that of the bargainees in the deed of March 14th, 1844.

I am of opinion to affirm the judgment.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Samuels, J.

Where there is a joint purchase of land by two, to whom it is conveyed, and who give their bond for the purchase money; in the absence of proof of any agreement between them to the contrary, they are entitled to the land in equal proportions.

2. Same—Same—Same—Case at Bar.—One of the purchasers having previously made a conditional contract for the purchase of the land, agreed in writing with the other, that if the contract was completed this other should have a specified part of the land; but the contract was not completed. This agreement between the purchasers was then at an end, and cannot affect their rights under their joint purchase.

3. Same—Same—Same—Parol Evidence.—In such case of a joint purchase parol evidence is not admissible to prove an agreement between them for an unequal division of the land.

4. Same—Same—Partition.†—In such a case the purchaser claiming to be entitled under an agreement between them, to the largest portion of the land, files a bill for a specific performance of the agreement, and for partition accordingly: Though he fails in this, the court may go on to make a partition according to the legal rights of the parties.

By an agreement under their hands and seals, between James McDowell of Rockbridge and Barnabas Johnson, bearing date the 8th day of September 1849, McDowell contracted to sell to Johnson a tract of land containing about eight hundred acres, lying in the county of Monroe, upon the Greenbrier river and Wolf creek, for the sum of nine thousand dollars; to be paid one-third by the 10th of October 1849, and the balance in two equal annual pay-†Chancery Practice—Partition.—In Royston v. Miller, 76 Fed. Rep. 58, the court, citing among others the principal case, says: "In cases of equitable titles in suits for the partition of lands, it seems now to be the settled practice for courts of equity to take jurisdiction of the whole matter or grant full relief." ments, with interest from this last date. But it was provided that this agreement should not be absolute and conclusive upon either of them before the 1st of October 1849; up to which time each of them should have the right to *withdraw from it, by giving to the other a written notice to that effect. But if McDowell withdrew from it because some higher price was offered him for the land than that contracted to be given, he should in that case first offer the refusal of it to Johnson, before he should have the right to sell to any other person.

On the 26th of September 1849 an agreement, also under the seals of the parties, was entered into between Barnabas Johnson and James Jarrett, by which they agreed to divide the land that Johnson had conditionally purchased of McDowell. If Johnson should get the land, Jarrett was to have the river end of the land; the dividing line to be the middle of the turnpike commencing at the river near to Newman's canal landing opposite the turn of the turnpike; thence with the turnpike through the land; and he was to pay his proportion of the purchase money according to the number of acres he should get.

Within the time prescribed in the agreement between McDowell and Johnson, McDowell declined to execute the contract, and gave notice thereof to Johnson; and he was not induced to this course by the offer of a better price for the land by any other person. Having declined to execute the contract with Johnson, McDowell, on the 15th of October 1849, executed a power of attorney, whereby he authorized Robert J. Taylor to investigate and settle, as he might think just, a certain claim or obligation in writing which James Jarrett alleged that he held upon McDowell for the sale to him, upon specified terms and conditions, of his land in Monroe county, on Greenbrier river and Wolf creek. And he also authorized his said attorney to enter into a written contract with said Jarrett, or with any other person, for the full and complete sale to him, or any of them, of the said land; upon certain terms as to the purchase money, which was not to be less than nine thousand *five hundred dollars. Taylor states, That in October 1849 he carried a letter from McDowell to Jarrett, and told him that the land was up again for sale, and made to him a proposition for the sale of it to him; but he declined making any offer until Taylor had seen or was done with Mr. Johnson. That he went to see Johnson and made him several propositions; but he declined all the offers made to him. That the next day Jarrett, Johnson and himself all met on the land. Johnson was asked if he was done, and declared he had gone as far as he could go, in the conditional purchase he had made of McDowell. That several propositions then passed between Taylor and Jarrett, all of which were declined, and Jarrett said he was off. Jarrett and Johnson then held a private conference between them; and after it was over Johnson came up to Taylor and said that he and Jarrett would take the land at nine thousand five hundred dollars. This proposition was accepted; and by an agreement bearing date the 20th day of October 1849, executed by the three, McDowell by his said attorney sold to Jarrett and Johnson the tract of land aforesaid for the sum of nine thousand five hundred dollars, for the deferred payments of which Jarrett and Johnson agreed to execute their bonds. And by deed bearing date the 5th of November 1849, McDowell conveyed the land to Johnson and Jarrett.

Immediately upon the purchase of the land there was a controversy between Johnson and Jarrett as to how the land should be divided between them: Johnson insisted that Jarrett was to have only that part lying north of the turnpike road, which he was to have under the first agreement between them; and Jarrett insisted that he was entitled to one-half of the land. In July 1850 Johnson instituted a suit in the Circuit court of Greenbrier county against Jarrett for a partition of the land. In 330 his bill he set out his first *contract with McDowell and his agreement with Jarrett. And he stated that he proceeded to close his contract with McDowell through Taylor the agent of McDowell, by adding something to the price. That relying upon the agreement between himself and Jarrett, he took from McDowell a title bond binding him to convey the land jointly to Jarrett and himself. That he never dreamed of any other partition than that indicated by the article between Jarrett and himself; nor did Jarrett utter a syllable to show that he looked to any other arrangement. But that notwithstanding all this Jarrett had taken possession of and held a part of the land which, by the terms of the agreement, was to be allotted to the plaintiff. That McDowell had conveyed the land to Jarrett and the plaintiff; but that though Jarrett is thus vested with an undivided moiety of the land, he must be considered as the owner of only that part of the land which under their written agreement he was to have, and as to all over that he held it in trust for the plaintiff. He asks for a partition of the land according to the agreement, an account of the profits, and for general relief.

Jarrett answered the bill. He insisted that Johnson's conditional purchase of the land had been set aside. That afterwards McDowell had authorized Taylor to sell the land to the defendant or any other persons. That under this authority Taylor had sold to the plaintiff and defendant. He denied that the conditional contract between McDowell and Johnson had been carried into effect; or that the plaintiff made any purchase for himself; or that the agent of McDowell sold to him individually. He said that the plaintiff did not propose to purchase the land on his individual account; nor did he assert any right whatever to take the land for himself at the higher price demanded by McDowell. That the price of the land and terms of sale were adjusted by the agent of McDowell, the 331 *plaintiff and defendant; and that the purchase was a joint one in which the plaintiff and defendant had an equal interest, each entitled to a moiety. And he denied that there was anything in his language or conduct which could induce the plaintiff to suppose that he regarded the written agreement between himself and the plaintiff as in force, or as regulating in any manner whatever their interest in the land purchased by them.

In October 1851 the court made an order directing Commissioner Cary, among other things, to ascertain and report to the court what was the agreement between the plaintiff and defendant in regard to the purchase of the land in controversy, and especially the interest which each was to have in said land. And the parties were directed to appear before the commissioner and answer upon oath such interrogatories as the commissioner should propound touching the question in controversy.

In November 1851 the plaintiff filed an amended and supplemental bill, in which he charged, that at the time the plaintiff and defendant were making the purchase of the land from Taylor, they held a conference, in which the defendant desired to have more land than he was to have under the agreement of the 26th of September 1849; he desired to run up to a ditch. That the plaintiff positively dissented from the proposition or to vary the said agreement in any way so as to let the defendant cross the turnpike. That with this understanding the parties went into the contract. That the plaintiff believed that he was to have the benefit of that agreement, or he would not have engaged in the purchase. That the defendant left plaintiff so to understand; and he charges that if the defendant designed at the time to set up a claim to an equal moiety of the land, he suppressed and concealed his design, and 332 *was thereby guilty of a fraud, *knowing as he did, that the plaintiff understood him differently.

Jarrett answered, admitting the conference, but denying explicitly that he made the proposition as stated in the amended bill, or that he finally assented to the alleged dissent of the plaintiff; or that they went into the contract with the understanding that the land was to be divided by the turnpike as prescribed in the agreement aforesaid. He denied that he had said or done anything to excite any such belief or expectation on the part of the plaintiff; and alleged that on the contrary his language was explicit, and could have had no other effect than to lead the plaintiff to a directly opposite conclusion. That it was not true that he committed a fraud upon the plaintiff by suppressing his design to assert his claim to an equal moiety of the land; but that he distinctly informed the plaintiff that he would have half the land; and he stated to the plaintiff at their conference that the agreement aforesaid was no longer binding upon them; and that they ought to agree upon a division of the land and reduce their agreement to writing. And he told the plaintiff expressly that if the defendant bound himself for the whole of the purchase money he would have half of the land.

The parties were examined on oath by the commissioner, but their statements differed as widely as did their allegations in the bill and answer. There were also many witnesses examined by both parties, among whom was the agent Taylor, whose statement is hereinbefore given. The commissioner reported that he was unable to state what was the agreement between the parties as to the division of the land; and referred the question to the court; and returned with his report the evidence which had been taken before him.

It is impossible to state the evidence bearing on the question whether there 333 was an agreement between *Johnson and Jarrett at the time of their purchase of the land, as to how it should be divided between them. The only fact that is certain is, that from the moment of the sale they disputed as to how the land should be divided; Johnson insisting that Jarrett should be limited to the land north of the turnpike road, which he was to have had under their agreement of September 26th, 1849, and Jarrett insisting that he was entitled to more land. The nature of the evidence is referred to by Judge Moncure in his opinion.

The cause came on to be heard in May 1852, when the Circuit court sustained the pretensions of the plaintiff, and directed an enquiry to ascertain the portion of the purchase money which each should have paid. And from this decree Jarrett applied to this court for an appeal, which was allowed.

William Smith and Fry, for the appellant.

Price and Caperton, for the appellee.

MONCURE, J. Johnson and Jarrett contracted jointly for the purchase of the land in controversy. It was conveyed to them jointly, and they executed their joint and several bonds for the purchase money. They are, therefore, entitled to the land in equal proportions, unless it can be shown that their relative rights have been changed by some valid agreement or other transaction between them. It is contended, in behalf of the appellee Johnson, that they have been so changed. And

First. It is contended that the agreement of the 26th of September 1849 is still in force, and that the land should be divided accordingly. That agreement depended entirely upon the contract between McDowell and Johnson of the 8th of September 1849. By the express terms of that contract it was not to be absolute and conclusive upon either of the contracting

right to withdraw from it, by giving the other a written notice to that effect. McDowell did withdraw from it, and the contract was then at an end. It is true there was a stipulation in it, that if McDowell should withdraw because of some higher price being offered to him for the land, he should in that case offer the refusal of it to Johnson before he should have the right to sell it to any other person. But it is not pretended that he withdrew from the contract for that cause. The said agreement, being dependent on the said contract, ceased to have any effect when the latter ceased to have effect; which was on or before the first of October 1849. After that day, McDowell was at liberty to sell the land without being affected by the contract; and Johnson and Jarrett were at liberty to purchase it, jointly or severally, without being affected by the agreement. Accordingly, on the 15th of October 1849, McDowell empowered Taylor to contract with Jarrett or any other person for the sale of the land. On the 19th of the same month Taylor, Johnson and Jarrett met upon the land; and Taylor endeavored to effect a sale, first to one and then to the other. After several propositions had been made, each declined to purchase. They then held a private conference and concluded to purchase jointly at the price of nine thousand five hundred dollars, being five hundred dollars more than the price which had been stipulated for in the said conditional contract between Johnson and McDowell, and on the next day the joint contract was executed. If Johnson or Jarrett had severally purchased the land, the one so purchasing would have been entitled to the whole in exclusion of the other. Having purchased it jointly, they are entitled to it equally; notwithstanding the agreement of the 26th of September 1849. But

Secondly. It is contended that even 335 if that agreement, proprio vigore*, be not still in force, yet Johnson and Jarrett made the joint purchase with an express or tacit understanding that the land should be divided in the manner and on the terms prescribed by the said agreement; and that this understanding, though by parol, is binding on the parties.

If there had been such an understanding, I think it would have been void by the statute of frauds and perjuries. Henderson v. Hudson, 1 Munf. 510; Parker's heirs v. Bodley, 4 Bibb's R. 102; Davis v. Symonds, 1 Cox's Cas. 402. There is a well settled distinction, in regard to the admission of parol evidence, between seeking, and resisting, the specific performance of an agreement. A suit for specific performance is addressed to the sound discretion of the court, upon all the circumstances. And any evidence which shows that it would be inequitable to enforce the agreement as stated in the bill, is admissible as matter of defence. As was well said in the case of Osborn v. Phelps, 19 Conn. R. 63, 73, "It was not the object of the statute to give any greater efficacy to written contracts for the sale of lands than they possessed at the common law; but merely to require such contracts to be made in writing, in order to lay the foundation of a suit at law or in equity." Or, as Lord Redesdale expresses the same idea in Clinan v. Cooke, 1 Sch. & Lef. 39, "The statute does not say that a written agreement shall bind, but that an unwritten agreement shall not bind." When parol evidence is offered in resistance of a suit for specific performance, it does not contravene the statute; and though it may contravene the rule of law which forbids the introduction of parol evidence to vary a written agreement, it may sometimes be admissible on account of the peculiar nature of the suit. But when it is offered in support of such a suit, it generally contravenes the statute, and is rarely admissible. For the doctrine on this 336 subject I *need only refer to the case of Woollam v. Hearn, and the notes thereto appended in Hare & Wallace's edition of White & Tudor's Leading Cases in Equity, published in the Law Library, vol. 71, p. 540, 596. There are some exceptions to the general rule excluding parol evidence in support of a suit for specific performance, but it is unnecessary to enumerate them, as they do not embrace this case. The cases of Ross v. Norvell, 1 Wash. 14, and the Bank of the United States v. Carrington, 7 Leigh 566, cited by the counsel for the appellee, fall within the exceptions; the former being the case of an absolute deed intended to operate as a mortgage, and the latter a case of resulting trust. The case of Ambler & wife v. Norton, 4 Hen. & Munf. 23, also cited by the counsel, depended on the construction of the word "averment," in our statute concerning dower, and does not affect this case. This being a suit for specific performance, falling under the general rule, and not within any of the exceptions to it, parol evidence is therefore inadmissible to prove the agreement, or any part of it.

But suppose the evidence were admissible; does it prove that there was any such understanding between the parties? Jarrett, in his answer, positively denies that there was; and on the contrary avers that when the purchase was made he distinctly informed Johnson that he would have a moiety of the land. The evidence does not overthrow, nor contradict, but rather tends to sustain, the answer. No witness testifies to any such understanding. The evidence relied on to prove it consists entirely of mere repetition of oral statements; which kind of evidence, as has been well said, "is subject to much imperfection and mistake; the party himself either being misinformed, or not having clearly expressed his own meaning, or the witness having misunderstood him. It frequently happens also 337 that the witness, by unintentionally altering *a few of the expressions really used, gives an effect to the statement completely at variance with what the party actually did say." Greenl. on Evi. § 200. The remarks of Judge Fleming on the evidence in the case of Henderson v. Hudson, before cited, are strongly applicable to this case; and he concludes them by saying, "Such evidence as this (were the statute of frauds and perjuries out of the way) is in my mind too slight and feeble to deprive any one of his freehold and inheritance, or any part thereof." Three witnesses were introduced and relied on by Johnson to prove the alleged understanding, viz: Hinchman, Hines and Humphreys, not one of whom was present at the time of the joint purchase, and all of whom testify only to admissions said to have been made by Jarrett some time thereafter. On the other hand, three of the witnesses introduced by Jarrett, to wit, Ellis, Burdett, and Taylor the agent of McDowell, were present when the joint purchase was made, and heard nothing of any such understanding. Without reviewing the testimony of the different witnesses, suffice it to say, that on the most favorable view of the evidence which can be taken for Johnson, it shows that no agreement was ever made in regard to the division of the land between him and Jarrett, except the agreement of the 26th of September 1849, which expired by its terms as aforesaid; that they made the joint purchase without coming to any understanding about the division; Johnson insisting that Jarrett should have no more of the land than that agreement would have given him, and Jarrett insisting that he would have more, or a moiety of the land; and that their subsequent acts and declarations have been entirely consistent with this view of the manner in which they made the purchase. In this state of the case, whatever may have been the expectation of the parties, they must stand upon their legal rights under the 338 *joint purchase, and each is entitled to an undivided moiety of the land. Thirdly and lastly. It is contended that Johnson entered into the joint contract with the expectation that the land would be divided in the manner indicated by the agreement of the 26th of September 1849; and that Jarrett knew that fact, and did not inform Johnson of his intention to claim any more of the land than that agreement would have given him; which was a fraud on the part of Jarrett, who can take no advantage of it, but must make good the expectation of Johnson. The doctrine referred to in Roberts on Frauds 130, and Roberts on Conveyances 529, is relied on to support this position. But it is unnecessary to investigate this doctrine, or to enquire whether, if the facts were as stated in the proposition, Johnson would be entitled to the relief which he claims? Fraud is positively denied by the answer, and is wholly unsustained by the evidence. The only testimony tending in any way to prove it is that of Hinchman relating to some admissions said to have been made by Jarrett some time after the joint purchase; and this would be altogether too vague and indefinite to establish so grave a charge, even if it were undenied by the answer. The charge is improbable in itself, and inconsistent with the other testimony in the cause, as I have already sufficiently shown.

The views I have taken of this case render it unnecessary to express any opinion on the questions referred to in the argument, as to the propriety of allowing the amended bill to be filed, and of making the order of the 22d of October 1851, and of the proceedings under that order. Giving the appellee the full benefit of all these proceedings, my conclusion is that the decree is erroneous and ought to be reversed with costs; and the cause remanded, in order that there may be an equal division of the land 339 between the parties, and *that the payments respectively made by them of the purchase money, if unequal, and their receipt of the rents and profits, may be equalized. I had some doubt whether, as the bill only seeks the specific performance of an alleged agreement, and has not been sustained in that respect, it ought not to be dismissed with costs, without prejudice to another bill for the equal division of the land. That course was pursued by Sir William Grant in a somewhat similar case. Woollam v. Hearn, 1 Ves. jr. 211. But as the object of the parties is to have the land divided according to their rights, which can as well be done in this suit as another, it will be for the benefit of both of them to remand the cause for further proceedings, as before indicated. But at all events the costs occasioned by the assertion of the claim of the appellee to an unequal division of the land should be paid by him.

ners afterwards convey the whole tract to a grantee having full notice of the agreement. The land sold is but a small part either in quantity or value of one moiety of the tract. Held: That the grantee will be compelled to perform the agreement.

In the year 1836 John T. McKee and his sister, the wife of Andrew Bratton, of Bath county, owned jointly a tract of land in the county of Rockbridge, lying on Kerr's creek. On this land there was a large spring, the stream from which entered into Kerr's creek, making an acute angle with the creek, and this angle of land belonged to McKee and his sister, and constituted a part of the tract owned jointly by them.

Some years previous to the time stated, Andrew Walkup owned the land on Kerr's creek immediately below McKee's spring branch, and extending up to it, on which land he built a merchant mill and saw mill, which were propelled in part by water taken from the spring branch, and in part by water taken from Kerr's creek below the mouth of the spring branch. The dam across the spring branch seems to have been little if anything, more than a log placed in and across the stream. This land with the mills thereon were purchased by Samuel Barley; and in 1836, for the purpose of better getting the waters of Kerr's creek to his mill, he made a contract with John T. McKee, who acted for himself and Andrew Bratton and wife, though without their authority, by which McKee agreed to sell to Barley the triangle lying be- 341 tween Kerr's creek *and the spring branch commencing at the mouth of the branch, and running up on the branch to a point above the dam in the branch, and running up on the creek to a large rock, the whole being less than an acre; and it was agreed that Barley might take the water out of the creek above the rock, and carry it across the land sold to him into his dam across the spring branch, and thus into his mill race.

This agreement was contained in a deed bearing date the 2d day of December 1836, purporting to be by John T. McKee and Andrew Bratton and wife, but which was only executed by McKee, by which, in consideration of thirty dollars, they convey the piece of ground, with the privilege as aforesaid. This deed was attested by one witness, as to McKee's execution of it; and he gave to Barley a receipt of the same date for fifteen dollars as one-half of the purchase money.

By deed bearing date the 20th of May 1839, John T. McKee and wife and Andrew Bratton and his wife conveyed to Samuel W. McKee, the son of John T., the tract of land owned by them jointly on Kerr's creek, embracing in the conveyance the triangle

Va. 252, as authorizing the proposition that, if the purchaser can get substantially what he contracted for, the agreement will generally be enforced at the suit of the vendor. of land sold and conveyed by John T. McKee to Barley: But of the agreement with Barley, Samuel W. McKee had been informed at the time it was entered into. After this conveyance to Samuel W. McKee, differences arose between him and Barley as to the rights of the latter under his contract with John T. McKee. These differences referred to the questions how far above the rock on Kerr's creek which was a corner of the triangle sold, Barley might take the water out of the creek and carry it through McKee's land; and how high he was authorized to maintain his dam across the spring branch. These differences resulted in two actions of trespass brought by McKee against Barley in the Circuit court of Rockbridge, to 342 recover damages *for injuries done, as he alleged, by Barley to his land and to his spring. Barley then filed his bill in the same court, setting out his agreement with John T. McKee, and exhibiting his deed as marked A, insisting that he had not transcended his rights under the agreement; asking for a specific performance of that agreement by Samuel W. McKee, who had received his conveyance with notice of it; that his rights under it might be ascertained and adjudicated; and that the actions at law brought against him by McKee might be enjoined. To his bill he made John T. McKee, Samuel W. McKee and Bratton and wife parties, all of whom answered. Samuel W. McKee resisted the specific execution of the contract, on the ground that John T. McKee had no authority to act for Bratton and wife, and that they never assented to it, and because the terms of the agreement were uncertain. But his objection to the specific execution of the agreement arose principally from the extent of Barley's claims under it, and the injury which he insisted he would sustain if these claims were sustained. On this last subject an immense mass of testimony was filed in the cause: But when the cause came on finally to be heard, the court declined to determine upon the true construction of the agreement, or upon the injuries of which Samuel W. McKee complained. But leaving these subjects to be settled in the actions at law, the injunction was dissolved, and a decree was made for a specific execution of the agreement, and that Samuel W. McKee should execute to Barley a deed in all respects similar to that executed by John T. McKee, except that it should be with special warranty. From this decree McKee applied to this court for an appeal, which was allowed.

Michie, for the appellant.

343 *ALLEN, P. The only question presented for the consideration of the court by this appeal, is, whether the final decree directing the specific execution of the contract therein mentioned, by the appellant Samuel W. McKee, was correct. Other matters were put in issue by the pleadings, involving the construction of the contract and the privileges it was intended to confer; some proceedings were had which looked to a decision of these questions; and nearly all the testimony in the record relates to this branch of the controversy. When the case came on for final hearing, the court properly declined expressing an opinion on any part of the case made by the pleadings, except the right of the appellee Barley to a decree against the said Samuel, for a specific execution of the contract, so as to invest Barley with the legal title to the lot of land and the water privileges alleged to have been purchased by him from John T. McKee and Bratton and wife. All other questions of law and fact as to the effect of that legal title, the extent of the privileges conferred by it, and whether they had been abused, were left to the determination of a court of law with the aid of a jury, in the actions then pending, or which might be thereafter instituted.

It appears from the record that John T. McKee and his sister Mary Jane, the wife of Andrew Bratton, were seized as coparceners of a tract of land on Kerr's creek in Rockbridge county, containing two hundred and eighty-one acres. Bratton and wife resided in Bath county; John T. McKee seems to have resided on or near the land, and to have had it under his charge. From the answer of the appellant Samuel W. McKee, it appears that in the year 1835 he rented the land from his father, the said John, and Bratton and wife; that he took possession thereof in March 1835, and has remained in possession ever since; and that on the 20th of May 1839, his father 344 and Bratton *and wife conveyed the land to him in fee: And he files a copy of the deed with his answer.

Whilst the appellant thus held possession as tenant, the appellee, as appears from the answer of said appellant, made an abortive effort to obtain the privilege from him to raise his dam, and presented to him a deed which he had prepared for him to execute; alleging that John T. McKee had given to the appellant his moiety, and he would become the purchaser from Bratton and wife of the other moiety; but the appellant refused to negotiate with him on several grounds: one being that he had no title to the land. The appellee then said he would see John T. McKee on the subject, and left for that purpose: And in the after part of the same day, John T. McKee informed the appellant that he had signed an agreement for the sale of the small triangle, according to the provisions of the deed or agreement from John T. McKee to the appellee, referred to in the bill and answer as exhibit A. The deed was prepared to be executed by John T. McKee and Bratton and wife, but was signed by the former only; and taken in connection with a receipt given by John T. McKee to Barley of the 2d of December 1836, of the same date with the deed, for fifteen dollars, in part of the purchase money of a lot of land and other privileges bought of him and Bratton by the appellee, is evidence of a contract on the part of John T. McKee acting for himself and professing to act for Bratton and wife, to sell to Barley a small triangle between Kerr's creek and a spring branch, containing, as appears by the survey made in this cause, 151.80 perches, with certain privileges set forth in the deed; amongst the others, the privilege of turning the water out of the main channel of Kerr's creek by means of a dam or otherwise, above a rock (the corner on Kerr's creek), through a race to be cut through said lot.

345 *The authority of John T. McKee to act as the agent of Bratton and wife in this transaction, though averred in the bill, is denied in the answers, and is not proved. There is nothing, therefore, which would bind Bratton and wife to execute the contract. But it is clear as well from the deed of John T. McKee, which is valid as to him, though Bratton and wife did not execute it, and his receipt, as from the admissions in the answers of both the McKees, that the sale and purchase was not limited to John T. McKee's undivided moiety, but embraced the whole subject described in the deed. The deed itself, signed by John T. McKee, describes the land intended to be conveyed by metes and bounds; the receipt is for a part of the purchase money of the lot and other privileges sold to Barley; the answer of John T. McKee sets forth the negotiation as between himself alone and Barley, the execution of the deed A by him, and insists that Barley is entitled to nothing but what is provided for in the article: Thereby impliedly admitting that he is entitled by their contract to all the deed did profess to convey. This answer would not be evidence against the codefendants. But Samuel W. McKee in his answer, admits he was informed by his father on the day the contract was entered into, that he signed an agreement for the sale of this small triangle to Barley, and refers in his answer to the deed as showing the extent of Barley's rights. In fact, so far from controverting the right of the appellee as acquired by the contract, the appellant Samuel, in another part of his answer, states that if he had limited himself to the privileges granted thereby, he never would have complained. The lawless abuse of the privileges alleged to have been conferred by the contract, is the principal ground upon which he objects to the appellee's claim to relief. It is manifest that whether John T. McKee was or was not the authorized agent of Bratton

346 and wife, he undertook *to sell and did sell to the appellee the whole subject described in the deed of the 2d of December 1836; and he, and those claiming under him, with full notice of his contract, are bound to comply with it, if it can be done without injury to the rights of the coparcener. The answer of the appellant shows he was fully apprised of the negotiation and sale, and the terms thereof: and the evidence proves that the appellee took possession of the lot of land purchased by him, and made use of it in the mode contemplated when he purchased by opening a race through it.

It was said in Robinett v. Preston, 2 Rob. R. 277, that although a conveyance by one joint tenant of a part of the land might have no legal effect to the prejudice of the cotenant, yet it would be effectual to pass the interest of the grantor in the tract. And if upon partition, the share assigned of the cotenant did not include the part conveyed, the cotenant would get all he was entitled to, and the grantor could not deny his deed. If upon a partition that part of the land described in this deed or affected by the water privileges, had been assigned to John T. McKee, he would have been in a condition to have executed his contract, if he would not, in that event, have been estopped by his deed from disturbing his vendee; and his son claiming under his subsequent conveyance with full notice, can occupy no higher ground.

A court of equity, in making partition, would have respected the rights acquired by a fair purchaser, provided no injury was done thereby to the coparcener. In this case the interest sold was small in extent and of little value. The triangle containing less than an acre, and the whole interest conveyed was valued by the parties at thirty dollars. The coparcener could have had his full share allotted in the residue of the tract. As the conveyance of both the joint owners to the appellant Samuel 347 has invested him with the legal *title to the entire tract, he is now in a condition to perfect the title of the appellee, according to the terms of the contract, as evidenced by the deed of the 2d of December 1836, from John T. McKee, referred to as exhibit A. This is all the decree requires him to do, and I think it should be affirmed.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Allen, J.

Decree affirmed.

July Term, 1854, Lewisburg.

1. Deeds of Trust to Secure Creditors—Postponement of Sale—Effect.†—A deed of trust which among other things conveys growing crops of wheat, rye and oats, and which is not to be enforced for two years from its date, is not necessarily fraudulent as to creditors.

*For monographic note on Fraudulent and Voluntary Conveyances, see end of case.

†Deeds of Trust to Secure Creditors—Postponement of Sale—Effect.—For the proposition, that a deed of trust to secure creditors, which provides for the postponement of the sale for two years, is not necessarily fraudulent, the principal case is cited and followed in the following cases: Dance v. Seaman, 11 Gratt. 782; Sipe v. Earman, 26 Gratt. 567, 568, 569, and note; Brockenbrough v. Brockenbrough, 31

2. Same—Assent of Creditors.—Though the deed be executed without the knowledge of the creditors secured by it, yet if when informed of its execution they assent to it, it is valid.

3. Chancery Jurisdiction over Discretionary Trusts.—A court of equity will not, in general, assume the exercise of a discretionary power vested in a trustee, nor interfere to control a trustee acting bona fide in the exercise of his discretion. Nor will a suit be entertained to compel a trustee to exercise his power.

In Livesay v. Beard, 22 W. Va. 590, the principal case is cited and the court seems to disapprove of the cases in Virginia which support the doctrine laid down in the principal case saying that the Virginia courts have gone far indeed to sustain deeds as valid, which in other states would be declared per se fraudulent.

In Klee v. Reltzenberger, 23 W. Va. 754, it is said: "The provision that the grantor shall retain the possession, use and enjoyment of the property, until the sale provided for is made, would, if the property were perishable or could be used only by consuming it, make the conveyance, at least, prima facie fraudulent. Gardner v. Johnston, 9 W. Va. 403; or if it consisted of a stock of goods or merchandise kept in a store for sale, such a provision would make the deed fraudulent per se. Lang v. Lee, 3 Rand. 431; Garden v. Bodwing, 9 W. Va. 121; Claffin v. Foley, 22 Id. 434. But when the property is not of such character, and if of the kind conveyed in this deed, such a provision is not even a badge of fraud, unless made so by other provisions or the surrounding circumstances. Skipwith v. Cunningham, 8 Leigh 271; Janney v. Barnes, 11 Id. 100; Cochran v. Paris, 11 Gratt. 348."

§Equitable Conversion—Discretionary Power.—In Woodward v. Woodward, 28 W. Va. 206, it is said: "Where a will directs land to be sold at the discretion of trustees or executors, or upon the happening of a contingency, an equitable conversion takes place at the time of the sale or the happening of the contingency. Where in such case, though the will gives over to him or his assigns annually the interest accruing thereon. But if his executors should judge from proper information of his son's habits and steadiness, that it would be prudent to entrust him with the full management of the funds intended for his benefit, they are directed to turn over the whole into his hands. And by a codicil he gives the executors the same discretion over the interest of the fund as they had by the will over the principal. The executors having declared their judgment that the son had reformed and might be entrusted with the control of the fund, a court of equity will in such a case compel the executors to perform the trust by delivering over the fund to the son. And before it is done the son has such an interest in the fund that upon taking the oath of an insolvent debtor, it will vest in the sheriff, and the creditor may subject it to the payment of his debt.

John Paris, late of the county of Augusta, died in 1839, having first made his will, which was duly admitted to probat. By his will he directed his executors to sell all his property, real and personal, except a few articles of household furniture, which he gave to his sister Hannah Paris: And out of the proceeds he directed them to pay to his said sister two hundred dollars on account of her portion in her father's estate, for which she had a claim upon him.

349 *And he further gave her the sum of three hundred dollars, which he directed his executors to loan out and pay her the interest; or if they should think it better for her to have the control of the principal, they were directed to place it at her disposal.

All the balance of the proceeds of his estate he directed his executors to lend out upon real security, for the benefit of his son John; and to pay over to him or his assigns annually the interest accruing thereon. But if his executors should judge from proper information of his son's habits and steadiness, that it would be prudent to entrust him with the full management of the funds intended for his benefit, then he directed that they should turn over the whole into his hands. And he appointed Nicholas C. Kinney and Littleton Waddell executors, and also trustees to execute the provisions of his will in favor of his sister and son.

By a codicil the testator directed that his executors and trustees should have the same discretion over the interest of the fund the executors a discretion as to the time of selling the land and directs the money arising from the sale to be paid to particular persons, the interest of the legatee in the proceeds of the land is a vested one. The principle will be the same, whether the estate devised to be sold, be an estate in possession or only in remainder. (Tazewell v. Smith, 1 Rand. 313; Washington v. Abraham, 6 Gratt. 66; Cochran v. Paris, 11 Gratt. 348.) And it seems to me, in such case, it is immaterial whether the estate in the lands was vested or contingent, if the conversion authorized by the will is actually made. In such case the estate will also be vested, unless the will shows that it was not so intended. (Hinton v. Milburn, 23 W. Va. 171. Corbin v. Mills, 19 Gratt. 438, 472.)" he had given to his son, as they had by the will over the principal. Both the will and codicil were dated on the 27th of October 1838.

At the time this will was made John Paris, jr. had left home and was living in Louisiana. He was about nineteen years old, and had evinced a disposition to drinking, gaming and extravagance. He returned home a few months before his father's death, apparently reformed in his habits, and soon after married.

In November 1839 John Paris exhibited his bill in the Circuit court of Augusta against the executors and trustees Kinney and Waddell, in which he set out the provisions of his father's will; and stated that the executors were about to sell all the property of the testator. He refers to his previous habits, and expresses the hope that he has amended them. He says he does not 350 wish the substantial provisions of the will *changed until he shall have conformed rigidly to all the provisions imposed by the wishes of his father; but that his inclinations and interest both prompt him to retain the farm on which his father lived in kind rather than to have it sold. And he prays that he may be allowed to elect to keep the land and personal property in lieu of the proceeds of it; that the executors may be directed not to sell it, but to hold it subject to the trusts of the will; permitting him to enjoy the profits of the property instead of the proceeds of the sale; and for general relief.

The executors answered the bill. After stating that they sold personal property enough to pay the legacy to the sister of the testator, and expressing the hope that the amendment in the conduct of the plaintiff may be permanent, they say they have no wish to thwart his views and wishes, or to exert any control in the management of his property; and are perfectly willing, if it can be done with safety to them, that the court shall permit him to elect to hold the land; and they submit the subject to the court.

The cause coming on to be heard upon the bill, the answer and the will of John Paris, the court was of opinion, that, taking into consideration the object of the testator, the reformation evinced by the son, and the future welfare of that son, it was highly expedient that he should, for the present at least, be indulged in his election to hold the land and personal property (except so far as might be necessary for the payment of debts,) in kind: But that he should still hold it subject to the trust declared by the will, and subject to the power of the court to withdraw that indulgence, if, at any future day, such may seem to the court expedient; unless at some future day the court, with the assent of the executors, should deem it expedient to terminate the trust and invest him with 351 the absolute legal estate. And it was decreed that the executors *forbear, until the further order of the court, to sell the real and personal estate in the bill and answer mentioned, except for the payment of debts and legacies.

By deed bearing date the 30th of May 1842, and admitted to record on the same day, John Paris conveyed to Jacob K. Stribling all the interest of Paris in twenty-one acres of land which descended to his wife as one of the heirs of her father, that being his interest as tenant by the curtesy, three horses, one cow, two ploughs, one wheat screen, one bed, bedstead and furniture, plates, dishes, knives and forks, candlestick and snuffers, together with all other household and kitchen furniture belonging to the grantor; also all the crops of grain, including wheat, rye, corn and oats then growing on the land whereon he lived; upon trust that Paris should be permitted to remain in possession of the property until the 30th of May 1844; and then if he made default in the payment of two debts thereby intended to be secured, one due to Hannah Paris for three hundred and fifteen dollars and fifty-two cents, and the other to David Fultz for seventy-five dollars, that upon the request of either of said creditors, the trustee should sell and pay said debts.

The Circuit court of Augusta county commenced its session on the 1st of June, and at that term of the court John Cochran as assignee of Matthew Blair, recovered a judgment upon a single bill against John Paris for three hundred and eighty-nine dollars and thirty-four cents, with interest from March 1841 until paid. Upon this judgment execution against the body of Paris was sued out, and being taken in custody, he took the benefit of the act for the relief of insolvent debtors, surrendering in his schedule only his equity of redemption in the property conveyed in the aforementioned deed of trust.

352 In September 1842 Cochran instituted a suit in *equity in the Circuit court of Augusta against Paris, the trustee and cestuis que trust in the deed, the executors and trustees in the will of John Paris, Blair and the sheriff. In his bill, after setting out the foregoing facts, he charged that the notes referred to in the deed were drawn in Staunton on the same day the deed was executed, in the absence certainly of Hannah Paris; that she was the aunt of Paris and lived in his family. That he was uninformed whether anything was due from John Paris to either Hannah Paris or Fultz, or whether they claimed under the deed. And he charged that the deed was executed to delay, hinder and defraud the creditors of Paris, and particularly the plaintiff. And he called upon John Paris, Hannah Paris and Fultz to say whether the two latter were consulted or apprised of the intention to make the deed of trust aforesaid.

The plaintiff further insisted that he was entitled to have the property bequeathed by John Paris, sen. for the benefit of his son, subjected to the payment of his debt. That the executors were willing to terminate the trust, being satisfied from the reformation of John Paris, jr. and his steadiness, that he was entitled under the will to the full control and management of the estate intended for his benefit. And he prayed that the deed of trust might be set aside as fraudulent and void as to creditors, and that the court would subject the property embraced in that deed, and also the interest of John Paris in the property bequeathed to him by his father, to satisfy the plaintiff's debt; and also for general relief.

John Paris, Hannah Paris and David Fultz answered the bill. John Paris denied that the deed of trust was intended to defraud his creditors. He stated the manner in which he became indebted to Hannah Paris, and the proofs sustained the answer.

He said he had borrowed the money from her and promised to secure *her by a deed of trust. That he could not say that Hannah Paris or Fultz knew of his intention to execute said deed of trust at the time it was done; but that on returning home he handed said Hannah his bond, and informed her that he had executed the trust deed to secure it, and that she at once elected to claim under the deed, received the bond, and expressed herself satisfied with the security: And that as soon as said Fultz heard of the deed he elected to claim under it. The answers of Hannah Paris and Fultz was to the same effect. John Paris further insisted that the trust of the will of his father still existed, and that the property bequeathed by his father was not liable to satisfy the plaintiff's debt.

The executors Kinney and Waddell were examined as witnesses. Kinney stated that the property bequeathed to John Paris by his father had been in his possession ever since the decree of the Circuit court, and had been enjoyed by him without the control of either of the trustees. So far as the witness was concerned as trustee, he had been willing, ever since the marriage of John Paris, to relinquish any control which the will gave him over the property as trustee, upon being indemnified against the debts and legacies due from the testator and under his will; as he considered that Paris had reformed, and believing that was the intention or wish of Paris' father. Waddell said that he exercised no control over any portion of the property since the decree of the Circuit court; and that he had been willing, after the payment of all debts and legacies due from the estate, to invest the defendant Paris with the full and legal title thereto. And he repeats, that his belief of the reformation of the habits of the said Paris, would at all times have induced him, so far as he was concerned, to put the full control and management of the estate of the testator into his hands.

*When the cause came on to be heard, the court directed a commissioner to sell the property embraced in the deed of the 30th of May 1842; and his report showed that the net proceeds of sale were one hundred and ninety dollars and ninety cents. The court also directed a commissioner to take an account of the crops conveyed in the deed; and he estimated them at eighty-three dollars and seventy-five cents. Of this sum the corn and oats were estimated at forty dollars; and the commissioner reports that a witness examined before him stated that Paris had horses enough to eat up all the corn and oats.

The cause came on to be finally heard in June 1848, when the court held that the trust deed was bona fide, and not made to delay, hinder and defraud creditors; and the proceeds of sale of the trust property was directed to be paid to the cestuis que trust. And the court further held that until the executors and trustees should, in their discretion, a discretion exclusively belonging to them, and not even controllable by the court, see cause, in the execution of the purely discretionary power conferred upon them, to invest John Paris with the legal title to, and power and control over the estate given by the will of his father, and thereby terminate the trust, the said John Paris could acquire no such interest or estate under said will as could be subjected by his creditors to the payment of their debts. And the bill was dismissed with costs. Whereupon Cochran applied to this court for an appeal, which was allowed.

Stuart and R. P. Kinney, for the appellees.

DANIEL, J. The decree of the Circuit court, in so far as it sustains the deed of trust of the 30th of May 1842, is, I think, correct. The fact that a deed of *trust embraces articles which must perish or be consumed in the use, before a sale of them can be made according to the terms of the deed, is not one which, of itself, necessarily shows the deed to have been made with a fraudulent design. The amount, in number or value of such articles, may be so inconsiderable, as compared with the main subjects of the trust, as to justify the conclusion that they were embraced through inattention of the parties to the inconsistency of providing a security out of property which, from its nature, would necessarily perish before it could be made available as a means of satisfying the trust. Or the deed may embrace other property, to the improvement, support or sustenance of which, such perishable property is essential; and in such last supposed case the fact that the perishable property is embraced in the deed, so far from being indicative of a fraudulent purpose, might rather serve to show an honest and a provident design and effort to make the main subjects of the trust a more certain and productive security. It would be but fair in such case to construe the deed in accordance with the probable design and motives of the parties, and to relieve it of any apparent inconsistency, by holding the provisions in regard to the continued possession, and the sale of the property, as intended to apply only to such of it as from its nature might reasonably be expected to be in existence at the day of sale.

The main objection to the deed is founded on the fact that it embraces growing crops of wheat, rye, corn and oats, which the bill alleges would be severed and consumed before the trustee would, under the provisions of the deed, be at liberty to execute the trust. It seems to me that it is a fair answer to this objection to say, that even if these crops were of such a nature that they could not be preserved till the day of sale, it would be harsh to construe the 356 provision of the deed *in relation to them as designed merely to cover them up from creditors; seeing that the deed also embraces a number of horses and a cow, to the sustenance of which they would not, according to the testimony, probably be more than adequate. Besides, we have no proof that these crops are of such a nature as necessarily to perish before the day of sale: On the contrary, common observation and experience prove that they may be preserved without material loss or deterioration, for a longer period.

There is, therefore, nothing on the face of the deed, to show that the property conveyed was not designed by the parties to be a substantial and bona fide security for the debts, to secure the payment of which it was made.

It remains to be considered whether the appellee Paris had, at the date of his surrender, on taking the oath of an insolvent debtor, any such interest under his father's will, in the property sought to be subjected to the payment of the appellant's demand, as can, in equity, be so subjected.

A court of equity will not, in general, assume the exercise of a discretionary power vested in a trustee, nor interfere to control the trustees acting bona fide in the exercise of their discretion. Nor will a suit be entertained to compel the trustees to exercise their power. And the refusal of a trustee to exercise a purely discretionary power is not a breach of trust for which he can be removed from office, although the trustee assigns no conclusive reason for the refusal, and the proposed act is apparently beneficial to the trust estate. Hill on Trustees 715.

Again: On page 725 of the same treatise, the author says, the fourth and last class of discretionary powers is where the discretion is to be exercised on matters of pure personal judgment. For instance, when the trustees are empowered to give 357 their opinion *on the good or ill conduct or merits of an individual; or to determine the propriety or impropriety of continuing the payment of an annuity; or to give their approbation to a settlement. The trustees alone are competent to exercise these powers, for they may have private and peculiar grounds for arriving at a proper conclusion, into which the court could not providentially enquire, and which the trustee might refuse to disclose. The exercise of such authorities cannot in general be assumed or even controlled by the court. If, however, a trustee is actuated by fraudulent or improper motives in exercising or refusing to exercise his discretionary powers, a court of equity, upon proof of the improper conduct, interposes its jurisdiction on a totally different principle—not for the purpose of exercising the discretion committed to the trustee, but to check or relieve from the consequences of an improper exercise of that discretion. Ibid. 716.

If the rights of John Paris the son had been left by the will of his father dependent on the mere will or discretion of the trustees, to be exercised or not as they might please, without reference to the conduct of the son; or if the trustees had never expressed themselves satisfied of his reformation; or on being called on to express their opinion as to his habits and steadiness, had either disclaimed doing so, or had said that from "proper information" they had formed the judgment that it would not be prudent to entrust him with the management of the estate intended for his benefit, it would have been difficult, in view of the foregoing authority, to find any ground on which the interference of a court of equity could have been justified. But I do not think that the will is to be so construed: And the course of the trustees has been exactly the reverse of that just supposed. The fifth clause of the will, after directing the funds arising from the sale of the property to be loaned out, and the interest to be paid

358 *over annually to the son, proceeds, "but should my executors judge, from proper information of my son's habits and steadiness, that it would be prudent to entrust him with the full management of the funds intended for his benefit, then it is my will that they turn over the whole into his hands." Let it be that the executors are the sole judges whether the conduct of the son has been such as to render it prudent that he should be invested with the estate, and that no court has a right to correct their judgment, however erroneous it might be, yet when their judgment is formed and announced, and is in favor of turning over the estate, does there not arise a duty on their part to do so? Whenever the trustees, in the exercise of their judgment and discretion, have arrived at the conclusion that it is prudent the son should have the property intended for his benefit, free from their control, the testator says, it is his will that he should so enjoy it. Is not any further holding by, or control over the property on the part of the trustees thenceforward in conflict with the mandatory language of the will? Suppose the will to have been in all respects, as it is, with the exception that the "turning over of the estate into the hands of the son" had been made dependent on the approval of his conduct by persons other than the executors, would not the executors, upon being certified of such approval, have been bound at once to invest him with the title? And are the rights of the son consequent on the approval of his conduct, modified by the fact that the persons who by the will are to judge of his conduct and those who upon the approval of it are to turn over the property to him, are the same? It seems to me whenever the son shows that his conduct has met with the approbation of the executors, he does all which the testator intended he should do in order to entitle him to the free and uncontrolled enjoyment of the bounty 359 intended *for him. This he has done.

In their answer to the bill filed by him, and in their depositions taken in this cause, the executors express themselves satisfied of his reformation; and in the latter they say that such is their conviction on the subject, that they would, at all times, since his marriage, have been willing to place the full control and management of the estate in his hands. Besides, they are parties to this suit, and have not denied the allegations of the bill. They have exercised their discretion and pronounced their judgment in the only matter which was left to their discretion. From the moment of their having done so the right or power in or over the estate intended for the testator's son remaining in them, call it by whatever name, became subject to the command, in the will, to turn it over to him free from their control. They thenceforward became trustees of an estate, to the full and unrestricted enjoyment of which another is beneficially entitled under the provisions of the instrument whence all their powers are derived.

The executors, in their answer to the bill filed by the appellee Paris, having admitted his reformation, he had, I think, a right to insist on a decree directing them to convey the legal title to the property held by them for his benefit. The decree which was rendered neither affirmed nor denied that right. It is true that the court then expressed the opinion, which it has carried out in the decree rendered in this cause, viz: that it was a matter resting entirely in the discretion of the executors (notwithstanding the reformation of Paris and their approval of his conduct), whether they would invest him with the legal title to the estate. Yet the decree went no further than to stay the sale of the property, except so far as might be necessary for the payment of debts and legacies. The waiver for the present by Paris of a decree directing 360 ing *the executors to convey the title, did not, I think, conclude his rights, nor deprive him of the power, at any time thereafter, to ask for and insist upon such a decree. The executors still remained clothed with the legal title, but they still stood, as they had always stood, ever since they had announced their judgment of approval of the conduct of Paris, simply as trustees bound by the requirements of the will, and in foro conscientiae, to invest him with the title and control of the estate. In this state of things, he took the benefit of the insolvent debtors' oath, and whatever right he had, passed to the sheriff for the benefit of his creditor the appellant. In asking the court to subject the property to the satisfaction of his demand, the appellant, it seems to me, seeks no interference with the exercise of any discretion with which the trustees are clothed by the will. He in effect only asks the court to declare, what they have admitted and still admit, that the condition on which they were to convey the estate has been complied with, and to announce the conclusion which follows, that it stands, in equity, freed from their control, and subject to the contracts and engagements of the beneficiary. The case is a peculiar one, and counsel have not furnished us with any precedents, nor have I been able to find any which would seem to rule it. The definition of powers and trusts, as given in the authorities, may be sufficiently plain, yet it often becomes a difficult task, in construing the language of an instrument, to determine whether it confers a mere power or a power in the nature of a trust, and consequently, whether the power is one over the exercise of which a court of equity can take any control. When the executors are clothed with an arbitrary discretion, an absolute power to appoint or withhold the bounty, as in Pink & others v. De Thuissey, 2 Madd. R. 423, where the executor was left at liberty to give to the legatee one thousand pounds, "If he found the thing 361 *proper," or as in the case of Weller v. Weller (cited in the foregoing case as having been decided at the rolls), where the testator gave his son, who had been extravagant, a sum of money, with a power to the executors to advance more, "if they thought proper," the courts have, I think, very properly refused to decide upon the propriety of the executor's withholding the legacy, holding that to do so would be to assume an authority confided solely to the discretion of the executors. But in a case like this, where the judgment and discretion of the executors are limited and directed to a specified enquiry, the reformation of the conduct of the legatee, and where in the event of such judgment being favorable, the will imperatively requires the executors to hand over the legacy; where the executors have exercised their judgment and discretion, have declared themselves satisfied with the result, and have admitted their willingness to hand over the estate; where a refusal on their part to execute the power could be from no motive connected with the conduct of the beneficiary, but would be directly in conflict with their own convictions of right and their own views of the intention of the testator; it seems to me that a claim to the interposition of a court of equity is presented, which it cannot reject without violating the principles which usually govern its action; that the executors stand before the court, not in the attitude of persons clothed with a mere power, but as charged with an acknowledged trust or duty, which, in equity and good conscience, they are bound to perform.

The only person here making opposition to the performance of this duty is the beneficiary, the appellee Paris. Without stopping to comment on the unenviable attitude in which he has placed himself before the court, it is obvious to remark that no desire of his that a power over the estate shall remain in the executors, can prejudicially affect the rights of the appellant.

362 *Regarding that power as one in the nature of a trust, which the executors, at the date of the surrender by Paris, stood bound to perform, I think that he then had such an interest in the estate as could pass for the benefit of his creditor, and that the latter has a right to have it subjected to the payment of his demand.

I am, therefore, of opinion to reverse the decree of the Circuit court, and to render, instead thereof, a decree dismissing the bill so far as it seeks to invalidate the deed of trust; and remanding the cause, in order that the interest of Paris in his father's estate may, after a settlement of the proper accounts, be subjected to the satisfaction of the appellant's debt.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Daniel, J.

The decree was as follows:

The court is of opinion, that the deed of trust of the 30th of May 1842 is bona fide, and not made to delay, hinder or defraud creditors; and is, therefore, valid against the claim of the appellant. The court is further of opinion that the appellee John Paris, by virtue of the power conferred upon the executors by the will of John Paris the elder, and the action of the executors under it, acquired, and held, at the date of his surrender as an insolvent debtor, at the suit of the appellant, an interest in the estate of his father, which passed by said surrender to the sheriff of Augusta county, and which ought to be subjected to the payment of the appellant's debt. So much of the decree as dismisses the bill as to the appellee Fultz, and orders the proceeds of the sale of the trust property to be paid to the parties entitled under the trust deed, is, therefore, affirmed; and so much of the decree as denies the appellant's right to have satisfaction of his debt out of the interest of the appellee Paris in his 363 *father's estate, is reversed with costs to the appellant as against the appellee Paris. And this cause is remanded to the Circuit court, in order that the accounts of the executors may be settled, and that the debt of the appellant may be satisfied by a sale of the tract of land of one hundred and fifteen acres in the bill and proceedings mentioned, if a resort thereto shall become necessary.

I. IN GENERAL.

Construction of Statutes against Fraudulent Conveyances.—The statute against fraudulent conveyances, chapter 74, section 1, of W. Va. Code 1899, like all other statutes against fraud, is to be liberally expounded for the suppression of fraud. Harden v. Wagner, 22 W. Va. 356.

And in Hutchison v. Kelly, 1 Rob. 123, the policy of the statute of 13 Eliz., chap. 5 (substantially adopted in Va. Code, ch. 100, to prevent frauds and perjuries), was investigated by JUDGE BALDWIN, and the true principle was declared by him to be, that a fraudulent intent of a grantee against one or more creditors is fraudulent against all; and that no distinction exists between prior and subsequent creditors, other than that which arises from the necessity of showing a fraudulent intent against some creditors, which cannot be done in behalf of creditors in existence at the time of the conveyance, but by proving either a prior indebtedness or a prospective fraud against them only.

Meaning of "Void" as Used in Statute, Va. Code 1887, § 2458.—The statute relating to fraudulent conveyances, Va. Code 1887, § 2458, provides that gifts, conveyances, etc., made with intent to "delay, hinder, or defraud creditors, purchasers, or other persons," etc., shall be void as to such creditors, etc. From the provision following in this same section, the true effect intended by the statute would seem to be that such "conveyance," etc., is rendered "voidable" (not void), as the statute expressly protects a purchaser for valuable consideration, who had no notice of fraud affecting the title of his immediate grantor.

Principles Applicable to Voluntary and Fraudulent Conveyances.—Designating the principles applicable to a voluntary conveyance, in a controversy between the creditors of the grantor and the claimant under the deed, BALDWIN, J., in Hunters v. Waite, 3 Gratt. 26 (1846), says that, "If a man in insolvent circumstances conveys away his property to strangers, or settles it upon his wife and children, the law concludes the design to be fraudulent against his creditors, and all evidence to the contrary is idle or delusive; and, so if he renders himself insolvent by a voluntary conveyance, however meritorious in itself merely. It is in vain to speculate upon his motives, or adduce evidence of an honest purpose. It may be that he has acted through ignorance, or mistake or misconception. Apologies and excuses may be found to absolve him from moral turpitude, but to these the law cannot listen. He is bound to know his own circumstances and the just demands against him; and the injustice and wrong to his creditors are palpable and unquestionable. On the other hand, if a man is in flourishing or unembarrassed circumstances, and exercises a reasonable and prudent discretion in gifts or advancements to his children, adapted to their wants and justified by his means, leaving an ample fund for the payment of his debts; there can be no propriety in the conclusion of a fraudulent purpose, from the mere fact of indebtedness at the time." At present, however, it is provided by statute, that a voluntary conveyance, etc., which is upon consideration not deemed valuable in law shall be void as to creditors whose debts shall have been contracted at the time it was made, but shall not, on that account, merely, be void as to creditors whose debts shall have been contracted or as to purchasers who shall have purchased after it was made, etc. Va. Code 1887, § 2459.

But where there is a fraudulent intent on the part of the grantor in a deed founded upon a valuable consideration, and such intent is not known to the grantee, the latter is not chargeable with want of good faith, since no rule is better established than that both parties must concur in the fraudulent intent to render the deed absolutely void. Rixey v. Deltrick, 85 Va. 45, 6 S. E. Rep. 615; Skipwith v. Cunningham, 8 Leigh 271; Norris v. Jones, 93 Va. 183, 24 S. E. Rep. 911; Hazlewood v. Forrer, 94 Va. 703, 27 S. E. Rep. 507; Bishoff v. Hartley, 9 W. Va. 100; Herring v. Wickham, 29 Gratt. 628; Bank v. Belt (Va.), 30 S. E. Rep. 467; Bogges v. Richards, 30 W. Va. 567, 20 S. E. Rep. 599, 45 Am. St. Rep. 938; Henderson v. Hunton, 26 Gratt. 926.

And, if a conveyance is not fraudulent in its inception, it cannot become so by subsequent matters: because the statute requires that the act should be done with the criminal intent; however, if it be afterwards employed for a fraudulent purpose, a court of equity will interpose to prevent such use of it. Harden v. Wagner, 22 W. Va. 356. Yet a deed which is fraudulent in fact, is void in toto, and cannot stand as security for grantees who have notice of the fraud. Livesay v. Beard, 22 W. Va. 565.

Who is an Insolvent.—And a person is insolvent within the statutory meaning (W. Va. Code 1899, ch. 74, § 2) when all of his property is not sufficient to pay his debts. Carr v. Summerfield (W. Va. 1899), 34 S. E. Rep. 804.

Homestead Deed.—However, the filing of a homestead deed, claiming as exempt, under the homestead law, store fixtures and certain merchandise in stock, is not a conveyance or assignment which can be attacked as in fraud of creditors, under Va. Code 1887, § 2460, as amended. Simon v. Ellison (Va.), 22 S. E. Rep. 860.

Fraud Determined by Inspection of Deed.—When a court is called upon to decide whether a deed is fraudulent upon its face, it must decide the question from the inspection of the deed alone. And unless, upon an inspection of the deed claimed to be fraudulent on its face, the court sees that it contains some provision which clearly shows that the intent of the grantor, in executing the deed, was to hinder, delay, or defraud his creditors, the court cannot hold the deed fraudulent on its face. Landeman v. Wilson, 29 W. Va. 702, 2 S. E. Rep. 203.

A Suit to Set Aside Conveyances on Ground of Fraud Is Not a "Controversy Concerning Land."—A suit to set aside several deeds on the ground of alleged fraud and to subject the lands thereby conveyed to the debt of the complainants, is not in the category of "controversies concerning the title or boundaries of land," within the meaning of the constitution of the state, art. 6, § 2. Fink v. Denny, 75 Va. 663.

Claims Protected against Fraudulent Transfers.—The Va. Code 1873, ch. 114, § 1, protects against fraudulent transfers, all claims, debts and demands, including claims to damages for breach of contract to marry, for which judgment may, after the execution of the conveyance, be obtained. Burton v. Mill, 78 Va. 468.

II. VOID TRANSFERS.

A. ABSOLUTE TRANSFERS.

1. VOID AS TO CREDITORS AND SUBSEQUENT PURCHASERS FOR VALUE AND WITHOUT NOTICE—FRAUD IN FACT.

a. Purchases.

(a) Realty.

In General—Fraudulent Intent Vitiates.—A voluntary conveyance will be declared fraudulent as to subsequent creditors, if, from the circumstances and other evidence, the court is convinced the deed was made with intent to defraud such creditors; and the conveyance being voluntary, it is immaterial whether the grantee had notice of the fraud. Mayhew v. Clark, 33 W. Va. 387, 10 S. E. Rep. 785; Duncan v. Custard, 24 W. Va. 780; Connaway v. McCann, 30 W. Va. 200, 3 S. E. Rep. 590.

And while it is true, as held in Lockhard v. Beckley, 10 W. Va. 88 (1877), under the second section of chapter seventy-four of the Code of West Virginia, that a voluntary conveyance, as to subsequent creditors, is not void merely on the ground that it was voluntary, and the party indebted at the time it was made; yet upon the question whether it is fraudulent in fact, it is proper to consider the circumstances of its being voluntary, and the party indebted at the time; and if additional circumstances connected with these two be sufficient to show fraud in fact, it is void as to subsequent creditors.

When Intent Is to Avoid Payment of Fines.—Thus, if a party engaged in the unlawful retailing of ardent spirits conveys away his land with the intent to prevent the state from subjecting it to the payment of any future fines for such unlawful retailing, such deed is fraudulent, although the sales in which fines were subsequently recovered had not then been made. State v. Burkeholder, 30 W. Va. 593, 5 S. E. Rep. 439.

When Intent Is to Defeat Recovery of Damages in Tort.—Likewise it is a settled doctrine that a deed made with intent to defeat a recovery of damages in an action of tort, and before trial and judgment, is fraudulent and void to the same extent as a conveyance to hinder and delay existing creditors, and the intent need not be established by express proof. Johnson v. Wagner, 76 Va. 587.

A Valuable and Adequate Consideration Passes, but Intent Is Fraudulent.—And although a deed be made for a valuable and adequate consideration, yet if the intent of the grantor be dishonest or unlawful, the deed will be deemed fraudulent, if the grantee had notice of such intent. Harden v. Wagner, 22 W. Va. 357; Goshorn v. Snodgrass, 17 W. Va. 717; Briscoe v. Clarke, 1 Rand. 213; Livesay v. Beard, 22 W. Va. 585;

Bowyer v. Martin, 27 W. Va. 442; Bartlett v. Clear-enger, 35 W. Va. 719, 14 S. E. Rep. 273. Moreover, if a deed is fraudulent in fact, it matters not, whether the grantor had much or little property, when the conveyance was made. Silverman v. Greaser, 27 W. Va. 550.

Fraud on Grantor's Part Alone—Conveyance without Consent or Knowledge of Grantee.—In Roanoke Nat. Bank v. Farmers' Nat. Bank, 84 Va. 603, 5 S. E. Rep. 682, a grantor conveyed land to a certain grantee, as it appears, without his consent or knowledge, and had the deed recorded. A creditor at large under Va. Code 1873, ch. 175, § 3, brought a suit to annul it as fraudulent. The grantor made no appearance. After the decree was entered and during the same term, the grantee filed his answer, denying that he had ever claimed any title, under the deed. The court held the deed fraudulent as to grantor's creditors, and therefore void.

Effect of Inadequacy of Consideration Combined with Subsequent Fraud.—And, as further held in Livesay v. Beard, 22 W. Va. 585, if an insolvent debtor for an inadequate consideration conveys a valuable portion of his real estate to his children, and others, and on the same day makes a conveyance of other property to secure preferred creditors, which deed is fraudulent on its face, and four days thereafter makes a similar deed conveying all the residue of his property, which last deed is also fraudulent on its face, these facts taken together are strong evidence of a fraudulent intent in the execution of the first deed.

Purchasers Participating in Debtor's Design to Avoid Payment of Debts.—So, where the uncontroverted facts in the case show that the debtor, for the purpose of escaping a pursuing creditor, conveyed his real estate to a purchaser, even for value, which purchaser had knowledge of the creditor's pursuit and was aiding the debtor to escape the same, such purchaser will be held to have participated in the fraudulent purpose of his grantor, and the conveyance will be avoided as to such creditors. Gillespie v. Allen, 87 W. Va. 675, 17 S. E. Rep. 184.

Where Only a Part of the Grantees Have Notice of Fraudulent Intent.—But where a deed of several grantees jointly is fraudulent in fact, but it being proven that the grantor executed it with intent to defraud his creditors, it will be void only as to such grantees as had notice of the fraud, and may stand as security for the consideration paid by such grantees as had no notice of such fraud. Livesay v. Beard, 22 W. Va. 585; McGinnis v. Curry, 13 W. Va. 29.

Fraudulent Scheme between Debtor and Grantor to Defeat the Creditor's Recovery.—The case of Davis, etc., Co. v. Dunbar, 29 W. Va. 617, 2 S. E. Rep. 91, affords a striking example, illustrating the fraudulent intent of the grantor in making a conveyance. The facts were that, a certain sewing machine company, by its agent, made a contract with a person by the name of Dunbar, to sell sewing machines for the company; the father of Dunbar, the defendant, gave guaranty, that the son would faithfully pay all sums which he might owe under said contract, and the father and his two sons, the defendant and another, represented that the father was solvent and owned 94 acres of land. Three years before this date, the father had made and delivered a deed for this land to these two sons, but the deed had never been recorded. After the contract with the machine company was made, the two sons and the father agreed that the deed should be made for the land to the brother of the defendant, which was done, and placed on record the day before the defendant entered upon his duties under the contract. The defendant became indebted, soon after, to the company in a large sum of money, and then became insolvent. Upon a bill filed to subject the 94 acres of land to the payment of the debt, it was held, that under the circumstances, the scheme was one to defraud the plaintiff, and the 94 acres of land should be subjected to the payment of the debts.

Fraudulent Intent Evidenced by Grantee's Participation and Notice.—And where property is conveyed for the benefit of creditors to a trustee, and the trustee sells it to the wife of the debtor, and it is afterwards taken on a fi. fa., against the husband, the question whether the transaction is fraudulent depends on the wife's good faith and want of notice, and not on the good faith of the trustee. Hughes v. Kelly (Va. 1898), 30 S. E. Rep. 387.

So, if it appears that the wife actively participated in the attempt to sustain a conveyance from her husband to her, by claiming that certain additional and unfounded indebtedness was a part of the consideration for the property, the conveyance will be treated as fraudulent in fact, and void in toto as to the creditors of the husband, and will not be permitted to stand as security to the wife for the valid portion of the consideration paid by her, as against such creditors. Webb v. Ingham, 29 W. Va. 389, 1 S. E. Rep. 816.

Homestead Deed.—See, in this general connection of transfers made with fraudulent intent, the case of Rose v. Sharpless, 33 Gratt. 153, in which it was declared that, where a "householder or the head of a family" executes a homestead deed as a part and in furtherance of a design to hinder, delay, and defraud his creditors in the recovery of their just debts, such deed will be vitiated and invalidated by such conduct.

(b) Personality.

Assumed Ownership of Property by Consent of Real Owner—Fraudulent Intent.—In Bolling v. Harrison, 2 P. & H. 532, a resident of Virginia, owned certain slaves in Florida, and wished to bring them to Virginia but fearing lest his creditors should seize them under execution, on their arrival, he persuaded another to assume to be the owner of them and conveyed them, by deed, to a trustee for the benefit of his (true owner's) wife and children. This was done, and the increase were brought to Virginia, and were kept in the possession of the true owner for several years, and were then carried by the true owner, with their family, beyond the limits of the state. Certain judgment creditors of the true owner then sought to hold the pretended owner liable in equity for the value of the negroes. The pretended owner never had the title to the negroes, nor possession or control of them, but merely lent himself to the scheme of the true owner, as above stated. The court held the deed void; and further, that the mere representation in the deed as to the ownership of the property, did not make the pretended owner liable in equity, for the value of the property, as constructive trustee for the creditors, though he would have been so liable if he had acquired the possession or control of the property. And if any creditor had suffered actual damage by the fraudulent misrepresentation, his remedy was at law.

b. Liens Given by Confession of Judgment, or Otherwise.—And in Crawford v. Carper, 4 W. Va. 56, a debtor, who was insolvent, confessed judgment in favor of one of his creditors, giving the creditor first lien upon his land. The debt thus attempted to be secured, was barred by the statute of limitations. The land upon which the lien rested was not sufficient to pay all of the debts owed. Upon these facts the court declared the judgment void, as coming within the purview of the prohibition, against fraud in obtaining judgments, contained in Va. Code 1860, ch. 118, § 1; Va. Code 1887, § 2458.

But in Elliot v. Trahern, 35 W. Va. 634, 14 S. E. Rep. 223, a judgment was confessed by a son to his father upon notes previously executed to him. The court held that the judgment was not fraudulent as to debts existing against the estate of the intestate, although the son was at the time the judgment was confessed one of the sureties of the administrators of the estate on their official bond; and several months after the judgment was confessed it was ascertained that the administrators had committed a considerable devastavit.

However, where a grantor for another's benefit, puts a lien on his real estate for the amount of a fictitious note that would cover its value, and then refers his creditors to the supposed beneficiary, as a probable purchaser of their debts, and some sell at fifty cents on the dollar, there being a secret agreement between the grantor and supposed beneficiary that the discounts should be shared equally between them, the deed creating the lien is fraudulent in fact and void as to the grantor's creditors. Rucker v. Moss, 84 Va. 634, 5 S. E. Rep. 527.

2. TRANSFERS WHICH ARE INOPERATIVE AS TO CERTAIN PERSONS THOUGH NOT AFFECTED WITH FRAUD IN FACT.

a. Transfers Which Are Voluntary, or upon Consideration Not Deemed Valuable in Law.

(a) Common-Law and Statutory Doctrines as to Voluntary Conveyances.

Common-Law Doctrine.—Declared and enlarged by 13 Eliz. ch. 5 (substantially adopted in 1 R. C. § 2, ch. 101; Va. Code 1887, § 2458). It seems to have been a well-settled doctrine at common law that a voluntary conveyance, which interfered with or broke in upon the rights of existing creditors, would not be permitted to take effect to the prejudice of other just demands; and this according to many of the cases, without regard to the amount of the debts, or the extent of the property settled, or the circumstances of the party. Nevertheless, numerous cases are to be found, which in effect maintain the doctrine, that a conveyance, although voluntary, may be good, under circumstances, even as against existing creditors; and that the parties being indebted at the time is but an argument of fraud, the question still being in every case, whether the conveyance is a bona fide transaction, or a mere device to delude and defeat creditors. The subject is one involving the inquiry into the relations which the two great classes of creditors, prior and subsequent, occupy in relation to a voluntary settlement. And the question is, whether they occupy a common ground, so that the conveyance which would be adjudged fraudulent as to the former, would also be held fraudulent as to the latter; or will a discrimination be made, the effect of which will be to withdraw from inquiry in the case of a prior creditor the various circumstances attending the execution of the conveyance, such as the nature of the consideration, the value of the property settled, compared with that, if any, retained, the extent of the indebtedness, etc.; all of which are in the case of the subsequent creditor most proper to be considered; and upon which, in order to succeed, he must be able to fix the imputation of fraud in the absence of direct and positive proof of the intent. CHANCELLOR KENT clearly recognizes the distinction between the two classes. In the case of the prior creditor, he considers that any inquiry into the amount of debts existing at the time would be embarrassing if not dangerous; and he regards it as wholly unnecessary, considering the debtor as absolutely disabled from making any voluntary settlement to the prejudice of any existing debts; and such, he says, is the clear and uniform doctrine of the cases. See Reed v. Livingston, 3 Johns. Ch. R. 481, 500. JUDGE STORY, on the other hand, evidently considers him as carrying the doctrine too far. He thinks that mere indebtedness would not per se avoid a voluntary conveyance even as to subsisting creditors, unless the other circumstances are such as justly to create a presumption of fraud. 1 Story's Eq. Jur. §§ 860-865; inclusive.

The question has been the subject of a most animated and elaborate discussion between two of the former judges of the supreme court of Virginia. In the cases of Hutchison v. Kelly, 1 Rob. 123, Bank of Alexandria v. Patton, 1 Rob. 499, and Hunters v. Walte, 3 Gratt. 26, in which JUDGE BALDWIN opposes the opinion of CHANCELLOR KENT, and JUDGE STANARD maintains the correctness of CHANCELLOR KENT's opinion. But it seems that both these eminent jurists agree, that in the case of a subsequent creditor, a settlement cannot be impeached on the mere ground of its being voluntary, if there be no actual fraudulent view or intent at the time it is made. To let in such a creditor it must be shown that there was mala fides or fraud in fact in the transaction. If the grantor, however, be indebted at the time he makes the voluntary conveyance, and due provision is made of all existing debts, it is maintained by some courts that it is clear, that all just imputation of fraud in respect to them is out of the question. The above discussion of the principles relating to fraudulent and voluntary conveyances, their effect upon the rights of existing and subsequent creditors, at common law, is taken almost verbatim from the well-considered opinion rendered by JUDGE LEE in Johnston v. Zane, 11 Gratt. 552. See this case also for a valuable collection of English, and other authorities supporting propositions set forth in the principal case.

In the light of 13 Eliz. ch. 5 (substantially, Va. Code 1887, § 2458), which is held to be declaratory of the principles of the common law, though "more extensive and salutary," the question as to the validity of a voluntary conveyance made by a debtor, who was perfectly solvent, and retained sufficient property out of which to pay all existing debts, continued to be controverted until the provision relating to "voluntary gifts, conveyances," etc., contained in the revisal of the Code in 1850 (Va. Code 1887, § 2459), in which the view as held by JUDGE STANARD (dissenting opinion in Hutchison v. Kelly, 1 Rob. 123) is adopted, namely, that any transfer of property upon a consideration not deemed valuable in law (or upon consideration of marriage) shall be void as to existing creditors. See W. Va. Code 1890, ch. 74, § 2. For fuller discussion of the statutes involved, and collection of cases on general subject, see the divisions which immediately follow.

Statutory Provisions.—Sections 1 and 2, chapter 74, of the West Virginia Code 1890, make a clear distinction between the rights of existing and subsequent creditors as to a voluntary conveyance; and such a conveyance cannot be impeached by subsequent creditors on the mere ground of its being voluntary, and the party making it, or at whose instance it was made, being indebted to some extent, if there be no actual fraudulent view or intent in the party at the time. Lockhard v. Beckley, 10 W. Va. 38. See similar provisions of Va. Code 1887, §§ 2458, 2459; Pratt v. Cox, 22 Gratt. 330; Penn v. Whitehead, 17 Gratt. 528.

But a voluntary transfer of property to be valid against subsequent creditors must be recorded, or possession must remain solely and bona fide with the donee. Davis v. Payne, 4 Rand. 332. In this general connection, see Bank of Alexandria v. Patton, 1 Rob. 499; Hunters v. Walte, 3 Gratt. 26; Penn v. Whitehead, 17 Gratt. 503; Huston v. Cantril, 11 Leigh 187; Davis v. Noll, 38 W. Va. 66, 17 S. E. Rep. 791; Wick v. Dawson, 42 W. Va. 43, 24 S. E. Rep. 587.

However, there seems to be a conflict among the decisions in West Virginia, differing among themselves as well as from the Virginia decisions, relating to the construction of similar sections in the respective Codes, regarding "transfers" and "charges" "upon a consideration not deemed valuable in law." The provisions are almost identical in their wording, as will appear from the following extracts: the West Virginia Code, 1899, ch. 74, § 2, is in part as follows: "Every transfer or charge ('transfer' including every gift, sale, conveyance and assignment, and the word 'charge' including every confessed judgment, deed of trust, mortgage lien and incumbrance), which is not upon consideration deemed valuable in law, shall be void as to creditors whose debts shall have been contracted at the time it was made, but shall not upon that account merely be void as to creditors whose debts shall have been contracted, or as to purchasers who shall have purchased after it was made; and though it be declared to be void as to a prior creditor because voluntary, it shall not for that cause be decreed to be void as to subsequent creditors or purchasers." The Virginia enactment, § 2459, reads as follows: "Every gift, conveyance, assignment, transfer, or charge, which is not upon consideration deemed valuable in law, or which is upon consideration of marriage (the latter clause not appearing in the West Virginia statute, it will be observed), shall be void as to creditors whose debts shall have been contracted at the time it was made, but shall not, on that account, merely, be void as to creditors whose debts shall have been contracted, or as to purchasers who shall have purchased after it was made; and though it be declared to be void as to a prior creditor, because voluntary or upon consideration of marriage, it shall not, for that cause, be declared to be void as to subsequent creditors or purchasers."

Earlier West Virginia Doctrine.—In Greer v. O'Brien, 36 W. Va. 277 (1892), 15 S. E. Rep. 74, a husband purchased a tract of land and directed it to be conveyed to his wife. It was charged that the husband was insolvent at the time of this gift to the wife, but the answer denied the fact of the indebtedness or insolvency. In the discussion of the case the effect of the "amount" of the husband's indebtedness as to existing creditors, was held immaterial to the decision as to them. JUDGE LUCAS, in delivering the opinion of the court, held, in substance, as follows: that since the enactment of section 2, chapter 74, West Virginia Code 1891, (§ 2, ch. 74, W. Va. Code 1899) voluntary conveyances are void as to prior creditors, not because they are fraudulent but because they are "voluntary," and because the consequent subordination of the rights of the donee to that of all prior creditors. And in the application of this act to voluntary conveyances or donations, made since its passage, which are confessedly and on their face voluntary, the act itself should be regarded as embraced in the purview of such donation or settlement. And further, that this section should receive the plain common sense, remedial construction, and not be frittered away by resorting to refinement, and to the complicated and almost undeterminable questions of fact and evidence which formerly embarrassed the courts, but which the act referred to was intended to cut up by the roots. By thus construing such instruments, namely, that all existing debts are recognized as liens upon the property superior to the donee in equity and priority, much of the ancient learning about conclusive presumptions of fraud, and much of the inquiry formerly required to maintain a financial standing with reference to his position in life, and his financial capacity to make reasonable advancements, ought to be regarded as cut up by the roots. Consequently the voluntary conveyance to the wife was declared void as to existing creditors, though valid as to subsequent creditors in the absence of any fraudulent intent. Thus, according to this decision, as it seems, the statutory effect is to render void as to existing creditors a gift by the debtor, even though the debtor may retain ample funds out of which his existing creditors may be paid. See Rogers v. Verlander, 30 W. Va. 619, 5 S. E. Rep. 847; Clarke v. King, 34 W. Va. 631, 12 S. E. Rep. 775; Kanawha Val. Bank v. Wilson, 25 W. Va. 242.

Later West Virginia Doctrine.—But it would seem that the doctrine as declared in Greer v. O'Brien, 36 W. Va. 277, 15 S. E. Rep. 74, consequently the construction of the statute, § 2, ch. 74, W. Va. Code 1899, has been inadvertently overruled by the later decision of Hume v. Condon, 44 W. Va. 553 (1898), 30 S. E. Rep. 56. In this latter case it was held, that the husband could make a donation to his wife (or return her a loan of money received, augmented by profits), if he retain an amount of tangible property largely more than sufficient to pay all his just indebtedness. JUDGE DENT, in delivering the opinion of the court, seemingly adopted the following language as his own: "The ancient rule that a voluntary postnuptial settlement can be avoided if there was some indebtedness existing has been relaxed, and the rule generally adopted in this country at the present time will uphold it, if it be reasonable, not disproportionate to the husband's means, and clear of any intent, actual or constructive, to defraud creditors." Citing Kehr v. Smith, 20 Wall. (U. S.) 35; Hunter v. Hunter, 10 W. Va. 321. And further, "this rule is generally adopted even where a statute expressly provides that a transfer from husband to wife in prejudice of the rights of subsisting creditors shall be invalid. A husband's love and affection for his wife, and a desire to secure her support, is ample reason for a gift to her. Still his actual intention is a mere question of fact; but whether the gift is a reasonable one, considering his circumstances, seems to be a question of law. It is reasonable if his debts are trifling, or if he retains enough to readily pay them all; but unreasonable if his debts are so great as to embarrass him, or if he is insolvent, or if the gift leaves him insolvent, or if he denudes himself of all his property, or if the property he conveys is easily accessible to creditors, while that which he retains, though ample in amount, is inaccessible to them." Citing 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law 563-64.

However, it is to be observed that in the decision of this case, § 2, ch. 74, W. Va. Code of 1891 (W. Va. Code 1890, § 2, ch. 74) was not referred to or discussed, nor was there any reference direct or indirect, in the majority opinion, to the case of Greer v. O'Brien, 36 W. Va. 284, 15 S. E. Rep. 74. But BRANNON, P., in his dissenting opinion referred to it, and declared as follows: "It is contrary to the Code provisions that every voluntary conveyance is void as to existing creditors, no matter how pure in intent; no matter whether the grantor had, or had not, enough property left to pay his debts; no matter what his debts amounted to. The amount of his indebtedness, and the amount of his property left besides that conveyed were proper matters, before the statute, for consideration, and are now, when we are seeking to set a deed aside as to subsequent creditors; but it is utterly immaterial and foreign to the question of whether a voluntary conveyance shall be set aside as to prior creditors. It seems to me that the decision in this case reopens the door to variable oral evidence and opinion as to a man's pecuniary worth, and his indebtedness, and his intent, which the statute was designed to close,—vexatious questions, which 'ought to be regarded as cut up by the roots,' to use the apt and forcible expression of PRESIDENT LUCAS in discussing this statute in Greer v. O'Brien, 36 W. Va. 284, 15 S. E. Rep. 74." See Mayhew v. Clark, 33 W. Va. 387, 10 S. E. Rep. 785.

Virginia Doctrine.—In Chamberlayne v. Temple, 2 Rand. 384 (1824), it is held, that a voluntary conveyance of property to children, at a time when the donor is largely indebted, is void against creditors. But the creditors meant are defined, as those "who are thereby delayed, hindered, or defrauded,"—and further, that only those can be defrauded who have a right to specifically charge the property, viz.: lien creditors. Johnson v. Zane, 11 Gratt. 552. But see Quarles v. Lacy, 4 Munf. 251; Bentley v. Harris, 2 Gratt. 357. When this principle was declared, the present statute, Va. Code 1887, § 2460, had not been enacted, providing that a creditor before obtaining a judgment or decree against his debtor may institute any suit before, that he could bring subsequent to, obtaining a judgment or decree, to avoid a transfer under §§ 2458, 2459. See ante, sub-head, "Common-Law Doctrine."

There are few decisions in Virginia involving this point exclusively, since the enactment of the statute in 1850 (Va. Code 1857, § 2459). The tendency of the cases seems to be to give the statute its plain and evident meaning. Furthermore, no conflicting construction is observed. The law seems to be as stated by Mr. Barton, in Barton's Law Practice, p. 860 (2d Ed.), where, in the discussion of the distinction made by the statutes (Va. Code 1887, §§ 2458, 2459) between the rights of prior and subsequent creditors, when a transfer is attacked as voluntary, or fraudulent, he says that, "in respect to after-existing creditors, a fraudulent deed differs from one that is merely void because not upon a consideration deemed valuable in law, in that the former is void as to such creditors, as well as those whose debts were created after the deed was made; while, as we have before stated, the latter is only void as to antecedent debts, and may be wholly sustained as to those coming into existence after its date." Pratt v. Cox, 22 Gratt. 330; Penn v. Whitehead, 17 Gratt. 328; Taylor v. Mallory, 96 Va. 18, 80 S. E. Rep. 472. See also, Broadfoot v. Dyer, 3 Munf. 350; Ruddle v.

Ben, 10 Leigh 467; Flynn v. Jackson, 93 Va. 341, 25 S. E. Rep. 1; De Farges v. Ryland, 87 Va. 404, 12 S. E. Rep. 805.

(b) Antenuptial Settlements in Consideration of Marriage.—Prior to Va. Code 1887, sec. 2459, which went into effect May 1, 1888, rendering marriage an insufficient consideration to support a gift, conveyance, etc., as against creditors of the grantor whose debts had been contracted at the time it is made, it was held, that whatever the design of the grantor might be, in making a settlement on a woman in contemplation and in consideration of marriage, it was valid; unless her knowledge of his intended fraud was clearly and satisfactorily proved. Clay v. Walter, 79 Va. 92 (1884); Herring v. Wickham, 29 Gratt. 628. And the service by creditors of the grantor, of a written notice in accordance with the Va. Code of 1873, ch. 163, sec. 1, on the grantor, before the marriage, of his fraudulent design in making the settlement, cannot affect her constructively with notice of such design; but her actual knowledge of a participation of that fraudulent design must have been clearly established by proof, in order to render the deed of conveyance fraudulent as against creditors of the grantors. See Moore v. Butler, 90 Va. 683, 19 S. E. Rep. 850. And in Bumgardner v. Harris, 92 Va. 188 (1895), 23 S. E. Rep. 229, it was held that, marriage prior to Va. Code 1887, § 2459, constituted a valuable consideration for a settlement by a man on his intended wife, and after the marriage the settlement was valid against existing creditors; but where the settlement was upon the wife for her life, with remainder over to the sister of the grantor and her children, the remainder was without valuable consideration, and void as to creditors whose debts existed at the time of the settlement.

But in Greenhow v. Coutts, 4 H. & M. 485 (1810), upon a given state of facts, the principle was declared by the superior court of chancery for the Richmond district, that a marriage settlement on a wife with whom the husband had long lived in a state of fornication, and by whom he had several children, will be deemed not to have been on valuable consideration, but voluntary and fraudulent as to creditors. However, upon appeal, the court in Coutts v. Greenhow, 2 Munf. 363, reversed this decision, declaring that the wife and children were purchasers for value, and the deed was not void as to creditors, no fraudulent intention being proved.

And an agreement made in contemplation of marriage, though void against creditors because not recorded, is valid between the parties. Dabney v. Kennedy, 7 Gratt. 317.

(c) Postnuptial Settlements.

Validity at Common Law and in Equity—Dower as a Consideration.—Postnuptial settlements on a wife for value are valid in equity, though void at common law; and relinquishment of her right of dower is a good consideration to the extent of its value as against the husband's creditors. Ficklin v. Rixey, 89 Va. 832 (1893), 17 S. E. Rep. 325.

Thus, in Strayer v. Long, 86 Va. 557, 10 S. E. Rep. 574, it is declared that, a relinquishment of dower, to the extent of the other is a sufficient consideration for a postnuptial settlement as against the husband's existing creditors; and if it is made before the relinquishment, no distinct proof of the agreement is required, and though the settlement is made fraudulently as to the husband's creditors, the fraud will not be imputed to the wife. Nevertheless it must be duly recorded, else it is void as to the husband's creditors, without notice, whose claims accrued after its execution and before its admission to record. Glascok v. Brandon, 35 W. Va. 84, 12 S. E. Rep. 1102.

Validity When Voluntary.—Nevertheless, every voluntary postnuptial settlement is fraudulent and void as against creditors, when the settler is indebted. Flynn v. Jackson, 93 Va. 341, 25 S. E. Rep. 1.

Presumption and Burden of Proof.—And postnuptial settlements are presumed voluntary, therefore void as to existing creditors, and the burden of proof is on those claiming under them. Perry v. Ruby, 81 Va. 817; Flynn v. Jackson, 93 Va. 341, 25 S. E. Rep. 1; Robbins v. Armstrong, etc., 84 Va. 810, 6 S. E. Rep. 130; Massey v. Yancey, 90 Va. 626, 19 S. E. Rep. 184; De Farges v. Ryland, 87 Va. 404, 12 S. E. Rep. 805; Rixey v. Deltrick, 85 Va. 42, 6 S. E. Rep. 615; Hatcher v. Crews, 78 Va. 460. But a postnuptial settlement will be good against subsequent creditors where there is no fraud, and the settler is not in debt when he makes it. De Farges v. Ryland, 87 Va. 404, 12 S. E. Rep. 805. See post, "Evidence."

Failure to Record—Effect.—However, a postnuptial settlement made by a husband on his wife, of personal property derived from her father's estate, but of which he retains possession, not having been properly recorded, is void as against the creditors of the husband. Lewis v. Caperton, 8 Gratt. 148.

When Valid to Extent of Consideration, Though Void as to Creditors.—And although a postnuptial settlement may have been made under such circumstances as to be void as to creditors of the husband, yet if the wife relinquish her right in the property, or assumes the payment of debts of her husband, so as to make them charges on her separate estate, upon the faith of such settlement, it will be held good to the extent of a just compensation for the interest which she may have parted with, or of the debts which she has assumed to pay. Flynn v. Jackson, 93 Va. 341, 25 S. E. Rep. 1. These facts, however, are essential to the validity of the deed.

Thus in Beecher v. Wilson, 84 Va. 813, 6 S. E. Rep. 209, a husband who was heavily indebted conveyed his land to his wife's separate use, reciting the settlement to be in consideration of his indebtedness to her on account of her money used by him in paying for said land and otherwise. There was at the time of its use no distinct promise, written or parol, that the money should be applied to the deferred payments of the lands, which was conveyed to himself, and afterwards treated as his own property, or that the use of the said money should be regarded as a debt from him to her. The court declared that such postnuptial settlement must be annulled as fraudulent as to his creditors.

(d) Gifts.—See monographic note on "Gifts."

1. PERSONALTY.

In General.—By the Acts 1858, to prevent fraudulent gifts of slaves, though the parol gift of slaves may be given in evidence to show the character of the possession held by the donee, yet the gift itself is void. Thus if a father-in-law put slaves into the possession of his son-in-law on loan, no length of possession will give the lendee title against the lender, until such possession has become adverse by demand and refusal of the possession. Cross v. Cross, 9 Leigh 245.

And a verbal gift of slaves to a feme sole, to whose husband, upon her subsequent marriage, they were delivered, and by him kept until his death, four years after the marriage, is within the statutes for preventing fraudulent gifts of slaves. Taylor v. Wallace, 4 Call 92.

How a Gift is to Be Evidenced.—And a gift of slaves can only be evidenced by deed or will duly proved and recorded, or by possession passing from the donor to the donee, and remaining with him, or one claiming under him and the possession here meant is an actual, abiding, permanent possession. If a gift is evidenced in either of these ways, it will serve to effectually vest title in the donee, certainly as against the donor. Durham v. Dunkly, 6 Rand. 135.

Thus, in Henry v. Graves, 16 Gratt. 244, a husband in the lifetime of his wife, made an absolute gift of his wife's remainder in slaves, by deed, which was recorded after her death, and he survived both the wife and the life tenant. The gift was valid and effectual against him, though before possession was obtained by the donees he dissented from it.

Effect of Reservations and Limitations.—But where any reservation or limitation is pretended to have been made of a use or property, by way of condition, reversion, remainder or otherwise, in goods and chattels, the possession whereof shall have remained in another for five years, the same, as to the creditors and purchasers of the person so remaining in possession, is, under the act to prevent frauds and perjuries, taken to be fraudulent, and the absolute property to be with the possession, unless such reservation or limitation were declared by will or by deed in writing, proved and recorded. London v. Turner, 11 Leigh 403.

Thus, in Durham v. Dunkly, 6 Rand. 135 (1829), a slave was given to an infant child, by deed, with the reservation expressed in the deed, that the donor was to keep the slave and raise it for the donee, until she arrived at the age of thirteen. The slave was delivered to the donee on the day of the execution of the deed, and on the same day, taken back by the donor. The deed never was recorded, and the donee never lived with the donor. It was held that the gift was void under the act of assembly, 1 Rev. Code, Va. 432, § 51.

So if a father delivers a slave to his infant son residing with him, and calls upon persons present to take notice that he gives the slave to the son, but says at the same time, that he claims an estate in the slave for his own life, nothing passes to the son by such parol gift. Anderson v. Thompson, 11 Leigh 439.

Property Given on Parol Trust—As to Whom Valid.

Although, where personal property is given to one upon a trust by parol for another, the declaration of trust by parol may be valid as between the donee and the cestui que trust, yet as between the cestui que trust and the creditors of the donee the case is essentially different. London v. Turner, 11 Leigh 403.

Gift from Parent to Child—Unrecorded.—So a parol gift of a slave to a child, after possession in the donee, is void, as between the donor and donee; and if the slave given be conveyed by deed (accompanied with possession in the donee) but without being recorded, it is void as to creditors and purchasers. Shirley v. Long, 6 Rand. 764.

And in Shirley v. Long, 6 Rand. 764 (1827), it was further declared, that if a father gave a slave to his child, and the donor retained possession of the slave, and exercised control over it, the gift was not the less fraudulent because the child always lived with the father, and the slave was always called the child's in the family and the neighborhood.

So a parol gift of a slave by a father to an infant child living with him, by a declaration that the gift is made, but there is no delivery of possession, is not good against a subsequent purchaser of that slave, although such purchaser knew at the time of his purchase, that the father had so made the gift. Hunter v. Jones, 6 Rand. 540 (1828).

Same—Marriage Provision.—A verbal gift of personal property to a daughter before marriage, in consideration thereof, accompanied by delivery of possession, is (like a promise in writing to make such a gift), valid and effectual against the creditors of the father. However, such verbal gift of property, unaccompanied by possession before the marriage, but in consideration of which the possession is delivered after the marriage, though valid between the parties and privies to it, and against debts of the father afterwards contracted, is voluntary and void against all pre-existing creditors; and this is true though the property be delivered before any lien by execution is acquired by the creditors. Hayes v. Jones, 2 Patt. & Heath 583.

Thus, where a father who is possessed of an ample fortune sends certain of his slaves immediately after the marriage of his daughter to her husband, in whose possession they remained, without interruption or claim, until his death which happened two years and four months afterwards, it will be presumed (no proof of fraud appearing), that such slaves, being no more than a reasonable provision for the daughter at the time, were a gift in consideration of the marriage; and the right of the representatives of the husband is good against the creditors of the father. Moore v. Dawney, 3 H. & M. 157 (1808).

Likewise, in London v. Turner, 11 Leigh 403, a father, upon the marriage of his daughter, made her a gift of slaves, and the possession thereof remained in the daughter's husband five years. While the husband was in possession, the father made his will, confirming the gift, and declaring that the same was "to her in trust for the sole and only purpose of her immediate use and comfort in life, and after her decease the title and fee-simple interest to be vested forever in the children or issue lawfully begotten of her body, free from the claim, control or direction of any other person whatever." Although this will was made and recorded within five years from the time of the gift, yet the slaves were held liable to be taken in execution by the creditors of the husband. This case was distinguished from Beasley v. Owen, 3 Hen. & Munf. 449.

And in Huston v. Cantril, 11 Leigh 136 (1840), a father, who was indebted at the time made a deed of gift of personal chattels to his infant daughter, which was duly recorded; subsequent to that time the daughter married and after the father's death, a creditor filed a bill against the daughter and her husband, impeaching the deed as fraudulent, and seeking to subject the property to the payment of his demand. The court held that, whatever might have been the character of the conveyance in its origin, it was rendered good and valuable against creditors upon the marriage of the daughter, who thereupon was to be considered a purchaser by relation for valuable consideration. But see Va. Code 1887, sec. 2459, which declares that marriage shall not be deemed a sufficient consideration to support a gift, conveyance, etc., against existing creditors.

Gift from Husband to Wife—Presumption.—To rebut the presumption of a gift from a wife to her husband, where with her knowledge and consent he has at different times received, and she has delivered to him, the proceeds of the sale of her realty, no receipt of written obligation being given to repay, and the same is mingled with his funds, the proof must be clear, full and above suspicion. See Fitzhugh v. Anderson, 2 H. & M. 289.

Thus in Kanawha Val. Bk. v. Atkinson, 32 W. Va. 203, 9 S. E. Rep. 175, a husband, with the knowledge and consent of his wife, at different times, received, or she delivered to him, the proceeds of the sale of her realty; he gave her no note or other written obligation to repay it; and he mingled it with his means; used it in his business for years; kept no written account of such moneys (nor did she); then became insolvent, and some eight or ten years after his receipt of the money, purchased real estate in the name of his wife, and it was alleged by him and her that it was paid for with the money so received; and several years afterwards he and she united in a deed of trust to secure a very considerable debt on said real estate, such debt being a loan to the husband, and before such purchase a judgment was rendered against him for a debt. The lot was held liable to the judgment. And it was further declared that, if, when such purchase was made, any claim which she may have had on him for such proceeds of her real estate was barred by limitation, that circumstances tended strongly to repel the wife's claim to exempt the land against creditors. See, in this general connection, Fones v. Rice, 9 Gratt. 568; Miller v. Cox, 38 W. Va. 747, 18 S. E. Rep. 960. See post, "Evidence."

(c) Realty.—Under the state of the law existing previous to the Acts of the Assembly, Va. Code 1887, abolishing the common-law right of the husband to the wife's personalty in possession at or during coverture, if property were bequeathed to a wife and her children jointly, the husband became invested with her interest jure mariti, so that, as to her, any conveyance made in consideration of the receipt of such property was voluntary as to her. But as to the children, the conveyance was based on valuable consideration, and stood as security to them. Rixey v. Deitrick, 85 Va. 42, 6 S. E. Rep. 615.

And a deed made by a husband embarrassed at the time, by which he conveys the proceeds of his wife's land which had been sold, and the note for the purchase money made to him, in trust for himself and his wife for their lives and the life of the survivor, and during his life to be under his control and management, is voluntary and fraudulent as to creditors. Lewis v. Caperton, 8 Gratt. 148; Clarke v. King, 34 W. Va. 631, 12 S. E. Rep. 775.

But a voluntary transfer of property from husband to wife is not, simply because voluntary, void as to subsequent creditors of the husband. McClagherty v. Morgan, 36 W. Va. 191, 14 S. E. Rep. 992.

Nevertheless, a court of equity will declare a voluntary conveyance fraudulent as to subsequent creditors, if from the circumstances and other evidence the court is convinced, that the deed was made with the intent to defraud such creditors. The conveyance being voluntary, it is immaterial, whether or not the grantee had notice of such fraud. Duncan v. Custard, 24 W. Va. 730; Mayhew v. Clark, 33 W. Va. 387, 10 S. E. Rep. 785.

Thus, if a man largely indebted at the time voluntarily and without consideration deemed valuable in law, incumbers all of his lands and invests the proceeds of the incumbrance debt in making valuable improvements upon his wife's separate real estate, and then becomes insolvent, and the incumbrance remains unsatisfied, such incumbrance debt will, in a court of equity, be regarded as a gift to the wife, and fraudulent as to his creditors, whose debts existed at the time the incumbrance was created, and the real estate of the wife in her possession, as well as the land incumbered, will be held liable for the payment of her husband, which existed at the time the incumbrance was created. Kan. Val. Bank v. Wilson, 25 W. Va. 242.

And if a deed which is alleged to be voluntary and fraudulent, forms a part of the plaintiff's claim of title. In an action of ejectment, it is the province of the jury to determine, under a proper instruction from the court, whether the deed is voluntary and fraudulent or not. Taylor v. Mallory, 96 Va. 18, 80 S. E. Rep. 472. However, as elsewhere stated, if the deed is merely voluntary, it is, nevertheless, valid as between the parties, and void only as to existing creditors. Chamberlayne v. Temple, 2 Rand. 384 (for fuller explanation of the principles expounded in this case, see ante, "Void Transfers," sub-head 2); Clarke v. King, 34 W. Va. 631, 12 S. E. Rep. 775. See in support of general principles, Stokes v. Oliver, 76 Va. 72; Burkholder v. Ludlam, 30 Gratt. 255; Harvey v. Steptoe, 17 Gratt. 289.

b. Fraud Presumed from Inadequacy of Consideration.

Transfers from Husband to Wife.—Transfers of property, either directly or indirectly, by an insolvent husband to his wife during coverture are justly regarded with suspicion, and unless it clearly appears, that the consideration was paid from the separate estate of the wife or by some one for her out of means not derived either directly or remotely from the husband, such transfers will be held fraudulent and void as to the creditors of the husband. Core v. Cunningham, 27 W. Va. 206. See also, Davis v. Davis, 25 Gratt. 587.

Thus, a conveyance of real estate, made directly or indirectly, by a husband to his wife, in consideration of a valid debt due from the husband to the wife, is fraudulent and void, as to the existing creditors of the husband, when it is shown that said consideration is much less than the value placed upon the property by both the husband and the wife, and they attempt to make out a consideration equal to or in excess of the value of the property by adding to said valid debt other indebtedness of the husband to the wife which had no existence in fact. Webb v. Ingham, 29 W. Va. 389, 1 S. E. Rep. 816.

Conveyance by Wife to Husband.—So, if a married woman directly or indirectly convey her separate real property to her husband upon a consideration not deemed valuable in law, this is void as to her creditors whose debts shall have been contracted at the time it was made, if such creditors had the right, while the land was hers, to subject it or its rents and profits to the payment of their debts; as against existing creditors such voluntary conveyance is conclusively presumed to be fraudulent in law. Wick v. Dawson, 42 W. Va. 43, 24 S. E. Rep. 587.

Transfer from Father to Son.—Likewise, a conveyance of all his property by a father, who is greatly in debt and apprehensive of a heavy liability by the decision of a suit against him for damages for breach of warranty of title to land sold by him, to his son, for an improbable cash payment, and deferred payments without interest, extending through a period of fifteen years, upon an agreement on the son's part to provide maintenance for his father and mother during their lives, presents a case, which, without full examination, is indicative of fraudulent intent, especially where the son, who might afford the necessary explanation, if there was any, is not examined as a witness in the suit to set aside the conveyance for fraud. Click v. Green, 77 Va. 827.

Conveyance from Debtor to Creditor.—And if an insolvent grantor justly indebted to one of his creditors in a comparatively small amount, convey to him all his property, or the greater portion thereof, in satisfaction of his debt, for a nominal consideration, falsely recited in the deed, and claimed by the grantee to have been in hand paid, equal in value to that of the property conveyed but largely in excess of the debt actually due such creditor, and he accepts the same, such deed, as to the other creditors of the grantor, will be held to be fraudulent and void; as the necessary effect of such deed is to hinder, delay and defraud such other creditors; and the grantor and grantee in such deed will be held to have intended the necessary result of their wrongful act. Knight v. Capito, 23 W. Va. 639.

Purchase.—In Moore v. Triplett (Va. 1895), 23 S. E. Rep. 69, the court held that, the fact that the consideration paid on property worth $26,000 was $2,872 less than that amount, does not show such an inadequacy of consideration as to justify a cancellation of the conveyance, as in fraud of the grantor's creditors. See also, Sutherlin v. March, 75 Va. 228.

c. When, and as to Whom Unrecorded Transfers Are Void.

Statutory Provisions.—If, before the time limited by law for recording a deed has expired, a bill be filed to impugn it as fraudulent, the court cannot afterwards declare it void, as against the complainant, on the grounds of its not having been duly recorded. Gibson v. Randolph, 2 Munf. 310.

And by Va. Code 1887, § 2465, Pollards' Supp. Code, § 2465, a deed is void as against creditors, "until and except from the time it is duly admitted to record." See Slater v. Moore, 86 Va. 26, 9 S. E. Rep. 419. As to the time within which deeds must be recorded after their date of acknowledgment, in order that they may relate back and be valid as of the date of acknowledgment, see Va. Code 1887, § 2467, and amendment, Acts 1895-6, p. 285; Pollards' Supp. Code, § 2467. See, in this connection, Ogg v. Randolph, 4 H. & M. 445.

Thus, in Cocke v. Haxall, 2 Rob. 470 (1843), JUDGE ALLEN, delivering the opinion of the court, said, "That it was the intention of the legislature, in the act of 1792, regulating conveyances, 1 R. C., ch. 99, p. 362, sec. 2; p. 365, sec. 13; Va. Code 1849, ch. 118, sec. 4; Va. Code 1887, sec. 2464-65, to require a deed of trust or mortgage of personal estate to be recorded in the general court, or in the court of the district, county or corporation in which the grantor resided. Therefore, where a deed of trust of personalty, dated the 15th of July, 1812, stated the grantor to be of Henrico county, and the trustee and cestui que trust to be of the town of Petersburg, and the deed was never recorded in Henrico but only in Petersburg, and there was no evidence to show that either at the date of the deed, or of its recordation in Petersburg, the grantor resided in that town, the deed so recorded is void as to the grantor's creditors." However, a voluntary conveyance of personal property, by a party not indebted at the time, is good against subsequent creditors, if the deed be duly recorded or the possession remain solely bona fide with the donee. Otherwise it is void by the statute of frauds. Davis v. Payne, 4 Rand. 332.

Marriage Settlement.—And in Thomas v. Gaines, 1 Gratt. 347 (1845), the court declared that a deed of marriage settlement made before the marriage conveying the property of the wife, and in which the intended husband joined, is fraudulent and void against subsequent purchasers from the husband, without notice, unless duly recorded. By this decision the case of Pierce v. Turner, 5 Cranch 162, and the opinions of JUDGES CARR, COALTER and BROOKE, in Land v. Jeffries, 5 Rand. 211, were overruled. The facts in Land v. Jeffries were as follows: A woman who was about to be married made a personal conveyance of her property to a third person with the privity and approbation of her intended husband; the marriage took place a few minutes after the conveyance and the husband took possession of the property after the marriage; the property thus conveyed was held not to be subject to the husband's creditors, as his possession after marriage was not that of his wife (she not being ex jure), and her short possession between the time of the conveyance and that of the marriage, not being sufficient, or of the nature to render the deed fraudulent.

Contract for Sale of Land.—So where a contract in writing which is executed for the sale of land, before judgments are obtained against the vendor, and the deed is executed in pursuance of such contract, but is not recorded until after the judgments are duly docketed, and the contract is never recorded, the contract and deed are void as to the creditors; and the land so contracted to be sold, and so conveyed is subject to the satisfaction of the judgments. Anderson v. Nagle, 12 W. Va. 98.

Loan of Chattel.—So if no writing declaring a loan be recorded, or no demand be made by the lender, and pursued by course of law, for more than five years after possession commenced, the loan is void as to the loanee's creditors, whose rights cannot be affected by the lender's subsequent resumption of possession. But the creditors meant are those whose debts were contracted before the resumption of possession, or conveyance of the chattels, by the lender—they having given credit to the loanee on the apparent ownership of property. Scott v. Jones, 76 Va. 233.

d. Effect of Retention of Possession by Vendor.—It is a settled rule that an absolute deed of personal property is fraudulent per se as to creditors of the vendor when the possession remains with the vendor. Alexander v. Deneale, 2 Munf. 341; Claytor v. Anthony, 6 Rand. 285; Shields v. Anderson, 8 Leigh 729; Davis v. Turner, 4 Gratt. 422; Robertson v. Ewell, 3 Munf. 1; Williamson v. Farley, Gil. 15; Land v. Jeffries, 5 Rand. 211. But according to Sydnor v. Gee, 4 Leigh 585, it seems, that, in the case of an absolute sale and delivery of chattels, and an immediate redelivery thereof by the vendee to the vendor, upon bailment, for a limited time, on valuable consideration, both transactions being in fact fair, such bailment of vendee to the vendor is not inconsistent with the sale, so as to make the sale fraudulent per se, within the rule of Alexander v. Deneale, 2 Munf. 341.

Thus, in Lewis v. Adams, 6 Leigh 320, a vendor for full value paid him, sold certain slaves to a vendee in December 1821, and the property was delivered to the vendee; on the same day, the vendee hired the same slaves to the vendor till January 1823, and took his bond for the hire; in November, 1822, the vendee, by deed duly recorded, conveyed the slaves to a trustee for the use of his daughter, who was the vendor's wife, and her children. Upon these facts the court declared that the exercise of full ownership by the vendee, by the execution of such deed of trust, was equivalent to an actual resumption of the possession at the date of the deed, consequently, whether the sale from the vendor to vendee was originally accompanied and followed by possession or not, it was valid as against any creditors of the vendor whose rights attached after the date of the deed of trust.

However, it is not conclusive evidence of fraud, but is open to explanation. Land v. Jeffries, 5 Rand. 211.

Thus, as held in Benjamin v. Madden, 94 Va. 66, 26 S. E. Rep. 392, the retention of the possession of personal property by the vendor after an absolute sale is prima facie fraudulent against creditors of the vendor, though not as against a subsequent purchaser for value, without notice of the prior sale, but this presumption may be rebutted by proof. In the case at bar there was a bona fide sale for value of a stock of goods, and delivery of possession, and the facts that the vendor did not transfer his license to the vendee before levy on the stock; that the name of the vendor upon the window shades, which had constituted his only sign remained as before; and that the vendor and his former clerk remained in the store and sold goods, do not, in view of other evidence in the cause, establish a case of fraud upon creditors of the vendor. Nor, under the admitted fact, does section 287 of the Virginia Code apply.

But in Mason v. Bond, 9 Leigh 181, the court declared that while it is a general rule, that an absolute sale of chattels not accompanied and followed with transfer of possession to the vendee, is per se fraudulent and void as against creditors of the vendor; and though there are exceptions to the rule, yet it is no ground of exception, that the possession at the time of the sale was in a third person, if, notwithstanding such possession, the vendor had a right, and it was in his power, to take the possession and deliver it to the vendee. Mason v. Bond, 9 Leigh 181.

Nevertheless, in the absence of a fraudulent intent, it is not fraudulent per se as to creditors, in one, who has assumed an indebtedness of a firm, in consideration of a sale of specified merchandise, to allow such merchandise to remain in said firm's possession to be disposed of in the usual course of trade. King v. Levy (Va. 1805), 22 S. E. Rep. 492.

But a bill of sale of chattels, which is absolute in form, executed by a debtor,—but which is in fact a mortgage to secure a debt, is fraudulent and void, as it tends to deceive and injure others. Shields v. Anderson, 8 Leigh 729; Clark v. Hardiman, 2 Leigh 347.

And if personal property is mortgaged, and is afterwards sold absolutely to the mortgagee but the bill of sale is not recorded, it is fraudulent as against a subsequent purchaser. And a court of equity will (under the particular circumstances), entertain a bill to recover the property as against the fraudulent vendee who has clandestinely gotten possession of the property. Such fraudulent vendee, cannot prevent a recovery, by showing that the plaintiff did not take possession at the instant of the purchase; because such an omission as this cannot make a fraudulent sale good. Glasscock v. Batton, 6 Rand. 78.

So if there is an absolute bill of sale of slaves, by an executor, and he is permitted to retain the possession thereof, it is fraudulent and void, as to legatees, as well as creditors and purchasers. Robertson v. Ewell, 3 Munf. 1.

But where a purchaser of property leaves it in the possession of the original owner, but the possession thereof is taken by the administrator of the purchaser before creditors have acquired a specific lien thereon, by judgment and execution, it is not liable to the creditors of the original owner. Carr v. Glasscock, 8 Gratt. 343 (1846).

Similarly, if there is a sale of personal property under an execution, by a sheriff, and it is bona fide, though irregular, the sale is valid, even though the purchaser leaves the property with the debtor in the execution; moreover, the property is not liable to the creditors of the debtor in execution. Carr v. Glasscock, 8 Gratt. 343 (1846).

And where an owner of personal property has bailed it out to a third party, and then gives an absolute bill of sale to a vendee, and the vendee at the expiration of the time for which it is bailed out, applies to the bailee to deliver the property to him, and the bailee tells him that he may have possession, but he does not take actual possession, but leaves the property in the hands of the bailee, the bill of sale is good against the creditors of the vendor. Kroesen v. Seevers, 5 Leigh 472.

c. Possession Retained by Donor.—In Charlton v. Gardner, 11 Leigh 281, the father in consideration of natural love and affection, made a deed, which was duly recorded, conveying slaves and other property to three infant children, upon the condition understood and reserved, that the slaves were to remain in the donor's possession, during his life, and if his wife should survive him, that she should have the use of one-third of the slaves and their increase, during her life. At the time of executing the deed, the father was indebted by two bonds, on which judgments were afterwards obtained, and the executions returned satisfied. Subsequent to the deed, the father became appearance bail, and a judgment was obtained against him as such, and the execution thereon was levied upon the slaves so conveyed, which were still in his possession and they were sold by the sheriff. After the father's death an action of detinue was brought against the purchaser by the widow and children jointly, and another action was brought by the children alone; in each of which cases there was a special verdict, finding the facts as above mentioned. Upon these facts, the court held, that the action in which the widow was joined could not be maintained, but that the action by the children alone was well brought; and further, the facts found did not constitute fraud per se; and so far as the fraud was a matter of fact, the jury not having found fraud, the court could not as a matter of law infer it.

B. CONDITIONAL TRANSFERS.

1. LOANS.

Loans, and Reservations of a Use or Property, to Be Recorded.—Where any loan of goods or chattels is pretended to have been made to any person with whom, or those claiming under him, possession shall have remained five years without demand made and pursued by due process of law on the part of the pretended lender, or where any reservation or limitation is pretended to have been made of a use or property, by way of condition, reversion, remainder or otherwise, in goods or chattels, the possession whereof shall have so remained in another as aforesaid, the absolute property shall be taken to be with the possession, and such loan, reservation, or limitation void as to creditors of and purchasers from the person so remaining in possession, unless such loan, reservation, or limitation be declared by will which, or a copy of which is, by deed, or other writing, duly admitted to record within the said five years in the county or corporation in which said goods or chattels may be. Va. Code 1887, ch. 109, sec. 2461, p. 599; Taylor v. Beale, 4 Gratt. 93; Lightfoot v. Strother, 9 Leigh 451.

However, proof of notice of the loan, from the lender, recorded in the court of a county wherein neither of the parties live, is not sufficient to do away with the effect of possession in the loanee. Gay v. Moseley, 2 Munf. 543.

So a deed declaring a loan of a slave from a father to his daughter during her life (being admitted to record on proof by one witness only), is not good against her husband's creditors, or purchasers from him, without notice of such deed; possession of such slave having remained with the husband for five years without interruption. Lacy v. Wilson, 4 Munf. 313 (1814); Beasley v. Owen, 3 H. & M. 449. And in Garth v. Barksdale, 5 Munf. 101, it is held that five years' peaceable and uninterrupted possession of slaves, under a loan not evidenced by deed duly recorded, vests a title in the loanee, which inures in favor of his creditors, and cannot be divested as to them, by his returning the same to the lender, after the five years have expired. See also, Gay v. Moseley, 2 Munf. 543. So, if a debtor remains in possession of slaves for five years, under a parol loan, they are liable to satisfy his creditors, though the possession is resumed by the lender before executions are levied upon them. Beale v. Digges, 6 Gratt. 582.

But the creditors meant are those whose debts were contracted before the resumption of possession, or conveyance of the chattels by the lender—they having given credit to the loanee on the apparent ownership of the property. Scott v. Jones, 76 Va. 233.

And where possession has remained with the loanee or with those claiming under him for five years, and is then resumed by the creditor, the possession must continue with the lender the full period of five years from the time it was actually resumed, before the title will be revested in the lender as against a creditor of the loanee. Pate v. Baker, 8 Leigh 80. It is to be observed, however, that § 2461, Va. Code 1887, does not apply to the case of property remaining in possession of a debtor for more than five years, on hire. Therefore, slaves remaining in possession of one person on hire for more than five years, are not subject to be taken in execution for his debts. McKenzie v. Macon, 5 Gratt. 379 (1849).

Yet, a loan of slaves, though not declared by deed in writing duly recorded, and therefore void as to creditors, the loanee having continued in possession for five years without such demand, as would bar their right, is nevertheless effectual between the parties and their representatives. If, therefore, the loanee died in possession of such slaves, they are not to be considered assets belonging to his estate, nor can be recovered as such; being liable to his creditors so far as their claims remain unsatisfied by their assets in the hands of his executor or administrator, but no farther. Boyd v. Stalnback, 5 Munf. 305; Scott v. Jones, 76 Va. 233.

Likewise, if a father-in-law puts slaves into the possession of his son-in-law on loan, no length of possession will give the lendee title against the lender, till such possession has become adverse by demand and refusal of the possession. Cross v. Cross, 9 Leigh 245.

So, if a father sends a slave to a son upon a loan, but the agent who takes the slave to the son, neglects to inform him that the slave is a loan, the neglect of the agent does not effect the right of the father to have the slave considered as a loan. Dickinson v. Dickinson, 2 Gratt. 493 (1846).

When the Operation of the Statute Is Avoided.—Nevertheless, according to the settled construction of the clause in the statute of frauds, Va. Code 1887, § 2461, concerning loans, a resumption of possession by the lender, or the recorded deed or will granting away the property to another within five years, avoids the operation of the statute and puts an end to the loan. Collins v. Lofftus, 10 Leigh 5; Scott v. Jones, 76 Va. 233.

And, if the property be sold before possession shall have remained five years with the loanee or those claiming under him, the loan is not, under the statute, taken to be fraudulent as to the purchaser. Lightfoot v. Strother, 9 Leigh 451.

But a demand of slaves by the lender, who thereupon receives, and immediately redelivers them to the loanee to be held on the same terms, as before such demand, receipt, and redelivery being in private, is not sufficient to bar the rights of creditors, under the act to prevent fraud and perjuries. Boyd v. Stainback, 5 Munf. 306 (1817); Va. Code 1887, § 2461.

And it is to be further noted that, after a loan to a person with whom, or with those claiming under him, possession has remained five years and a deed is made by the lender, declaring the original loan and continuing it; but this deed is never admitted to record, it cannot affect the creditor of a person in possession, and the deed is not to be received as evidence against such creditor. Pate v. Baker, 8 Leigh 80.

2. DEEDS OF TRUST.

a. In General.

Deed Executed without Knowledge of Creditors—When Valid.—Though a deed of trust be executed without the knowledge of the creditors secured by it, yet if when informed of its execution they assent to it, it is valid. Cochran v. Paris, 11 Gratt. 348. See also, Dance v. Seaman, 11 Gratt. 778.

Deed Secures Debts Not Due—Trustee Is Not Authorized to Take Possession of Trust Property—Validity.—However, a deed, conveying a stock of goods and merchandise, and notes and accounts of a merchant to a trustee to secure the payment of notes not then due, which provides that said conveyance shall cover "such goods and merchandise as may be added to said stock, from time to time, by the grantor and brought into the store in course of business, or to take the place of such goods as may hereafter be sold," but does not authorize the trustee to take possession or control of said goods until the grantor has made default in the payment of one or more of said notes, and has been refused to do so by the holder or holders of such note or notes, is as against the unsecured creditors of the grantor fraudulent and void on its face, although it provides that the "trustee, by himself or by his agent or attorney, shall at once take possession" of the notes and accounts transferred by such deed, and collect the same for the benefit of the trust creditors.

Nor is such deed validated or its character affected by the fact, that subsequent to its execution and on the same day a second trust deed is made between the same grantor and grantee, conveying the same goods and merchandise, to secure other and different cestuis que trustent, which authorizes the trustee to take possession of said goods and merchandise at once, "and manage and control the same for the benefit and advantage of the parties secured and indemnified by the deed." Clafin v. Foley, 22 W. Va. 434.

Insolvency of the Trust—Deed Not Necessarily Void.—The fact that a trustee in a trust deed is insolvent and untrustworthy will not, of itself, make the deed void; but in such case the court may appoint a receiver, and administer the trust according to the provisions of the deed. Cohn v. Ward, 32 W. Va. 34, 9 S. E. Rep. 41.

Deeds Executed with Improper Motive—Provisions to Hinder, Delay and Defraud Creditors Not Secured.—And a creditor who takes a conveyance from his debtor, to secure his debt, and at the same time, inserts provisions in the deed, to delay, hinder, or defraud other creditors, comes within the statute of frauds, and the conveyance is void. Garland v. Rives, 4 Rand. 282.

So, likewise, if the grantee be privy to a fraudulent intent on the part of the grantor, and takes a deed to secure his own debt, with provisions to delay, hinder, or defraud other creditors, the deed will be void, although his only motive was, to secure his own debt, and the other provisions were forced upon him by the grantor, as the only means of having his own debt secured. Such a grantee will not be considered as a bona fide purchaser. Garland v. Rives, 4 Rand. 282.

But a deed of trust executed in part to secure fraudulent debts, and partly to secure a bona fide debt, the bona fide creditor having no notice of the dishonest purpose on the part of the grantor, is a valid security for the bona fide debt. Billups v. Sears, 5 Gratt. 31.

So the fact that the grantor in a trust deed made to secure, among other things, the surety on a building contract of the grantor, performed the contract, after executing the deed, so that no liability remained on the surety, does not show that the deed was executed with improper motives. Harvey v. Anderson (Va.), 24 S. E. Rep. 914. See, in general connection, Gardner v. Johnston, 9 W. Va. 403; Spence v. Bagwell, 6 Gratt. 444.

b. Provisions Which Postpone the Time for Enforcing the Deed—Effect.—Though a deed is not fraudulent by reason of a postponement of the time of sale, and the reserving the property to the grantor in the meantime, yet where the time of the sale may be postponed or hastened by the grantor, so as to enable him to defeat any creditor who should attempt to subject the interest in the property reserved to the grantor, to the payment of his debt, the deed is fraudulent. Quarles v. Kerr, 14 Gratt. 48.

But a trust deed conveying real and personal property, including a stock of store goods, is not per se fraudulent because it postpones the sale of real estate for six months from the date of the deed, and authorizes the trustee, after taking an inventory of the store goods, to take control of them, and sell the same at private sale, if that can be done in six months, and then sell the residue at public auction; in either case the sales to be in the best possible manner for the interests of the creditors of the grantor. Cohn v. Ward, 32 W. Va. 34, 9 S. E. Rep. 41. And a deed which conveys land to secure a bona fide debt, which is not to be enforced for two years, and only then or afterwards upon a notice of the sale for one hundred and twenty days, is valid against creditors. Such a deed is valid though the execution of the deed is postponed for five years from the date of the conveyance; and the rents and profits of the property in the meantime, are reserved to the grantor. Lewis v. Caperton, 8 Gratt. 148. So a deed of trust which among other things conveys growing crops of wheat, rye and oats, and which is not to be enforced for two years from its date, is not necessarily fraudulent as to creditors. Cochran v. Paris, 11 Gratt. 348. Moreover, a deed which conveys without a schedule, household furniture, the various kinds of stock on a farm, bacon and lard, to secure a bona fide debt, but not to be enforced for eighteen months after its execution, is valid against creditors, though the deed was made without the knowledge of the creditor, and the grantor was indebted to insolvency at the time of the conveyance. Lewis v. Caperton, 8 Gratt. 148.

And a deed executed bona fide to secure a loan of money, not to be enforced for ten years, is a valid deed as against creditors of the grantor. Lewis v. Caperton, 8 Gratt. 148.

c. Deed Furnishing Security against Losses and Liabilities—Potential Lien.—A deed of trust, though made solely to secure one against any future loss as indorser, cannot for that reason be impeached, if made bona fide. Harvey v. Anderson (Va.), 24 S. E. Rep. 914.

Thus, in Alexandria Savings Inst. v. Thomas, 29 Gratt. 483, by deed which was duly recorded in January, 1856, the grantor and his wife conveyed a house and lot in trust to secure a certain beneficiary against any loss or damage which he might sustain by his acceptance of any drafts or bills which might thereafter be drawn by the grantor upon the beneficiary, which acceptance the beneficiary had agreed to make for the accommodation of the grantor. The beneficiary, accordingly, from the date of the deed to January, 1861, accepted the drafts of the grantor to a large amount, and the grantor was indebted to him for much more than the house and lot was worth. In 1871, a certain savings bank, being the holder of three of the notes of the grantor in the deed of trust, given on renewals of notes which were due before the date of the deed, filed a bill against the grantor as an absent defendant, to attach the house and lot, insisting that the deed having been given to secure future advancements, was null and void as to the creditors of the grantor. The court held that, though the beneficiary secured in the deed of trust was under no liability for the grantor when the deed was executed, it was, nevertheless, a valid security for all of his acceptances for the grantor given before some other creditor had acquired a lien on the house and lot conveyed in the deed of trust.

Moreover, a deed which conveys future rents and profits of property conveyed in other deeds, which were reserved to the grantor in the previous deeds, for the purpose of paying a bona fide debt, is valid against creditors of the grantor. Lewis v. Caperton, 8 Gratt. 148.

d. Reservations to the Vendor.—It is well settled that conveyances professedly to indemnify creditors, but expressly or impliedly reserving to the grantors powers inconsistent and adequate to defeat such purpose, are void as to creditors and purchasers. Wray v. Davenport, 79 Va. 19; McCormick v. Atkinson, 78 Va. 8; Saunders v. Waggoner, 82 Va. 316; Sheppards v. Turpin, 3 Gratt. 373; Lang v. Lee, 3 Rand. 410; Addington v. Etheridge, 12 Gratt. 486; Perry v. Shen. Val. Nat. Bank, 27 Gratt. 755. See also, Hughes v. Epling, 98 Va. 426, 25 S. E. Rep. 105; Norris v. Lake, 89 Va. 517, 16 S. E. Rep. 663; Harden v. Wagner, 22 W. Va. 364; Claffin v. Foley, 22 W. Va. 441. See further, in this connection, Paul v. Baugh, 85 Va. 955, 9 S. E. Rep. 329; Young v. Willis, 82 Va. 291; Kuhn v. Mack, 4 W. Va. 186; Marks v. Hill, 15 Gratt. 400. So where an insolvent debtor conveys his land even for valuable, though inadequate consideration, with a secret reservation, that he shall for the time have use of the land without payment of rent, this fact is evident, that the conveyance was made with fraudulent intent. Livesay v. Beard, 22 W. Va. 585.

And a deed of trust on lands and personal property with no definitely fixed period at which a sale could be required, and which puts it in the power of the grantor by collusion, or otherwise, to indefinitely postpone a sale thereunder, and of the live stock conveyed by the deed, and the increase thereof, and all future crops to be raised from the ground in the quiet enjoyment of the grantor, from which to support his family and pay the debts secured thereon, as he may deem most advantageous, is fraudulent on its face and void. Such deed being fraudulent on its face is void in toto and cannot stand as security for the debts therein attempted to be secured. Livesay v. Beard, 22 W. Va. 585.

Moreover, a deed of trust on a stock of merchandise which provides that the grantor shall be suffered to remain in the possession and enjoyment thereof until default is made in the payment of the debt secured, and request by the creditor to foreclose, and without accountability to the trustee for the proceeds of sale made by the grantor, is fraudulent per se. Hughes v. Epling, 98 Va. 424, 25 S. E. Rep. 105.

Nevertheless, where a deed of trust to secure certain debts, conveys certain real estate, and the grantor reserves in it, to himself and his family all exemptions and property allowed by the constitution of Virginia, and all laws passed in pursuance thereof, and in addition thereto all exemptions allowed under the bankrupt laws, such reservation is legal and valid, and does not render the deed void on the ground of any fraudulent intent on the part of the grantor. Brockenbrough v. Brockenbrough 31 Gratt. 580 (1879).

Neither is a trust deed on a stock of goods for the security of creditors which provides that the trustees shall take immediate possession of such goods, and manage them for the benefit of the trust, fraudulent per se, and void as to creditors, because it contains a provision allowing the grantor, without the power of sale, to replenish such stock of goods, and extending the trust to cover the same. Baer Sons Grocer Co. v. Williams, 48 W. Va. 323, 27 S. E. Rep. 345.

So a reservation in a deed to secure creditors, of the right to manage property therein conveyed for three years before sale, the rents and profits in the meantime to belong to the creditors secured, is not such an unreasonable restraint upon the power of sale as to constitute a fraud in itself. Noyes v. Carter (Va.), 28 S. E. Rep. 1.

In Kevan v. Branch, 1 Gratt. 274, the court held that a deed of trust for the benefit of creditors was not fraudulent, which conveyed among other things, cattle, household and kitchen furniture, and debts, without specification, either in the deed, or by schedule accompanying it; and further provided that the grantor should remain in possession of the property, for six months; and that no creditors should have the benefit of the trust, who did not release the grantor from any further liability, in three months. Philpen v. Durham, 8 Gratt. 457.

And in Baldwin v. Van Wagener, 83 W. Va. 293, 10 S. E. Rep. 716, where a piano was delivered under an agreement in writing purporting to rent the same at $10 per month, the owner agreeing that when $300, the value of the piano, was paid in such monthly payments or otherwise, the title to the piano should vest in the renter, the court held, that such writing showed a sale upon a condition precedent, and, under the provisions of sec. 3, ch. 74, W. Va. Code 1887, the reservation of the title, unless a notice thereof is duly recorded, is void as to the creditors of the purchaser.

However, where a vendor agrees to sell to the vendee personal property for a price agreed to be paid at any future time, and delivers possession, but expressly retains title until payment, it is a conditional sale, and though by parol or by an unrecorded instrument, it is, nevertheless, valid as against vendee's creditors or subsequent purchasers, with or without notice. This on the ground that such transaction, not being a chattel mortgage, but a conditional sale does not come within the scope of the Va. Code of 1873, ch. 114, § 5. McComb v. Donald, 82 Va. 903, 5 S. E. Rep. 558 (1876); O. D. Steamship Co. v. Burkhardt, 81 Gratt. 664 (1879). But see Va. Code 1887, § 2462, which provides that, every sale or contract for the sale of goods or chattels, wherein the title is reserved until the same be paid for in whole or in part, or the transfer of the title is made to depend on any condition, and possession be delivered to the vendee, shall be void as to creditors of, and purchasers for value without notice from said vendee, unless such sale or contract be evidenced by writing executed by the vendor, in which the said reservation or condition is expressed, and until and except from the time the said writing is duly admitted to record in the county or corporation in which said goods or chattels may be, etc.

g. Provisions Conferring Special Powers upon the Trustee, and Providing for His Compensation—Validity.—A discretionary power vested in a trustee to run and operate the business for a year, if he deem it wise to do so, having in view the interest of the creditors secured, does not render void per se a deed of conveyance of a stock of goods. Nor is such deed rendered void by the further provision empowering the trustee to replenish the stock by cash purchases of such articles as will aid in keeping up the business, and disposing of the other stock to better advantage. Hurst v. Leckie, 97 Va. 550, 34 S. E. Rep. 464. See also, Williams v. Lord, 75 Va. 390.

Thus, as held in Marks v. Hill, 15 Gratt. 400, a provision in a deed of trust to secure creditors, that the trustee may continue the business and replenish the stock, if intended merely as a means of realizing the trust fund, and with a view to winding up the business, is not fraudulent per se, so as to avoid the deed. And in such a case a provision in the deed that one of the grantors shall attend to the business, he being under the control of the trustee, who may at any time on his motion, and shall at the request of creditors, sell the property at auction, is not fraudulent per se, so as to avoid the deed. Harden v. Wagner, 23 W. Va. 356. Neither will a provision in a deed of trust authorizing the trustee to sell the property at private sales render the deed fraudulent on its face. Landeman v. Wilson, 29 W. Va. 702, 2 S. E. Rep. 203.

And a trust deed given to secure a note payable one day after date which conveys personal property and chases in action, is not fraudulent merely because it provides that the trustee shall sell the property conveyed on demand by the cestuis que trust or either of them. Harden v. Wagner, 23 W. Va. 356. So a provision in a deed of trust on a stock of goods to secure creditors, which authorizes the trustee to dispose of the stock in due course of trade, does not render the deed fraudulent on its face, nor is the deed rendered void by a failure to provide in express terms for a sale by the trustee on request of the creditors secured. Taylor v. Mahoney, 94 Va. 508, 27 S. E. Rep. 107. Similarly a conveyance to a trustee of a stock of goods to secure creditors, which authorizes the trustee to sell in the usual course of trade for a limited period, and to that end to employ clerks and salesmen, is not invalidated by the fact that the trustee employs the grantor as his chief salesman to dispose of the stock of goods. Hurst v. Leckie, 97 Va. 550, 34 S. E. Rep. 464.

Moreover, a provision in a deed of trust for 10 per cent. commissions for the trustee, though more than provided by statute, is not evidence of fraudulent intent, this not being shown to be excessive or unreasonable compensation. Harvey v. Anderson (Va.), 24 S. E. Rep. 914.

f. Special Privileges Given to Certain Creditors—When Valid.—The inclusion, in a deed of trust to secure certain creditors, of the balance due on a building contract, without regard to rights of subcontractors, has little if any weight on the question whether the deed was made with fraudulent intent. Harvey v. Anderson (Va.), 24 S. E. Rep. 914.

And where a deed of trust is made by an insolvent debtor conveying his household and kitchen furniture to secure a bona fide debt due from him to his mother and payable at six months, with a provision in the deed that the creditor shall retain the possession, use and enjoyment of the property, until there is a default in the payment of the debt at maturity, and the trustee be required by the debtor to sell the same, the conveyance is valid. Klee v. Reitzenberger, 23 W. Va. 749.

But where a deed of trust is made about the same time by the same debtor, conveying the store goods and merchandise in his store to secure other creditors, with provisions of a similar character, it is invalid; and what purports to be an absolute sale of the same goods made shortly afterwards by the debtor to the principal creditor secured in the deed of trust, without the consent of the trustee or the other creditors, in consideration of the debts secured in the deed, but without any actual delivery of the goods so sold, and the seller afterwards conducts the store in the name of the purchaser, will be held to be a part of the same fraudulent transaction, and under the circumstances both the trust deed and the subsequent pretended sale will be held fraudulent and void as to the creditors of the grantor. Klee v. Reitzenberger, 23 W. Va. 749.

C. CASES ILLUSTRATING CIRCUMSTANCES UNDER WHICH TRANSFERS HAVE BEEN DECLARED VALID, THOUGH ATTACKED AS FRAUDULENT.

Sale of Land by Execution Debtor.—A sale of a tract of land, by a debtor charged in execution, is not necessarily fraudulent and void as to the creditors at whose suit he is in custody, but may be supported, if made to a bona fide creditor, for a reasonable consideration, and without any secret agreement, or understanding between the parties, that the land is to be holden for the use and benefits of such debtor. Bullock v. Gordon, 4 Munf. 450.

Conveyance by Wife Immediately before Marriage.—And a conveyance made by a woman immediately before her marriage is prima facie good, and can be impeached only by proof of fraud. Pusey v. Gardner, 21 W. Va. 469.

Thus, in Prior v. Kinney, 6 Munf. 510, an agreement was made between two unmarried sisters, that the property of the one who should die first, or be married, should, in either event, belong to the other; in consideration of which agreement, one of them, by a deed of gift executed two days before her marriage, conveyed all her slaves to her sister, who, after the marriage, lived partly with her, and partly with her brother; permitting the husband (who was in embarrassed circumstances), to have the use of the slaves; except two, whom the donee retained in her own employment, and principally to wait upon herself. This deed, though admitted to record on the oath of one of the subscribing witnesses, one swearing to the handwriting of another who was dead, was adjudged not to be fraudulent as to the creditors of the husband, notwithstanding a judgment for the debt had been rendered against him, and was unsatisfied, when it was executed, and when the marriage was solemnized. See Leonard v. Smith, 34 W. Va. 442, 12 S. E. Rep. 479.

Conveyance from Child to Parent.—So a conveyance from a child to its parent, whether with or without a valuable consideration, is presumed to be valid in the absence of any circumstances of proof tending to show fraud, misrepresentation or undue influence, on reasonable ground, from which the court may presume that the act was not entirely free and voluntary on the part of the child. Pusey v. Gardner, 21 W. Va. 469.

Conveyance by Insolvent in Consideration of an Antecedent Debt—Creditor Knows of Insolvency.—Moreover, a conveyance in consideration of an antecedent debt, from an insolvent to his creditor, without fraudulent intent in the creditor though the creditor know of his debtor's insolvency, does not alone stamp the conveyance as one fraudulent in fact and utterly void; but it stands for the benefit of all creditors, including the one thus preferred. Herold v. Barlow (W. Va.), 36 S. E. Rep. 8.

Title Bond Given in Husband's Name, but Consideration Paid Out of Wife's Separate Estate.—So in Hamilton v. Steele, 22 W. Va. 348, the court declares, that if a title bond for land is executed by a vendor of the land to a husband, and the consideration is paid by the husband as the agent of his wife, directly from the proceeds of the sale of certain separate estate belonging to the wife, the husband having no estate or means of his own, and the circumstances show that the purchase is made for the wife, and the deed is subsequently made by the vendor directly to the wife, such deed is not fraudulent as against the creditors of the husband, and the land cannot be subjected to the payment of the debts of the husband's creditors.

Consideration Composed of a Promise to Pay Off Grantor's Debts and Abandon a Suit for Divorce.—And in Casto v. Fry, 33 W. Va. 449, 10 S. E. Rep. 799, a worthless husband, indebted to insolvency, in pursuance of an agreement that his wife would abandon her purpose to sue for a divorce, and that she and her sons would pay certain specified debts of the husband, which he asserted and they believed were all he owed, amounting to over $800, conveyed to a third person, who on the same day conveyed to the wife, real estate worth from $600 to $800. The wife and sons at the time assumed to pay, and afterwards, in good faith and without notice of any fraud, did pay off said debts. Upon these facts the court declared that, the conveyance was valid as against the creditors of the husband whose debts existed prior to and at the time of the conveyance, but of which the wife had no notice.

Assignment of Bond in Consideration of Maintenance—Validity as to Existing Creditors.—Likewise in Hisle v. Rudasill, 89 Va. 519, 16 S. E. Rep. 673, two maiden ladies, the one an invalid and the other fifty-five years old, without means except certain bonds of uncertain value, assigned these bonds to a certain assignee, in consideration that this assignee would support them during their lives. The assignee did not know certain prior creditors of theirs, these creditors taking no steps to enforce their claims until more than twenty years after the assignment was made. Thenceforth they both resided with the assignee; the invalid continuing with him twenty-three years, until her death, the other still continuing. There was no evidence that the transaction was voluntary or fraudulent. Neither assignor sought to annul it. The court held upon these facts that it was a contract of hazard and the bill of the prior creditor to set it aside was without merit.

Execution Creditor Purchases the Debtor's Property and Permits It to Remain in His Possession.—So in Wilson v. Butler, 3 Munf. 559, a suit on a bond was brought against the debtor in a county in which he did not reside; he confessed judgment on the return of the writ, and furnished the sheriff having the execution, with a list of slaves, and other property of his, to be advertised for sale at his house; the property (without being seen by the sheriff until the day of the sale) was advertised, and sold to the creditor, for a fair price, though no other person bid; the creditor (whose claim was proved to be just and bona fide), being a brother of the debtor's wife, permitted the property to remain in the debtor's possession, and within five years afterwards conveyed the same, in trust, for the use of the wife and children of the debtor, by a deed recorded in a different county from that in which the property was. The court held that none of these circumstances were considered unfair; and the deed was adjudged to be good against others creditors.

Land Conveyed in Consideration of Stock—Effect as to Creditors.—And in Baker v. Naglee, 83 Va. 876, 1 S. E. Rep. 191, a grantor conveyed land, in exchange for stock, to an incorporated company, which conveyed it to secure bonds issued by it. The grantor's creditor subsequently filed a bill, alleging that the grantor and the company were one and the same, and that the conveyance was a contrivance to hinder, delay and defraud his creditors; and prayed that the conveyance be annulled and the issue and sale of the bonds be enjoined. The court held the conveyance valid, the stock a valuable consideration, and that there was no proof of fraud in the transaction.

Purchase under Deed of Assignment, by Mother and Aunt of Assignor—Subsequent Sale to Wives of Assignors—Business Managed by Husbands.—In Catlett v. Alsop (Va. 1901.) 7 Va. Law Reg. 623, a purchaser at a sale by the trustee under a deed of assignment made by a firm, was the mother of one of the partners and aunt of the other. She purchased the stock of goods for $1,500, to be credited on her debt of $3,000, preferred in and secured by the assignment. She continued business in the name of the firm as her agent. Subsequently she sold the stock to the wives of the partners on their agreement to pay her the balance due from the firm. This agreement was reduced to writing a year later. On payment of such balance, she relinquished to the wives all claim to the stock of goods, and they continued the business under the management of their husbands, but in their own names. The wives had no experience in business, nor separate estates, when they contracted to purchase the goods. The Va. Code of 1887, § 2287, allows a married woman to carry on business on her own account and § 2285 provides that her own separate estate shall not be subject to the use or control of her husband, or for his debts or liabilities. The court held, that no fraud was shown sufficient to subject the profits of the business and property purchased therewith to the claims of the creditors.

III. RIGHTS AND LIABILITIES.

A. IMMEDIATE PARTIES.

1. VENDOR AND VENDEE.

a. In General.—A deed, though fraudulent and void as to creditors, is nevertheless valid and binding between the parties to the fraud, which brought it into existence. Core v. Cunningham, 27 W. Va. 207; Thomas v. Soper, 5 Munf. 28; Alexander v. Deneale, 2 Munf. 341; Gay v. Moseley, 2 Munf. 548; Robertson v. Ewell, 3 Munf. 1. And in Far. Bank v. Corder, 32 W. Va. 233, 9 S. E. Rep. 220, it is held to be error for the court to set it aside in toto. Linsey v. McGannon, 9 W. Va. 154; Thornburg v. Bowen, 37 W. Va. 538, 16 S. E. Rep. 825.

But a party who, to hinder and delay his creditors, fraudulently conveys his property to another, cannot, except under peculiar circumstances, maintain a bill to rescind the contract. The grantor and grantee being generally in pari delicto, neither is entitled to come into equity. James v. Bird, 8 Leigh 510.

And where a suit has been brought to set aside a deed as fraudulent and subject the land to the payment of a judgment, which with interest is less than $100, but the land is worth $150, the judgment debtor, and grantor, is not entitled to appeal from a decree declaring the deed fraudulent, but the grantee, whose land is subjected, the value thereof being more than $100, is entitled to an appeal. Parker v. Valentine, 27 W. Va. 677.

And where a suit has been brought to subject land to the payment of a lien, and to set aside a fraudulent conveyance, and the report of the sale has been made, and it is found that there will not be sufficient money produced by the sale to pay the lien, expense of sale and costs, there should be rendered a personal decree against all the fraudulent grantors and grantees, for whatever costs remain after providing for the payment of the liens and expenses of the sale. Hinton v. Ellis, 27 W. Va. 422.

And it is well to observe in this connection, that where property is incumbent to its full value by reason of prior liens thereon, an insolvent debtor may convey it in satisfaction of such prior liens, without rendering it subject to the provisions of section 2, ch. 74, W. Va. Code 1891: for such conveyance is not to the exclusion or prejudice of other creditors, but only amounts to the surrender of a valueless equity of redemption. Johnson v. Riley, 41 W. Va. 140, 23 S. E. Rep. 668.

b. Vendor.—Until there is a legal lien by judgment or execution fixed upon the debtor's property, he may, though insolvent or in failing circumstances, convey or transfer his estate in trust; and if it be done in good faith, he may thereby prefer one creditor to another without committing fraud, within the statute, upon the creditors who are delayed or hindered by such conveyance. Nor is it an objection that the conveyance defeats all other creditors of their legal remedies, though they be a majority in number and value. Harden v. Wagner, 22 W. Va. 356.

Claim of Homestead—Deed Annulled and Set Aside.—

And where there is a fraudulent conveyance of property, which is subsequently annulled at the suit of a creditor, the grantor is not estopped as against such creditor to assert his right of homestead in the premises. Wray v. Davenport, 79 Va. 19; Marshall v. Sears, 79 Va. 49; Hatcher v. Crews, 83 Va. 371, 5 S. E. Rep. 221; Wilkinson v. Merrill, 87 Va. 513, 12 S. E. Rep. 1015; 1 Min. Inst. (4th Ed.) 910-911. See also, Mahoney v. James, 94 Va. 180, 26 S. E. Rep. 384; Shipe v. Repass, 28 Gratt. 716; Russell v. Randolph, 26 Gratt. 705; Boynton v. McNeal, 31 Gratt. 456; Calhoun v. Williams, 32 Gratt. 18; Oppenheim v. Myers (Va. 1901), 7 Va. Law Reg. 269.

In this latter case it was held, that where a bill is filed to set aside as fraudulent a deed made by a married woman, her husband having died leaving infant children dependent on their mother for a support; and the deed is set aside as fraudulent and the widow claims the homestead, that the right of the widow to claim the homestead is superior to the lien given creditors by § 2460, Va. Code 1887, relative to setting aside fraudulent conveyances, on filing their bill.

Sale Induced by Fraud—Vendor's Rights.—It may be observed in this connection that the doctrine is now well established, that if the owner is fraudulently induced to sell his goods (fraud in the inducement as distinguished from fraud in esse contractus), yet the sale passes the title, and that the vendor, on discovering the fraud, may disavow the sale and reclaim the goods, provided they have not passed into the hands of a bona fide purchaser. Oberdorfer v. Meyer, 88 Va. 384, 13 S. E. Rep. 756.

Fraudulent Vendor's Liability to a Bona Fide Purchaser.—And in Whitehorn v. Hines, 1 Munf. 557, the court declares that a bona fide purchaser, without notice of fraud, having received a deed from two persons (one of whom fraudulently induced the other to join therein), is not responsible in equity; but the loss ought to fall on the fraudulent vendor.

c. Married Women as Vendors.—Where it is clearly shown that a married woman holds a bona fide debt against her husband, she is entitled to the same legal rights as any other creditor, except as to remedy. Righter v. Riley, 42 W. Va. 633, 26 S. E. Rep. 357. And in the absence of fraud, a settlement upon a wife by her husband, will not be disturbed unless it manifestly appears to be grossly excessive. Burwell v. Lumsden, 24 Gratt. 443; Payne v. Hutcheson, 32 Gratt. 812; Kanawha Val. Bk. v. Wilson, 25 W. Va. 242. So improvements afterwards put upon the property by the husband or father cannot be subjected by creditors to the payment of their debts, unless such improvements were put upon the property with intent to hinder, delay or defraud the creditors of the husband or father. Lockhard v. Beckley, 10 W. Va. 87.

See, in this connection, Hall v. Hyer (W. Va. 1900), 37 S. E. Rep. 594, in which case a solvent husband put improvements on his wife's separate property to the amount of $1,100; afterwards, she as surety, joined in a deed of trust on the property to secure his individual indebtedness to an amount in excess of $1,100. It was held that, former creditors of the husband could not attack such property because of the gift of the improvements by the husband to the wife, so long as such trust debt remained unpaid by the husband, and the wife was liable for the same, as such trust debt unpaid was equivalent to revocation of the debt.

As a consideration to support such settlement, dower to the extent of its value, or the wife's equity in property, is deemed a valuable consideration. Walden v. Walden, 83 Gratt. 88; Burwell v. Lumsden, 24 Gratt. 443. It is further held that, the participation of the wife in the fraud of the husband will not impair her rights, where she has given an equivalent for the property out of her dower. Blanton v. Taylor, Gilmer 209. And formerly, it was settled principle of law, as declared in Clay v. Walter & Co., 79 Va. 92, that whatever the design of the grantor, a settlement on a woman in contemplation and in consideration of marriage, was valid, unless her knowledge of his intended fraud was clearly and satisfactorily proved; and it was held that service by creditors of the grantor, of written notice on the grantee before the marriage, of the grantor's fraudulent design in making the settlement, could not affect her constructively with notice of such design, but her actual knowledge of and participation in the fraudulent design must be clearly established by proof. If valid, the wife was deemed a purchaser for value of the property settled on her, in consideration of the marriage, and was entitled to hold it against all the world. Herring v. Wickham, 29 Gratt. 628. See also, Moore v. Butler, 90 Va. 688, 19 S. E. Rep. 850; Triplett v. Romine, 33 Gratt. 651; Coutts v. Greenhow, 2 Munf. 363; Eppes v. Randolph, 2 Call 125; Shobe v. Carr, 3 Munf. 10; Huston v. Cantrell, 11 Leigh 186; Bentley v. Harris, 2 Gratt. 357; Welles v. Cole, 6 Gratt. 645; Fones v. Rice, 9 Gratt. 568; 1 Min. Inst. (4th Ed.) 319; 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 724. But see Va. Code 1887, sec. 2459, where it is provided that as against creditors whose debts were contracted at the time the conveyance or settlement was made, marriage shall no longer be a valid consideration. Barton's Ch. Pr. (2d Ed.) 549, 550, 561, 575, 578.

Thus, the court expresses itself in Quarles v. Lacy, 4 Munf. 251: "Although it is not competent to a husband, after his marriage, to defeat or obstruct his creditors, by selling or exchanging his property, and taking a conveyance of the money or other property received therefor, to the use, or for the benefit of his wife and family (such conveyance being deemed voluntary, and fraudulent as to creditors); yet the case may be otherwise in relation to so much of such money or other property as goes to compensate the just interest of the wife. If, therefore, the wife relinquish her right of dower in other land, in consideration of such conveyance, the value of such dower ought to be saved to her, in opposition to the claims of her husband's creditors." Johnston v. Gill, 27 Gratt. 587.

But in Harrison v. Carroll, 11 Leigh 476 (1841), a husband and wife made a parol agreement, that the husband should settle personal property to the separate use of the wife, on condition that the wife would relinquish her contingent right of dower in lands of the husband, which he proposed to convey for the benefit of creditors. The settlement upon the wife was accordingly executed. Subsequent to the execution of this deed of settlement, a creditor of the husband obtained judgments against him, and sued out a fieri facias thereon, and delivered it to the sheriff. Some time after this, the wife, in pursuance of her agreement, joined her husband in a deed conveying the lands. Upon these facts, the court held that the property settled on the wife was liable to the execution of the judgment creditor, and that it was not proper for a court of equity to restrain the creditor from proceeding to make his debt out of same. This on the ground that the agreement which was the ostensible consideration, in no wise bound the wife, and in respect of every legal obligation on her, or remedy on the part of the husband or his creditors, the agreement was a mere nullity. And in the case of a mere parol unexecuted contract, between husband and wife, where nothing passed from the wife, no obligation was incurred, and no remedy existed to compel her to convey anything.

Moreover, where a wife is induced to unite with her husband in conveying away her interest in his real estate, upon condition that certain and specific property shall be settled on her in consideration of her thus parting with her rights, if such settlement is set aside and annulled at the instance of the husband's creditors, she has the right to be placed in the same position, and restored to the same rights, with which she was invested by law before she united in the deed of which the specific settlement was the consideration. However, this must be without prejudice to the rights of creditors or purchasers. Davis v. Davis, 25 Gratt. 587. So if property of the wife which a court of equity would direct to be settled upon her, is conveyed by the husband to a trustee for her benefit, the court will sustain the deed against creditors of the husband. Polindexter v. Jeffries, 15 Gratt. 363. And in Bentley v. Harris, 2 Gratt. 357, it is held, that if an embarrassed debtor makes a voluntary conveyance of personal property, to an unmarried female, and afterwards, upon her marriage, the property is settled to the use of the wife for life, and at her death to her children, it is not liable for the debts of the first donor. Bentley v. Harris, 2 Gratt. 357.

But, if it appears that the wife actively participated in the attempt to sustain a conveyance by claiming that a conditional and unfounded indebtedness is a part of the consideration for the property, the conveyance will be treated as fraudulent in fact, and void in toto as to the creditors of the husband, and will not be permitted to stand as security to the wife for the valid portion of the consideration paid by her, as against the creditors of her husband. Webb v. Ingham, 29 W. Va. 389, 1 S. E. Rep. 816.

If the grantee in a deed be a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration, his or her title is unassailable, whatever may have been the motives or intentions of the grantor in executing the deed. It is absolutely essential that both parties shall concur in the fraud, to invalidate the deed. Herring v. Wickham, 29 Gratt. 628.

Moreover, where there is no pretense of fraud in procuring a deed, creditors of a grantor upon debts contracted since the execution of the deed cannot subject the land to the payment of their debts. Irvine v. Greever, 32 Gratt. 411.

And to avoid a deed at the suit of a subsequent creditor, actual fraud must be shown. Johnston v. Zane, 11 Gratt. 552.

Thus, in Fischer v. Lee, 98 Va. 159, 35 S. E. Rep. 441, the court declares, that proof of the fraud of a grantor or transferrer of property is not sufficient of itself to avoid an assignment or transfer thereof, where value has been paid, but it must also be proved that the grantee or transferee had notice of the fraud or evil design of his vendor, or of facts and circumstances naturally calculated to excite suspicion in the mind of a person of ordinary care and prudence, and which would naturally prompt him to inquire before consummating the purchase, and that such enquiry, if diligently pursued, would have led to the knowledge or notice sought to be imputed.

And the doctrine is similarly stated in Newberry v. Bank of Princeton, 98 Va. 471, 36 S. E. Rep. 515, where it is said, that if the grantee in a fraudulent deed had knowledge, at the time of the conveyance, of facts and circumstances which were naturally and justly calculated to excite suspicion in the mind of a person of ordinary care and prudence, and which would naturally prompt him to pause and inquire before consummating the transaction, and such inquiry would have necessarily led to a discovery of the fact with notice of which he is sought to be charged, he will be considered to be affected with such notice, whether he made inquiry or not. But while the fact of notice may be inferred from circumstances, as well as proved by direct evidence, yet the proof must be such as to affect the conscience of the purchaser, and must be so strong and clear as to fix upon him the imputation of mala fides.

But it should be noted that, if a debtor in his lifetime conveys his lands to a grantee by deed, and after the death of the debtor certain of his creditors file their bill to set aside the deed as fraudulent and to subject the lands to the payment of their debts, the grantee of such lands may contest the claims of the creditors on the ground that they are barred by the statute of limitations or otherwise. Werdenbaugh v. Reid, 20 W. Va. 588.

In a suit to set aside a fraudulent deed, where it appears that the grantee acquired notice of the fraud before he had paid bonds given for deferred payments of purchase money, and also had notice of the plaintiff's execution against his grantor, a decree should be entered against the grantee in favor of the plaintiff for the amount of such bonds and the interest thereon from maturity. Newberry v. Bank of Princeton, 98 Va. 471, 36 S. E. Rep. 515.

And if a grantor conveys a tract of land to a grantee with intent to defraud his creditors, of which the grantee has notice, and the grantee conveys the land to an innocent purchaser for value, and the first grantee receives this sum, which is proved by the evidence in the cause, and the court sets aside the deed from the first grantor to the first grantee, for fraud, and renders a personal decree for the amount with interest which the first grantee received for the land, it is no error. And there is no necessity for an account to see what the value of the land is, unless the appellant is dissatisfied with the value as fixed by the first grantee, as the first grantee is not prejudiced by being required to pay only what he received in fraud of the creditors of the first grantor. Hinton v. Ellis, 27 W. Va. 423. So there may be a money recovery against a fraudulent grantee of property who has sold such property to a bona fide purchaser and realized money therefrom in favor of the defrauded creditor. Ringold v. Sulter, 35 W. Va. 186, 13 S. E. Rep. 46.

In Williamson v. Goodwyn, 9 Gratt. 503, the vendor sold a number of slaves at a price much below their value, for the purpose of defrauding his creditors, and soon afterwards died. The vendee executed to him her bonds for the purchase money, and the vendor assigned the bonds to bona fide creditors. The vendee sold a part of the property and discharged the bond, and then conveyed the remainder of the property to the widow and child of her vendor. Upon the bill filed by the creditors of the deceased vendor to set aside these deeds as fraudulent, the court set them aside, and the property conveyed in the last of them was sold and the proceeds were applied to pay the claims of the creditors. And as all the creditors of the deceased vendor were not satisfied out of this fund, his vendee was held liable to satisfy them to the extent of the price of the property sold by her, the vendee.

Moreover, if a deed be set aside as fraudulent and void as to creditors of the grantor, because the same was made with intent to hinder, delay and defraud such creditors, and a part of the consideration of such deed was the satisfaction of a bona fide debt due from the grantor to the grantee, such fraudulent grantee is not entitled to charge the lands thereby attempted to be conveyed with the amount of such bona fide debt. Kan. Val. Bk. v. Wilson, 26 W. Va. 242.

(b) Bona Fide Purchasers.—See post, "Deeds of Trust."

Under ch. 74, W. Va. Code 1900, a bona fide purchaser for valuable consideration, who has no notice of the fraudulent intent on the part of his immediate grantor, and the fraud rendering the title of such grantor void, is protected. Root-Tea-Na-Herb Co. v. Rightmire (W. Va.), 36 S. E. Rep. 359. See Goshorn v. Snodgrass, 17 W. Va. 717; Va. Code 1887, §2458; Garland v. Rives, 4 Rand. 282; Lockhard v. Beckley, 10 W. Va. 88.

But one, who purchases from a fraudulent grantee with notice of the fraud and of the invalidity of his title, can acquire no better right than the fraudulent grantee has. He cannot be protected as a bona fide purchaser, but must stand in the shoes of his grantor. Goshorn v. Snodgrass, 17 W. Va. 717; Spence v. Smith, 34 W. Va. 607, 12 S. E. Rep. 828.

Nevertheless, a bona fide sale, for a fair price, to an innocent purchaser, should not be set aside at the instance of the creditor of the grantor, on the grounds of alleged fraud, for the sole reason that in the opinion of sundry witnesses the property might have brought a larger price if sold on credit. Douglass v. Douglass, 41 W. Va. 13, 23 S. E. Rep. 671.

Moreover, if a person defrauds another of slaves, and afterwards makes a deed conveying them to a trustee to secure a debt, and the trustee sells the property to a bona fide purchaser for value and without notice, and the purchaser then conveys the property to a third person, the latter purchaser is entitled to hold the slaves against the person defrauded, whether he had notice of the fraud or not. In the former case, he holds a valid title under the purchaser; in the latter, he is himself a bona fide purchaser without notice of the fraud. Montgomery v. Rose, 1 P. & H. 5. And where a deed conveys and assigns property in trust, to be applied to discharging a bond executed by a wealthy and unembarrassed father to his daughter, to be paid to her on her marriage, it is valid as against creditors of the father, becoming such after the marriage of the daughter, although at the time of the execution of the deed, the father was embarrassed to insolvency. Welles v. Cole, 6 Gratt. 645. So where a child, who is an infant, is deemed a purchaser for valuable consideration, of a slave, the circumstance that the child resides in the family of its father, and there keeps the slave, over whom it exercises every act of ownership, will not entitle the creditors of the father to disturb the possession of the child, although the father had included the slave in a mortgage, to indemnify the mortgage against certain securityships. Braxton v. Gaines, 4 H. & M. 151.

Moreover, upon a bona fide sale of personal property though the vendee does not take possession at the time of the sale, yet if he does get possession before an execution is issued against the vendor, his title is good as against the creditors of the vendor. So also, where a bona fide vendee of personal property has gotten possession of the property before the issuing of an execution against the vendor, his title is good as against the creditor of the vendor, though after such possession by the vendee, he employs the vendor as his agent to sell the property; and the vendor is in possession as the agent of the vendee at the very time that the execution issues, and is levied upon it. M'Kinley v. Ensell, 2 Gratt. 333.

And although, if a son obtain a conveyance for land purchased by his father, the conveyance may be set aside for fraud by a creditor of the father, whilst the land is in the hands of the son; yet, if the son sell and convey the land to a third person for valuable consideration, who has no notice of the fraud between father and son, such third person being a bona fide purchaser, will be protected in his purchase against creditors of the father from the operation of the statute of frauds, by his proviso. Coleman v. Cocke, 6 Rand. 618.

However, a widow having received her distributable share of the personal estate of her husband, is not a purchaser for value, so as to be entitled to set up the defence of purchaser for value without notice. And if in such case the husband has obtained slaves by a conveyance fraudulent as to the creditors and grantor, and one of the slaves has been allotted to the widow, a slave in her possession may be taken in execution at the suit of the creditor of the grantor, though the husband and those claiming under him have been in possession of the slave more than five years. Snoddy v. Haskins, 12 Gratt. 363.

It is to be further observed, however, that if a bona fide purchaser, without notice of fraud, who has received a deed from two persons (one of whom fraudulently induced the other to join therein), is not responsible in equity; but the loss ought to fall on the fraudulent vendor. Whitehorn v. Hines, 1 Munf. 557.

2. TRUSTEE AND CESTUI QUE TRUST.—In order to make void a deed of trust, notice of the grantor's fraudulent intent must in some way be brought home to the trustee, or to the creditor. Douglass, etc., Co. v. Laird, 37 W. Va. 687, 17 S. E. Rep. 188; Baer Sons, etc., v. Williams, 43 W. Va. 323, 27 S. E. Rep. 345. Thus, a deed which conveys land to secure a bona fide debt due to the grantee, and also a debt to the grantor's wife, which is voluntary and fraudulent as to his creditors, and the nature of which debt is known to the grantee, is null and void as a security for the first as well as the last-mentioned debt, as against subsequent incumbrancers and creditors of the grantor. Lewis v. Caperton, 8 Gratt. 148.

It is a settled principle, nevertheless, that the beneficiaries in a deed of trust are affected with notice to the trustee, although he did not know of the existence of the deed or of an intention to make it until it was recorded, and then immediately declined the trust. Merchants' Bank v. Ballou, 98 Va. 112, 32 S. E. Rep. 481.

But where a trust deed secures many debts in separate classes or to different persons, the simple fact that a part of the debts secured are shown to be invalid or voluntary will not make the deed invalid as a security for other and bona fide debts secured therein. Cohn v. Ward, 32 W. Va. 34, 9 S. E. Rep. 41. However, a debtor cannot convey his property to a trustee to secure creditors and reserve an interest in or control over the property inconsistent with the grant, and adequate to its defeat, but a direction of the trustee, "when so required by the creditors, to take charge of said property and sell the same at public auction" is not of itself such reservation of interest or control as to avoid the deed. Stoneburner v. Motley, 95 Va. 784, 30 S. E. Rep. 364.

It must be observed that the trustee and beneficiaries in a deed to secure bona fide debts, without notice, are purchasers for valuable consideration, within the meaning of the exception in the statute. Va. Code 1849, ch. 188, § 3, p. 717; Va. Code 1887, § 3001; and will be preferred to an execution creditor of the grantor in the deed, as to a chose in action thereby conveyed. Evans v. Greenhow, 15 Gratt. 153.

Still, if a sale be fraudulent (so as to render the sale void as between the purchaser, or cestui que trust, and the creditors of the original debtor), yet if the deed is good, it still operates to shield the property (conveyed for the benefit of the cestui que trust) from the execution of the creditors of the original debtor; in other words, it operates as effectually to prevent an execution from being levied on the property as if there had been no sale. Claytor v. Anthony, 6 Rand. 285.

And although a party to whom property is conveyed upon a fraudulent secret trust, may hold it as his own, against the grantor and his representatives, yet, if the grantee assents to the trust, and executes it in part, it is not competent for such of the cestuis que trust as may have gotten possession of the property, to set up the fraud for the purpose of defeating the claim of the other cestuis que trust to their share of the property. Turner v. Campbell, 3 Gratt. 77.

3. MORTGAGOR AND MORTGAGEE.—The possession remaining with the mortgagor, for five years, without demand made and pursued by process of law on the part of the mortgagees, does not make a case in which, under the statute of frauds the property is taken to be with the possession, and liable to the creditors of the person in possession. Rose v. Burgess, 10 Leigh 186.

4. LOANER AND LOANEE.—If a debtor remains in possession of slaves for five years, under a parol loan, they are liable to satisfy his creditors, though the possession is resumed by the lender before executions are levied upon them. Beale v. Digges, 6 Gratt. 582; Va. Code 1887, § 2461.

And in Lacy v. Wilson, 4 Munf. 313 (1814), a similar provision to section 2461 of Va. Code 1887, in force in 1814, was construed. The court declared that the loan of the slave by a father to his daughter during her life, and a gift over to her children after her death (being admitted to record on proof by one witness only), is not good against her husband's creditors, or purchaser from him, without notice of such deed: possession of such slaves having remained with the husband for five years without interruption. See Beasley v. Owen, 8 H. & M. 449.

So in Gay v. Moseley, 2 Munf. 543, it was held that, a slave lent either before or after the act to prevent frauds and perjuries, having remained since the commencement of that act, more than five years in the loanee's possession, without any demand made on the part of the lender, must be considered the absolute property of the party so remaining in possession, as to creditors of, and purchasers under him.

A similar but more extensive doctrine was expounded in Fitzhugh v. Anderson, 2 H. & M. 289, in which case a father, anterior to our statute of frauds, having delivered certain slaves to his son, which were proved by verbal evidence (without any deed of writing), to have been lent, for an indefinite period, and the son having retained the uninterrupted possession for many years, used the property as his own, and acquired credit on the strength of his possession; in a controversy between the father, or volunteer claimants under him, and creditors of, or fair purchasers from the son, the court said that, "the father shall be deemed to have given him the slaves: and on general principles of law and equity, independently of any statutory provision, the title of the creditors and purchasers will be protected. The circumstance that the father, afterwards, by his last will and testament, bequeathed the slaves to the son for life, remainder to his children, makes no difference in the case."

Moreover, a demand of slaves by the lender, who thereupon receives, and immediately redelivers them to the loanee, to be held on the same terms, as before such demand, receipt and redelivery being in private, is not sufficient to bar the rights of creditors, under the act to prevent frauds and perjuries. Boyd v. Stainback, 5 Munf. 305.

And where possession has remained with the loanee, or with those claiming under him for five years, and is then assumed by the lender, the possession must continue with the lender the full period of five years from the time it was actually assumed, before the title will be revested in the lender as against the creditor of the loanee. Pate v. Baker, 8 Leigh 80.

But a loan of slaves, though not declared by deed in writing duly recorded, and therefore void as to creditors, the loanee having continued in possession five years without such demand, as would bar their right, is nevertheless effectual between the parties and their representatives. If, therefore, the loanee die in possession of such slaves, they are not to be considered assets belonging to his estate, nor can they be recovered as such; but they are liable to his creditors so far as their claims remain unsatisfied by the assets in the hands of his executor or administrator, but no farther. Boyd v. Stainback, 5 Munf. 305.

And where a father sends a slave to his son upon a loan, but the agent who takes the slave to his son neglects to inform him that the slave is a loan, such neglect of the agent does not affect the right of the father to have the slave considered as a loan. Consequently, if the father dies within five years from the time when the slave so went into possession of the son, and having by his will disposed of the slave, of which the administrator of the son has notice, the slave may be recovered for the father's estate, after five years from the loan. Dickinson v. Dickinson, 2 Gratt. 493 (1846).

5. DONOR AND DONEE.—In Wilson v. Buchanan, 7 Gratt. 334, one Webb, who was largely indebted in proportion to his property, made a gift of slaves to his married daughter, and her husband remained in possession of them for eight years. Judgment having been recovered on some of these debts, and also on other debts contracted since the gift, Buchanan became the surety of Webb in the forthcoming bonds; and was compelled to pay them. Afterwards he recovered judgment against Wilson for the amount paid by him on behalf of Webb, and as all the property of Webb had been sold at that time, by the direction of Buchanan, his (Buchanan's) executions were levied on the slaves given by Webb to his daughter, and their increase. Suit was instituted by Wilson, the son-in-law, in whose possession the slaves had been, against Buchanan and the sheriff who made the levy. The court held that, the slaves were liable to satisfy the debts of Webb.

6. ASSIGNOR AND ASSIGNEE.—The assignment of a promissory note carries with it all remedies of the assignor, including the right to attack a fraudulent conveyance. Billingsley v. Clelland, 41 W. Va. 234, 23 S. E. Rep. 812.

And, although an assignee of a bond which has been taken in payment of purchase money of land, may have notice of fraud in the sale of land, yet he cannot be placed in a worse condition than his assignor, the vendor, with reference to the payment of the purchase money. Highland v. Highland, 5 W. Va. 63.

B. THIRD PERSONS.

1. CREDITORS.

a. In General.—Any creditor who has been injured by a fraudulent deed has the right to the protection of the court; and the legal rights of such creditors cannot be made to depend upon what any other creditor, or a majority of the creditors, may say or do with regard to the debtor's property after the preferred creditors have been satisfied. Landeman v. Wilson, 29 W. Va. 702, 2 S. E. Rep. 203. And a creditor at large may maintain a suit in equity to set aside as fraudulent a deed conveying real estate, made by his debtor, both the debtor and his grantee living and being out of the commonwealth. Peay v. Morrison, 10 Gratt. 149.

Moreover, if a deed of trust secures several creditors, and one or more of the debts secured is fictitious and fraudulent, that fact does not invalidate the deed as to bona fide creditors secured by it, not guilty of any fraud. Cohn v. Ward, 36 W. Va. 516, 15 S. E. Rep. 140.

But it should be observed, that a creditor cannot purchase the goods of his debtor at a price in excess of his debt, when he knows that the excess so paid such debtor is by the latter to be placed beyond the reach of his other creditors. Such purchaser is a participant in the fraud of his debtor, whether his purpose be to aid him or not. Hart v. Sandy, 39 W. Va. 644, 20 S. E. Rep. 665.

Yet the statute to prevent fraudulent conveyances applies to no conveyance made bona fide for valuable consideration, and does not prevent a debtor in failing circumstances from preferring one class of creditors to another. However, in such case, the judgment creditor has a right to an account of the trust fund, and to the payment of his debt out of the surplus, if any, after satisfying the preferred creditors and those who accede to the composition. Skipwith v. Cunningham, 8 Leigh 271.

And it is held in Trapnell v. Conklyn, 37 W. Va. 242, 16 S. E. Rep. 570, that the fact, that an insolvent husband voluntarily bestowing his labor and skill in the business of farming carried on by his wife upon land which is her separate property, will not, in the absence of fraud, render the products of the property of the husband liable for his debts. If such products, after the support of the family, leave a surplus in property attributable to his skill and labor, equity will make a just apportionment between his wife and creditors. But see W. Va. Code 1899, ch. 74, § 2; Va. Code 1887, § 2459. Also, ante, "Transfers Which Are Inoperative as to Certain Persons Though Not Affected with Fraud in Fact."

b. Rights and Liabilities of Creditors under Transfers Not Affected with Actual Fraud.

In General.—A voluntary conveyance which interferes with, or breaks in upon the rights of existing creditors, will not be permitted to take effect to the prejudice of their just demands, but as to such creditors is absolutely void, without regard to the amount of the debts, the extent of the property so conveyed, the motives that prompted the settlement, or the condition or circumstances of the party at the time. Lockhard v. Beckley, 10 W. Va. 87.

And if there is an absolute bill of sale of certain personal property for valuable consideration, and the vendor notwithstanding the deed retains uninterrupted possession, and dies in possession of the property, although the vendee takes possession after his death, a creditor of the vendor, who takes administration of the estate, may file a bill in equity against the vendee, and subject such property to the debt due to the administrator, as it is fraudulent and void as to the administrator, who is also a creditor of the vendor. The rights of the vendor's creditors attach on the subject immediately upon the vendor's death,—therefore before the vendee came into possession. Shields v. Anderson, 3 Leigh 729. This case supposes that the bill of sale was not recorded.

So if a man incur debts for moneys advanced or loaned to him, which with large amounts of other moneys of his own, are voluntary and without consideration deemed valuable in law, used and invested by him in making valuable improvements upon the real estate so settled upon his wife, and in consequence thereof he becomes insolvent, and the moneys so advanced or loaned to him remain unpaid, such creditors may charge the moneys upon the real estate in the possession of his wife. Kan. Val. Bk. v. Wilson, 25 W. Va. 242.

And under Va. Code 1887, § 2459, so far as the means of an insured are withdrawn from creditors to pay premiums, they are entitled out of the proceeds of the policy to have the sums so paid, applied to their claims. Stigler v. Stigler, 77 Va. 163.

This principle is illustrated, though in its application to a different set of circumstances, in Rose v. Brown, 11 W. Va. 122. In this case a husband procured a voluntary conveyance to be made to his wife, of a house and lot. At the time the conveyance was made, he was not indebted more than $218. On that day there was paid on the property $1,500, which he had before given to his wife, and within the next two years he had $3,000, which from time to time, he paid on said property, and discharged the purchase money; and debts to the amount of about $1,250 had afterwards accumulated, after such conveyance and during the time such payments were being made. Upon these facts being presented the court held that they were insufficient to make a prima facie case of fraudulent intent on the part of the husband, at the time the voluntary conveyance was by him procured to be made, consequently, the conveyance was not fraudulent in fact. But, nevertheless, in fraud of his existing creditors, he did divert his means from the payment of his debts, and invest such means in the property, so voluntarily conveyed to his wife; therefore his creditors could charge the real estate for the payment thereof.

Surrender by Grantee of a Deed of Gift—Effect on Creditors of Grantee.—And in Graysons v. Richards, 10 Leigh 57, the father by deed of gift conveyed land to his son, and shortly after this conveyance, the son voluntarily surrendered the deed to the father to be canceled, with design to divest the title out of himself and restore it to the father, to the deed so canceled. The court held, upon these facts, that the son's title was not divested by the cancellation of the deed, and that the land was chargeable in equity with the debts of the son. And further, if the creditor had obtained a judgment against the son, subsequent to the cancellation of the deed, under which the son had taken the oath of insolvency, he was not only entitled to satisfaction of his judgment out of the land as still the property of the son, but he could also claim satisfaction out of it by the simple contract debt which the son owed him; and other creditors of the son, who had not recovered judgments against him, but came in at the same time, should also be entertained to claim satisfaction of the debts due them out of the same amount.

Insolvent Father Pays Part of Purchase Money and Has Land Conveyed to Son—Rights of Father's Creditors.—So in Burbridge v. Higgins, 6 Gratt. 119, a person who was largely indebted, purchased land and paid a part of the purchase money, and had the land conveyed to his son; subsequently the son conveyed it in trust to secure the balance of the purchase money. The son then sold the land to a third person at an advance upon the price given by the father. After this a decree creditor of the father filed a bill to set aside the conveyance as fraudulent against creditors; and pending this suit the balance of the original purchase money was paid by the last purchaser out of the money due from him to the son. The court held that, the deed of trust given to secure the balance of the purchase money on the first sale, being still outstanding, though satisfied after the commencement of the suit, the plaintiff was entitled to have the whole of the purchase money, after satisfying the trust, and not a moiety only, applied to the discharge of his debt.

c. Rights and Liabilities of Creditors under Transfers Fraudulent in Fact.

In General.—Where a deed is fraudulent as to any provision therein contained, it is void in toto as against creditors who are entitled to take advantage of the fraud. Landeman v. Wilson, 29 W. Va. 702, 2 S. E. Rep. 203.

So where it is shown, that there was fraud in the making of the deed conveying real estate, whether the actual fraudulent intent relates to existing creditors or is directed exclusively against subsequent creditors, the effect is precisely the same, and subsequent as well as existing creditors may, for such fraud successfully impeach said conveyance.

Silverman v. Greaser, 27 W. Va. 550; Lockhard v. Beckley, 10 W. Va. 88.

And a conveyance fraudulent as to existing creditors is fraudulent as to subsequent ones. Pratt v. Cox, 22 Gratt. 330; Johnson v. Wagner, 76 Va. 587; Lockhard v. Beckley, 10 W. Va. 101; Core v. Cunningham, 27 W. Va. 206.

Moreover, under a deed fraudulent on its face no valid act can be done to the prejudice of creditors not secured therein. Livesay v. Beard, 22 W. Va. 585.

Creditors' Right to Personal Decree.—And creditors who successfully assail a fraudulent conveyance made by their debtor, are entitled to a personal decree against the fraudulent alienee, when the latter has, in the meanwhile, aliened the property to a third person. The amount of such personal decree is not limited to the price paid by the fraudulent alienee, nor to the price received by him in a subsequent alienation, but by the actual value of the debtor's interest in the property, not to exceed, however, the amount of the plaintiffs' claims against him.

And in such a case, if actual fraud has been established against the alienee, he will not be permitted to set off against the value of the debtor's property received by him, a debt due to him by the debtor, even though such debt was a part of the consideration for the conveyance. Ellington v. Moore (Va. 1897), 4 Va. Law Reg. 608.

Property Conveyed on Secret Trust—Rights of Grantor's Creditors.—So where a vendor makes a fraudulent bill of sale of a female slave, absolute on its face, in order to protect the property from his creditors, but there is a secret trust that the grantee shall hold the property for the benefit of grantor's daughters, the daughters cannot establish a secret trust in equity, and have the decree for the slave as against the creditors of the grantor. Owen v. Sharp, 12 Leigh 430.

d. Compromises by Creditors.—Under the Va. Code of 1887, §§ 2856, 2857, and 2859, regarding compromises by creditors, a creditor who compromises with one of several joint obligors, and assigns his full share of the obligation, may sue the other obligors without making the released obligor a party. And by such compromise the right of contribution between the joint obligors is not, under these sections, impaired. Penn v. Bahnson, 89 Va. 253, 15 S. E. Rep. 386.

Right to Uphold Validity of Some Debts and Assail Others.—And a creditor secured by a deed of trust, while claiming under the deed, may, nevertheless, assail the validity of other debts secured in the same deed. His attitude as purchaser does not impair his right as creditor to assail such debts as fraudulent or otherwise void. Runkle v. Runkle (Va. 1900), 6 Va. Law Reg. 613.

2. STATE.—The state has the same right as one of its citizens to maintain a suit in equity to set aside a fraudulent conveyance, and subject the land of the defendant to its demands. Thus, the state can maintain a suit to set aside a fraudulent conveyance and subject the land of the defendant to the payment of a judgment for a fine recovered against the defendant for the unlawful sale of spirituous and other liquors. State v. Burkeholder, 30 W. Va. 303, 5 S. E. Rep. 439.

3. SUBSEQUENT PURCHASERS.—A purchaser with notice, who buys of a purchaser without notice, will not be affected by a deed which declares the transfer of certain chattel property to be a loan, but which is invalid as to a purchaser without notice, from the loanee, because not recorded as required by law. Lacy v. Wilson, 4 Munf. 818.

So if a purchaser with notice, buys from a bona fide purchaser for value, and without notice from a trustee who makes a tortious sale, he will take a valid title. This is done out of respect for the title of the bona fide purchaser, who otherwise would not receive the protection which his position entitles him to. Montgomery v. Rose, 1 P. & H. 5.

And as held in Coleman v. Cocke, 6 Rand. 618, although if a son obtain a conveyance for land purchased by his father, the conveyance may be set aside for fraud by a creditor of the father, whilst the land is in the hands of the son; yet, if the son sell and convey the land to a third person for valuable consideration, who has no notice of the fraud between the father and the son, such third person being a bona fide purchaser, he will be protected in his purchase against the creditors of the father, from the operation of the statute of frauds, by its proviso (Code 1887, § 2458). And if the deed of such bona fide purchaser be not duly recorded, yet he will be protected in his purchase against a creditor of the father, who obtains a decree against the father, after the bona fide purchase so made, because such a purchaser has a prior equity to such creditor. For, if the original vendor had never made a deed to the son, yet the purchaser, holding the equitable title transferred from the father to the son, and from the son to him, would have had a better right to call on the original vendor for the conveyance of the legal title, than any creditor of the father obtaining a judgment against him, after his transfer of the equitable right to the son.

IV. REMEDIES.

A. IN GENERAL.—Where a debtor makes divers fraudulent conveyances to different grantees, all colluding with him to defraud his creditors, the latter may proceed, by a single creditor's bill to assail them, or any one or more, of such conveyances; and, as there is no contribution among tortfeasors, the fraudulent alienees who are made parties cannot complain that others in the same category are omitted. Ellington v. Moore, 4 Va. Law Reg. 608 (Va. 1897).

And in Commonwealth v. Ricks, 1 Gratt. 416, it is held, that a court of equity will, at the suit of a creditor of an insolvent debtor, pursue property, the avails of his labor, in the hands of parties united with him, to screen the same from his creditors, or in the hands of voluntary purchasers from such parties.

But a court of equity, upon the application of the grantor, will not interfere to set aside a conveyance made to hinder, delay and defraud creditors, on the ground of the natural weakness of mind, increased by habits of intoxication, of the grantor, if he had legal capacity to contract, unless it is shown that some advantage was taken, or undue influence exerted, to procure the conveyance. Smith v. Elliott, 1 P. & H. 307.

B. EQUITY JURISDICTION.

1. IN GENERAL.—In cases of actual fraud, a court of equity has concurrent jurisdiction with a court of law, in remedying the fraud. And equity usually follows the law, and gives relief to the same extent as a court of law. And therefore, where a creditor comes into equity to set aside a conveyance tainted with actual fraud, and the grantee has notice of the fraud, the conveyance should be set aside in toto. Garland v. Rives, 4 Rand. 282.

Thus, where an elegit is levied on land of the debtor, but the inquisition does not set out the moiety by metes and bounds, and possession is not delivered to the creditor; and the debtor makes a conveyance of the land to third persons; and afterwards the elegit and return are quashed, on the motion of the creditor, who then files a bill impeaching the conveyance as fraudulent, a court of equity has jurisdiction to entertain the suit. Claiborne v. Gross, 7 Leigh 331.

But in a bill in chancery, against a debtor, as an absent debtor or defendant, and other defendants resident, holding lands by voluntary or fraudulent conveyances from the debtor, to have a decree against the debtor for the debt, and against the home defendants to subject the lands to the debt, the bill, in order to give the court jurisdiction, under the statute concerning attachments and suits against absent defendants, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 123, must distinctly aver the nonresidence of the debtor; and, if the home defendants in their answers say that the debtor is a resident, though they do not plead that matter in abatement to the jurisdiction, the plaintiff, to sustain the jurisdiction, must prove the fact of the debtor's residence abroad; and if his nonresidence be not distinctly averred in the bill, or if so, denied by the home defendants, be not proved, the court has no jurisdiction, and a decree for the plaintiff will be reversed on that ground. Kelso v. Blackburn, 3 Leigh 299.

Likewise, to give a court in which a homestead deed, claiming goods as exempt, is attacked as in fraud of creditors, jurisdiction over the goods, there must be a valid attachment thereof, and the attachment being dismissed, the suit should also be dismissed. Simon v. Ellison (Va.), 22 S. E. Rep. 860.

Nevertheless, in a case where a court of equity has jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the suit, whatever may be the nature or amount of the demand, the parties thereto are not entitled to a trial by a jury, except where the same is prescribed by law. Broderick v. Broderick, 28 W. Va. 378.

It should be noted, however, that a transfer from one joint debtor to another will not give equity jurisdiction to entertain a suit by the creditor of the grantor, in advance of lien by judgment or otherwise, to subject the property to his debt. Such conveyance does not come within the operation of the statute (W. Va. Code 1891, § 2, ch. 133) relating to fraudulent conveyances. The mere statement in the bill that the conveyance was from one joint debtor to the other would seem to repel any imputation of fraudulent intent, and make the bill demurrable. Moreover, the deed does not remove the property out of the reach of the usual remedy. So there is no ground for chancery jurisdiction.

So where a grantee in a fraudulent conveyance has reconveyed the property to the debtor (grantor), a court of equity has no jurisdiction of a suit by the creditor to subject the property, in advance of a lien by judgment or otherwise, merely because of such fraudulent conveyance. Guggenheimer v. Lockridge, 39 W. Va. 457, 19 S. E. Rep. 874; Witz v. Lockridge, 39 W. Va. 463, 19 S. E. Rep. 876.

2. STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS AS A BAR TO INSTITUTING SUIT.

a. Voluntary Conveyances.—The limitation of a suit to avoid an absolute conveyance on the sole ground that it is voluntary is five years from the time "the right to avoid it accrued" (Va. Code 1887, § 2929). The provision as it originally appeared in Va. Code 1880, ch. 149, § 13, and as it now appears in W. Va. Code 1899, ch. 104, § 14, reads, "five years from the making of the deed," etc.; and in Reynolds v. Gawthrop, 37 W. Va. 8, 16 S. E. Rep. 364, the court so construes it, declaring that the period of limitation begins to run from "the making" of the deed. Humphrey v. Spencer, 36 W. Va. 11, 14 S. E. Rep. 410; McCue v. McCue, 41 W. Va. 151, 23 S. E. Rep. 689; Scraggs v. Hill, 43 W. Va. 102, 27 S. E. Rep. 310. In Bickle v. Chrisman, 76 Va. 65, the point was made by the plaintiff, that "the limitation did not begin to run, until there was a right of action." The court declared that this was undoubtedly correct with respect to almost all of our statutes of limitation, but under the provision as contained in Va. Code 1873, ch. 146, § 16 (identical with § 13, ch. 149, Va. Code 1849), the statute began to run "from the date of the execution of the deed," and not, as usual under our statutes, from the time the right of action accrued. This distinction is also made in Welsh v. Solenberger, 85 Va. 445, 8 S. E. Rep. 91, decided in 1888, shortly after the Code of 1887 took effect. The change as contained in the Code of 1887, providing that the statute should begin to run from the accrual of the right of action, was evidently made for the purpose of relieving creditors against the hardships of the former law. If such was the intention, it was accomplished to an extent, yet the law as it thus stood was not wholly satisfactory, as no right of action would accrue, until there was a right to recover on the claim, which might not mature for years after the making of the conveyance. This inconvenience was overcome, and remedied, by Acts 1893-94, ch. 566, pp. 614, 615, amending and re-enacting § 2460 of the Code, and providing that "a creditor, before obtaining a judgment or decree for his claim, may, whether such claim be due and payable or not, institute suit to avoid the gift, conveyance," etc. The above is substantially the opinion as expressed in an editorial by JUDGE BURKS, 1 Va. Law Reg. 597, before the construction of the amendment by the Virginia Court of Appeals. The learned jurist concludes as follows, "that, under the law as it now stands, inasmuch as a creditor may institute and prosecute a suit to avoid a conveyance at any time before his claim has 'become due and payable,' the five years prescribed by section 2929 must be computed from the time his right accrued to avoid the conveyance under section 2460 as amended by the Act of 1894, though his claim be not due and payable." Therefore the statute would begin to run from the time the voluntary conveyance is made, no question of fraudulent concealment being brought into the case. The above conclusion is reached in Vashon v. Barrett (Va. 1901), 7 Va. Law Reg. 36.

But by the terms of § 2467 of the Va. Code 1873, prior to the late amendment (Acts 1895-96, p. 295, prescribing "ten" instead of "twenty" days), if the conveyance is recorded within twenty days after due acknowledgment, it is as valid against creditors, as if recorded on the day of acknowledgment. And the act of limitation to suits to avoid voluntary conveyances does not cease to run simply because no settlement has been had between parties, and the exact amount due has not been ascertained. So the mere fact that a creditor does not know that the conveyance made by his debtor is without consideration, does not stop the running of the statute of limitations. To have that effect such ignorance must proceed from the fraud of the grantee, and this should be plainly charged. The burden of proving that the transfer, alleged to be voluntary, was made more than five years before the institution of the suit to have it set aside, is on the party pleading the statute. Vashon v. Barrett (Va. 1901), 7 Va. Law Reg. 38. And the limitation applies to a marriage settlement also, attacked upon the ground of its being voluntary. McCue v. Harris, 86 Va. 687, 10 S. E. Rep. 981. See, in general connection, Snoddy v. Haskins, 12 Gratt. 363; Williams v. Blakey, 76 Va. 254.

b. Effect When Fraud Is an Element.—Under the Va. Code 1887, § 2929, limiting the period in which suits may be brought to set aside conveyances or transfers of property, on consideration not deemed valuable in law, cases of actual fraud are not included. Snoddy v. Haskins, 12 Gratt. 363; Hutchinson v. Boltz, 35 W. Va. 754, 14 S. E. Rep. 268. This for the reason that such conveyance does not come within the purview of any statutory provision now in force. Of course, the right to institute such a suit can be lost in equity by remissness and delay in its assertion. It is true that delay in assertion of a right is always discountenanced in a court of chancery; that it does not encourage stale claims, and that a party may lose his right to complain of the fraud by delay, especially where the delay is accompanied by the loss of evidence or the death of parties, or such conditions exist as to render the court unable to pass upon the questions involved without serious risk of doing injustice. As a general rule though, in the application of statutes of limitation, equity follows the law, and wherever a demand would be barred at law, an equitable demand of the like character would be barred in equity. The bar is applied by analogy. In the cases of fraud the authorities are conflicting, as to whether at law the statute begins to run from the commission of fraud or from its discovery. It seems, however, without controversy, to be the settled doctrine in courts of equity, that the statute begins to run only from the discovery of fraud. This seems to be founded on the rule in courts of equity, that the cause of action arises as soon as a party has a right to apply to the court of equity for relief, and such right arises only when the party has actual knowledge of the fraud, or when with due diligence such knowledge could be obtained. Rowe v. Bentley, 29 Gratt. 756; Shields v. Anderson, 3 Leigh 729; Massie v. Heiskell, 80 Va. 804; Cresap v. McLean, 5 Leigh 381; Bumgardner v. Harris, 92 Va. 188; 23 S. E. Rep. 229; Reynolds v. Gawthrop, 37 W. Va. 3, 16 S. E. Rep. 364. See also, McCarty v. Ball, 82 Va. 872, 1 S. E. Rep. 189; Hutcheson v. Grubbs, 80 Va. 251; Ayre v. Burke, 82 Va. 341; Switzer v. Noffsinger, 82 Va. 523; Cottrell v. Watkins, 89 Va. 810, 17 S. E. Rep. 328; Coles v. Ballard, 78 Va. 149.

3. SPECIFIC LIEN AS A CONDITION PRECEDENT TO THE INSTITUTION OF SUIT.—Prior to the Code of 1849, it was held that a creditor at large could not have the aid of a court of equity to prevent, or interfere with, in any way, the disposition which his debtor might make of his property, unless such creditor had first proceeded as far as he could at law. To subject real estate, he must have obtained a judgment at law; and to subject personal estate, he must have obtained a judgment and execution. This was held to apply to creditors attacking a voluntary conveyance as fraudulent, on the ground of its being fraudulent and void as to themselves; likewise as to those attacking conveyance as fraudulent in fact. Chamberlayne v. Temple, 2 Rand. 384 (1824); Rhodes v. Cousins, 6 Rand. 187 (1828); Cole v. M'Rae, 6 Rand. 644 (1828); Tate v. Liggat, 2 Leigh

84 (1830); Kelso v. Blackburn, 3 Leigh 299 (1831); McCullough v. Sommerville, 8 Leigh 415 (1836). The provision as contained in the Va. Code of 1849 was, that the creditor before obtaining a judgment or decree for his claim, could institute any suit which he might institute after obtaining such judgment or decree to avoid a gift, conveyance, etc., declared void by the statutes (Va. Code 1887, §§ 2458, 2459). See W. Va. Code of 1899, ch. 133, sec. 20; Wallace v. Treacle, 27 Gratt. 479; Keagy v. Trout, 85 Va. 397, 7 S. E. Rep. 329; Batchelder v. White, 80 Va. 106; Hoffman v. Fleming, 48 W. Va. 762, 28 S. E. Rep. 790; Tuft v. Pickering, 28 W. Va. 330; Watkins v. Wortman, 19 W. Va. 78. See also, Guggenheimer v. Lockridge, 39 W. Va. 457, 19 S. E. Rep. 875; Baer v. Wilkinson, 35 W. Va. 423, 14 S. E. Rep. 3; Reynolds v. Gawthrop, 37 W. Va. 4, 16 S. E. Rep. 365; Claffin v. Foley, 22 W. Va. 443; Jackson v. Hull, 21 W. Va. 613; Clark v. Figgins, 31 W. Va. 159, 5 S. E. Rep. 645; Sweeney v. Grape Sugar Co., 30 W. Va. 456, 4 S. E. Rep. 438. Thus the old rule, that a creditor must pursue his remedy to its furthest extent at law before a court of equity would entertain jurisdiction to grant him relief, has been abrogated by the statute above alluded to, and supported by the cases construing the statute. However, under the provision as first contained in the Code of 1849, the question, whether a creditor, whose claim was not due, came within the purview of the statute, was controverted and long unsettled. In Devries v. Johnston, 27 Gratt. 805, the court divided equally upon this question, viz.: whether a creditor could maintain a suit to avoid a fraudulent conveyance by his debtor before the maturity of his debt, under this provision (now contained in the Va. Code 1887, § 2460). Four judges only were sitting at the time. Afterwards, in Batchelder v. White, 80 Va. 103, it was held that a creditor could not bring such suit before the maturity of his claim—but in this latter case no notice whatever was taken of the decision in Devries v. Johnston, 27 Gratt. 805. See however, Simon v. Ellison (Va. 1895), 22 S. E. Rep. 860, sustaining this principle. But under the Acts of 1893-94, p. 614, Pollard's Supp. (1900), § 2460, the question is now settled, as follows, viz.: that whether such claim be due and payable or not, the creditor may institute a suit to avoid the transfer or charge. The West Virginia statute, though, does not contain this clause providing for suit when the debt is not due. See Acts 1889-90, p. 78; Davis v. Bonney, 89 Va. 758, 17 S. E. Rep. 229; 1 Va. Law Reg. 294; Barton's Ch. Pr. (2d Ed.), vol. 2, p. 543 et seq.

Moreover, a foreign judgment is a debt; and a suit in equity can be maintained on it to avoid a fraudulent or voluntary conveyance without first obtaining a judgment at law in this state, under § 2, ch. 133, Code W. Va. 1868. Watkins v. Wortman, 19 W. Va. 78.

But as further held, in Guggenheimer v. Lockridge, 39 W. Va. 457, 19 S. E. Rep. 874, a transfer from one joint debtor to another will not give equity jurisdiction to entertain a suit by that creditor of the grantor, in advance of lien by judgment or otherwise, to subject the property to his debt. Witz v. Lockridge, 39 W. Va. 463, 19 S. E. Rep. 876.

C. PARTIES.—In a bill brought by judgment creditors to set aside as fraudulent certain deeds, the plaintiff should make formal parties to his suit, either as plaintiffs or defendants, those who have obtained judgments in the courts of record in the county in which the lands of the debtor are situated, which are sought to be subjected to the payment of the judgments, and also all creditors who have fraud, the conveyance should be set aside in toto. Garland v. Rives, 4 Rand. 282.

Thus, where an elegit is levied on land of the debtor, but the inquisition does not set out the moiety by metes and bounds, and possession is not delivered to the creditor; and the debtor makes a conveyance of the land to third persons; and afterwards the elegit and return are quashed, on the motion of the creditor, who then files a bill impeaching the conveyance as fraudulent, a court of equity has jurisdiction to entertain the suit. Claiborne v. Gross, 7 Leigh 831.

But in a bill in chancery, against a debtor, as an absent debtor or defendant, and other defendants resident, holding lands by voluntary or fraudulent conveyances from the debtor, to have a decree against the debtor for the debt, and against the home defendants to subject the lands to the debt, the bill, in order to give the court jurisdiction, under the statute concerning attachments and suits against absent defendants, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 123, must distinctly aver the nonresidence of the debtor; and, if the home defendants in their answers say that the debtor is a resident, though they do not plead that matter in abatement to the jurisdiction, the plaintiff, to sustain the jurisdiction, must prove the fact of the debtor's residence abroad; and if his nonresidence be not distinctly averred in the bill, or if so, denied by the home defendants, be not proved, the court has no jurisdiction, and a decree for the plaintiff will be reversed on that ground. Kelso v. Blackburn, 3 Leigh 299.

Likewise, to give a court in which a homestead deed, claiming goods as exempt, is attacked as in fraud of creditors, jurisdiction over the goods, there must be a valid attachment thereof, and the attachment being dismissed, the suit should also be dismissed. Simon v. Ellison (Va.), 22 S. E. Rep. 860.

Nevertheless, in a case where a court of equity has jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the suit, whatever may be the nature or amount of the demand, the parties thereto are not entitled to a trial by a jury, except where the same is prescribed by law. Broderick v. Broderick, 28 W. Va. 878.

It should be noted, however, that a transfer from one joint debtor to another will not give equity jurisdiction to entertain a suit by the creditor of the grantor, in advance of lien by judgment or otherwise, to subject the property to his debt. Such conveyance does not come within the operation of the statute (W. Va. Code 1891, § 2, ch. 133) relating to fraudulent conveyances. The mere statement in the bill that the conveyance was from one joint debtor to the other would seem to repel any imputation of fraudulent intent, and make the bill demurrable. Moreover, the deed does not remove the property out of the reach of the usual remedy. So there is no ground for chancery jurisdiction.

So where a grantee in a fraudulent conveyance has reconveyed the property to the debtor (grantor), a court of equity has no jurisdiction of a suit by the creditor to subject the property, in advance of a lien by judgment or otherwise, merely because of such fraudulent conveyance. Guggenheimer v. Lockridge, 39 W. Va. 457, 19 S. E. Rep. 874; Witz v. Lockridge, 39 W. Va. 463, 19 S. E. Rep. 876.

However, under the provision as first contained in the Code of 1849, the question, whether a creditor, whose claim was not due, came within the purview of the statute, was controverted and long unsettled. In Devries v. Johnston, 27 Gratt. 805, the court divided equally upon this question, viz.: whether a creditor could maintain a suit to avoid a fraudulent conveyance by his debtor before the maturity of his debt, under this provision (now contained in the Va. Code 1887, § 2460). Four judges only were sitting at the time. Afterwards, in Batchelder v. White, 80 Va. 103, it was held that a creditor could not bring such suit before the maturity of his claim—but in this latter case no notice whatever was taken of the decision in Devries v. Johnston, 27 Gratt. 805. See however, Simon v. Ellison (Va. 1895), 22 S. E. Rep. 860, sustaining this principle. But under the Acts of 1893-94, p. 614, Pollard's Supp. (1900), § 2460, the question is now settled, as follows, viz.: that whether such claim be due and payable or not, the creditor may institute a suit to avoid the transfer or charge. The West Virginia statute, though, does not contain this clause providing for suit when the debt is not due. See Acts 1889-90, p. 73; Davis v. Bonney, 49 Va. 758, 17 S. E. Rep. 229; 1 Va. Law Reg. 294; Barton's Ch. Pr. (2d Ed.), vol. 2, p. 543 et seq.

Moreover, a foreign judgment is a debt; and a suit in equity can be maintained on it to avoid a fraudulent or voluntary conveyance without first obtaining a judgment at law in this state, under § 2, ch. 133, Code W. Va. 1868. Watkins v. Wortman, 19 W. Va. 78.

But as further held, in Guggenheimer v. Lockridge, 39 W. Va. 457, 19 S. E. Rep. 874, a transfer from one joint debtor to another will not give equity jurisdiction to entertain a suit by that creditor of the grantor, in advance of lien by judgment or otherwise, to subject the property to his debt. Witz v. Lockridge, 39 W. Va. 463, 19 S. E. Rep. 876.

C. PARTIES.—In a bill brought by judgment creditors to set aside as fraudulent certain deeds, the plaintiff should make formal parties to his suit, either as plaintiffs or defendants, those who have obtained judgments in the courts of record in the county in which the lands of the debtor are situated, which are sought to be subjected to the payment of the judgments, and also all creditors who have obtained judgments in courts of record, or before justices in any part of the state, and have had them recorded in the judgment lien docket of the county. Because if in such a suit all the judgment creditors are not made parties, either formally or informally, and this fact is disclosed by the record, the appellate court will reverse any decree directing the sale of the lands or the distribution of the proceeds thereof. Pappenheimer v. Roberts, 24 W. Va. 702; Neely v. Jones, 16 W. Va. 625.

For instance in a creditors' bill to annul deeds made by a debtor, on the ground of fraud, alleging that the debtor was thereafter adjudged a bankrupt, and had never obtained a discharge, the assignee in bankruptcy is a necessary party. Tabb v. Hughes (Va.), 3 S. E. Rep. 148 (1887).

So in a suit to annul a bond and trust deed as fraudulent, it appearing that the same had been assigned to the grantor's wife, the court, before decreeing on the merits, should require her to be made a party, and the failure to do so is reversible error, though the point was not made in the lower court. Thornton v. Gaar, 87 Va. 315, 12 S. E. Rep. 753.

And where there is a bill to set aside fraudulent conveyances made by an insolvent debtor, the trustees and cestui que trust in the deeds, the sheriff of the counties in which the lands lie, and the execution creditors interested in the property, should be made parties. Clough v. Thompson, 7 Gratt. 26 (1850).

Likewise, where there is a suit brought by a judgment creditor to set aside as fraudulent and void certain deeds alleged to have been made by the judgment debtor with intent to hinder, delay and defraud the plaintiff in the collection of his debt, in order to charge the lands thereby conveyed with the payment of his judgment, the alleged fraudulent alienees are necessary parties to the suit, although they may have conveyed all lands granted to them, respectively, to other persons who are defendants in the suit. Pappenheimer v. Roberts, 24 W. Va. 702.

But in a suit by creditors of a husband to subject property which he has voluntarily conveyed away to the payment of their debts, the grantee of the husband is not a necessary party; because the conveyance, notwithstanding it may be void as to creditors, will be, nevertheless, valid between the parties to it. Herzog v. Weller, 24 W. Va. 199.

However, if a deed of trust purports to indemnify one of the parties, as to whom the deed is charged to be fraudulent, as surety of the grantor for certain debts due to specified creditors, these creditors, as well as those secured directly, and whose debts are not assailed by the bill, are necessary parties. Billups v. Sears, 5 Gratt. 31.

And in Almond v. Wilson, 75 Va. 613, it is held that, any number of alienees may be made parties defendant to a suit to set aside conveyances on the ground of fraud, although, as between the alienees themselves, no charge of combination or confederacy is made.

It must be observed, moreover, that if the want of proper parties appears on the face of the bill, such omission will be demurrable, and the defect may be taken advantage of by demurrer, or at the hearing of the cause. But where a demurrer for such cause is sustained, the plaintiff should have leave to amend his bill. Pappenheimer v. Roberts, 24 W. Va. 702.

D. PLEADING AND PRACTICE.

1. IN GENERAL.

Filing Judgment and Execution.—In McNew v. Smith, 5 Gratt. 84, the court declared that, in a suit by a judgment creditor to set aside fraudulent conveyances of property by his debtor, the judgment and execution being admitted by the pleadings, the failure to file copies of them in the cause, is not ground for reversal of the decree of the court below, setting aside the conveyances; especially if no objection was taken in that court to the failure to file them.

Consolidating Causes.—Where creditors by several judgments file separate bills in chancery, impeaching a conveyance of land by a debtor, as fraudulent; an order of consolidation of the causes by the chancellor on motion of one of the plaintiffs, is improper. Clairborne v. Gross, 7 Leigh 331.

2. BILL, COMPLAINT OR PETITION.

a. In General.

When the Aid of a Court of Equity Should Be Refused.—A court of equity ought not to give its aid to a plaintiff claiming under a deed of gift from a person who made a previous transfer of the same property to another for the purpose of defrauding creditors: the object of the bill being to enforce a secret trust between such transferrer and transferee. Roane v. Vidal, 4 Munf. 187.

What Constitutes the Point in Litigation.—And when a bill is against fraudulent alienees, the matter in litigation is a fraud charged in the management and disposition of the debtor's property, in which charge all the defendants are interested, though in different degrees and proportions. Almond v. Wilson, 75 Va. 613.

Issuance of Execution, and Return Had, Not Conditions Precedent to Sustaining a Bill.—In State v. Bowen, 33 W. Va. 91, 18 S. E. Rep. 375, JUDGE ENGLISH declares that, where a bill is filed by the state to set aside a fraudulent conveyance made by its judgment debtor, and to subject land in the hands of a fraudulent grantee to the payment of its judgment, it is not necessary that an execution should have issued on the judgment, and that a return of nolle bona should be had, before such bill can be sustained. Nor is it necessary to convene the creditors of such judgment debtor, or to allege and show that the rents, issues, and profits of the land sought to be subjected will not pay the debt in five years.

Circumstances Making Proper a Dismissal of the Bill.—And where the evidence shows that a creditor was without means to have loaned money, which was claimed to be due, and was, previous to the suit, living adulterously with the pretended debtor, and that the claim and suit was a collusive scheme between the husband and the pretended creditor, to defraud the wife of the pretended debtor out of property, it will be proper to dismiss the bill. Waller v. Johnson, 82 Va. 966, 7 S. E. Rep. 382.

Filing of Petition by Creditor.—A creditor may file his petition in a cause pending, which has for its object the vacation of a fraudulent conveyance, and, upon proper allegations, be made a party to the suit, and the bill, exhibits, answers, depositions, orders, and decrees, and all the proceedings in said cause, may, upon proper prayer, be read as part of his petition. Richardson v. Ralph Snyder, 40 W. Va. 15, 20 S. E. Rep. 854.

Thus, as held in Pappenheimer v. Roberts, 24 W. Va. 702, in a suit brought by judgment creditors to set aside a conveyance on the ground of fraud, any judgment creditor, who has not been made a party, formally or informally, and who has an unsatisfied judgment against the debtor, which was recovered before the suit was brought, may at any time before a final decree file his petition in the cause setting up his judgment and praying to be made a party to the suit, and to have his rights under his judgment adjudicated; and if this right be denied him, it will be error for which the decree of the lower court, denying such right, will be reversed in the court of appeals.

b. When a Bill Is Not Multifarious.—Where a bill in equity is brought to subject to the lien of the plaintiff's judgment his debtor's estate alleged to have been fraudulently conveyed to various persons, who are charged with having combined and colluded with the debtor to defraud the plaintiff, and who are all made parties, the bill is not multifarious. Com. v. Drake, 81 Va. 305.

So if a bill in equity is brought to subject to the lien of a plaintiff's judgment his debtor's estate, which is alleged to have been fraudulently conveyed to various persons, all of whom are made defendants; but there is no charge of combination or confederacy among the alienees, the bill is not multifarious for this cause. Almond v. Wilson, 75 Va. 613.

c. Allegations and Averments Necessary to Sustain Bill.

Nonresidence.—In a bill in chancery, against a debtor as an absent debtor or defendant, and other defendants resident, holding lands by voluntary or fraudulent conveyances from the debtor, to have a decree against the debtor for the debt, and against the home defendants to subject the lands to the debt, the bill, in order to give the court jurisdiction, under the statute concerning attachments and suits against absent defendants (1 Rev. Code, ch. 123), must distinctly aver the nonresidence of the debtor; and, if the home defendants in their answers say that the debtor is a resident, though they do not plead that matter in abatement to the jurisdiction, the plaintiff, to sustain the jurisdiction, must prove the fact of the debtor's residence abroad; and if his nonresidence be not distinctly averred in the bill, or, if so denied by the home defendants, be not proved, the court has no jurisdiction, and a decree for the plaintiff will be reversed on that ground. Kelso v. Blackburn, 3 Leigh 299.

Fraud.—It is not sufficient to make a general charge of fraud in a bill. In addition to the general charge, the facts constituting the fraud, though not what is merely evidence, must be given. Saunders v. Parrish, 86 Va. 592, 10 S. E. Rep. 748; Zell Guano Co. v. Heatherly, 38 W. Va. 409, 18 S. E. Rep. 611; First Nat. Bank v. Bowman, 36 W. Va. 649, 14 S. E. Rep. 989; Greer v. O'Brien, 36 W. Va. 277, 15 S. E. Rep. 74; Arnold v. Slaughter, 36 W. Va. 589, 15 S. E. Rep. 250.

Generally fraud should be charged by setting forth the particular manner in which the act was done, and the end and design to be accomplished. If these show that fraud was designed and perpetrated it is not necessary to aver the legal conclusion that they constitute fraud. But the charge that a deed was made with intent to hinder, delay, and defraud creditors is not the mere statement of a legal conclusion, but a charge of a material fact. American Net & Twine Co. v. Mayo, 97 Va. 182, 33 S. E. Rep. 523.

Thus, to overthrow the title of a purchaser on the grounds of fraud, it is necessary to allege in the bill that the grantor committed the act fraudulently to defraud creditors; and the facts must be given; and, moreover, it must be alleged that the purchaser fraudulently conspired with him, or had notice of the grantor's fraudulent intent, or had notice of the fraud rendering the grantor's title void. Vance Shoe Co. v. Haught, 41 W. Va. 275, 23 S. E. Rep. 558.

But the privity of a grantee in the fraud of his grantor is sufficiently charged by charging that the deed was made not only without any consideration deemed valuable in law, but with intent to hinder, delay, and defraud the creditors of the grantor. It is not necessary to charge expressly that the grantee had notice of the fraud intended by the grantor. American Net & Twine Co. v. Mayo, 97 Va. 182, 33 S. E. Rep. 523.

Moreover, where a bill to set aside conveyances contains positive and specific allegations of fraud, such allegations are taken as true on the bill being taken as confessed. Welsh v. Solenberger, 85 Va. 441, 8 S. E. Rep. 91; Price v. Thrash, 30 Gratt. 515.

When Allegations Sufficient to Give Jurisdiction. In Watkins v. Wortman, 19 W. Va. 78, a creditor filed a bill in chancery against a debtor and his wife and others alleging a recovery by him of a judgment in another state against the debtor; that execution issued thereon and was returned unsatisfied; that the debtor had removed to the state of West Virginia in which the court had jurisdiction, and purchased two tracts of land and paid for them; that one of the tracts he had caused to be conveyed to his wife with intent to defraud his creditors; that the other tract had been conveyed to one of the other parties defendant; that whether this was accidentally so done, it was equally fraudulent as to creditors; that there was no personal property, out of which the debt was to be made; that unless both tracts of land were subjected to the payment of his debt, the debt would be lost. The defendants demurred to this bill. And the demurrer was overruled by the lower court, and the court of appeals sustained the judgment overruling such demurrer.

And it was further held that, whether the allegation of the bill as to the second contract of land was sufficient or not, yet as the allegation to the first contract was sufficient to give the court of equity jurisdiction, it was proper to include any other property of the debtor, so that it could be first made liable in protection of the alleged voluntary or fraudulent vendee.

d. Right to Sue.—See ante, "Rights and Liabilities."

One party guilty of fraud in a transaction can have no relief in equity against another person, though equally guilty of fraud in the same. Stout v. Philippi Manuf., etc., Co., 41 W. Va. 339, 23 S. E. Rep. 571.

And in Roberts v. Kelly, 2 P. & H. 396, it was held that an agreement, between a debtor and his surety in a forthcoming bond, to the effect that the surety should purchase slaves of the debtor, at a sale under an execution on a judgment on the bond, for the amount of the debt, which was greatly less than the value of the slaves, and, holding the legal title, permit the slaves to remain in the possession of the debtor, with liberty to redeem them, upon paying the amount advanced with interest within five years, when there is no intention to defraud creditors, is valid and would be enforced in a court of equity, by permitting the debtor to redeem on paying the amount advanced with interest.

8. PLEA, ANSWER AND SUBSEQUENT PLEADINGS.—Where a bill seeks to set aside a deed of conveyance as voluntary and fraudulent, and the grantee, in his answer, denies any knowledge of fraud in the transaction, in the absence of any replication to the answer, such allegation will be taken to be true. Bierne v. Ray, 37 W. Va. 571, 16 S. E. Rep. 804.

And if a bill charges a postnuptial settlement to be voluntary, the answer does not shift the burden, and is not evidence for the respondents, but the offense must be proved. Perry v. Ruby, 81 Va. 817; Hatcher v. Crews, 78 Va. 460.

Where, however, in a bill to set aside as fraudulent certain deeds, the want of proper parties appears on the face of the bill, such omission will be demurrable, and the defect may be taken advantage of by demurrer or at the hearing. But if the demurrer for such cause is sustained, the plaintiff should have leave to amend his bill. Pappenheimer v. Roberts, 24 W. Va. 702.

4. VARIANCE.—Though it is true that the case stated in a bill in equity must be sustained by the evidence, this rule will not forbid relief to the plaintiff where the case proved does not materially vary from the case stated; as where two deeds are charged to be without consideration, and intended to delay and hinder the plaintiff, and the proof is that the second being a deed to a trustee for the separate use of the debtor's wife, was without valuable consideration, the decree should be for the plaintiff. Campbell v. Bowles, 30 Gratt. 652.

E. EVIDENCE.

1. PRESUMPTION AND BURDEN OF PROOF.

a. In General.

Presumptions.—The maxim, "Fraud must be proven and is never to be presumed," is true only when understood as affirming that the contract or conduct apparently honest and lawful must be regarded as such, until shown to be otherwise by evidence, either positive or circumstantial; but fraud may be inferred from facts calculated to establish it; and fraud should be so inferred when the facts and circumstances are such as to lead a reasonable man to the conclusion that the property of a debtor has been attempted to be withdrawn from the reach of his creditors, with the intent to prevent them from recovering their just debts; and if prima facie such fraudulent intent be thus established, it must be regarded as conclusively established, unless it is rebutted by facts and circumstances which are proven. Burt v. Timmons, 29 W. Va. 441, 2 S. E. Rep. 780; Bronson v. Vaughan, 44 W. Va. 406, 29 S. E. Rep. 1022; Sipe v. Earman, 26 Gratt. 563; Herring v. Wickham, 29 Gratt. 628; Keagy v. Trout, 85 Va. 390, 7 S. E. Rep. 829. And as held in Stonebraker v. Hicks, 94 Va. 618, 27 S. E. Rep. 497, in the absence of fraud apparent on the face of the deed, or necessarily inferred from its terms, fraud will not be presumed, but must be proved with clearness and certainty.

Thus, the provisions of a mortgage or deed of trust may be of such a character as of themselves to furnish conclusive evidence of a fraudulent intent; but the presumption of law is in favor of honesty, and the court cannot presume fraud unless the terms of the instrument preclude any other inference. Williams v. Lord, 75 Va. 390.

And fraud cannot be presumed in an action to set aside a marriage settlement, but must be proved by clear and satisfactory evidence to have been concurred in by both parties. And this is so, irrespective of the amount of the husband's indebtedness, and even though his whole estate is included in the settlement. Noble v. Davies, 4 S. E. Rep. 206 (Va. 1887).

Onus Probandi.—The onus probandi is on him who alleges fraud, and if the fraud is not strictly and clearly proved as it is alleged, relief cannot be granted, although the party against whom relief is sought may not have been perfectly clear in his dealings. Harden v. Wagner, 23 W. Va. 356; Pusey v. Gardner, 21 W. Va. 469; Scott v. Rowland, 82 Va. 484, 4 S. E. Rep. 595; Fischer v. Lee, 98 Va. 159, 35 S. E. Rep. 441.

But while fraud must be clearly proved and the burden of proof rests on him who alleges it, it may be proved by circumstances, and when the evidence shows a prima facie case of fraud, the burden shifts to the upholder of the transaction to establish its fairness. Herring v. Wickham, 29 Gratt. 628; Hickman v. Trout, 83 Va. 478, 3 S. E. Rep. 131; Engleby v. Harvey, 93 Va. 445, 25 S. E. Rep. 235; Sutherland v. March, 75 Va. 236; White v. Perry, 14 W. Va. 86; Martin v. Smith, 25 W. Va. 589; Bogges v. Richards, 39 W. Va. 567, 20 S. E. Rep. 599; Paul v. Baugh, 85 Va. 955, 9 S. E. Rep. 329; American N. & T. Co. v. Mayo, 97 Va. 182, 33 S. E. Rep. 523.

But where a subsequent creditor of a grantor assails, in a chancery suit, a deed made by the grantor as voluntary and fraudulent, the recitals in the deed that the grantee had paid the grantor a valuable consideration is not evidence against the creditor of such payment; and the burden of proving that a valuable consideration was paid by the grantee to the grantor is upon the grantee, but the burden of proving that the deed was fraudulent in fact is upon the creditor. Rogers v. Verlander, 30 W. Va. 619, 5 S. E. Rep. 847.

Moreover, the onus is on the creditor to show that his debt was contracted before the deed was recorded, in order to render the property liable therefor. Scott v. Jones, 76 Va. 233.

b. As Affected by Consideration.—It is well settled that the consideration named in a deed may be enquired into. Summers v. Darne, 81 Gratt. 604. But he who undertakes to show a different consideration, must do it by satisfactory proof. Click v. Green, 77 Va. 827. And when the consideration is inquired into, and it is shown that the conveyance is founded upon a valuable consideration, the burden of proving that the deed is fraudulent in fact, rests upon the creditor assailing it. Cohn v. Ward, 32 W. Va. 84, 9 S. E. Rep. 41.

But where a creditor files a bill to set aside as fraudulent a deed executed by his debtor which recites the payment of a valuable consideration, and such creditor's debts are older than the deed, the burden is on the grantee to prove the payment of the purchase money, or, if the deed was executed in payment of existing debts, to prove the existence and validity of such debts. Knight v. G. & C. Capito, 23 W. Va. 639.

Moreover, when such conveyance is made in consideration of a pre-existing indebtedness, it is a badge of fraud for the grantee to retain the evidence of such indebtedness in his possession uncanceled, after the conveyance has been completed. Webb v. Ingham, 29 W. Va. 389, 1 S. E. Rep. 816.

However, mere inadequacy of consideration in the absence of fraud will not invalidate a conveyance. Tebbs v. Lee, 76 Va. 744.

But it must be observed, that board and lodging and the keep of a horse do not, as between husband and wife, parent and child, and other near relatives constitute a consideration from which the law will imply a promise of payment, and no action can be maintained therefor in the absence of an express contract or engagement to pay for them. Nor can an express promise to pay, made after the supplies have been furnished or the services rendered, be enforced against the promisor to the prejudice of his creditors. Stoneburner v. Motley, 95 Va. 784, 30 S. E. Rep. 364.

c. As Affected by Possession.—The vendor's continuing in possession of goods and chattels after an absolute sale raises a legal presumption that the sale is fraudulent as to creditors of the vendor, which throws upon the vendee, imperatively, the burden of proving the fairness and good faith of the transaction; and this cannot be done without sufficient evidence that the sale was for a fair and valuable consideration, and that the vendor did not continue to have an interest in the property by secret understanding; and in the absence of all evidence to show such consideration, or in the absence of all evidence from which the inference can be fairly drawn, that the vendor did not continue to have an interest in the property, the legal presumption that he did, and that the sale was not for such consideration, becomes absolute and conclusive; and the same will be the conclusion, though there is some evidence on these subjects, if it is insufficient to rebut the strong legal presumption arising from the vendor's retention of possession after the sale. Curtin v. Isaacsep, 36 W. Va. 391, 15 S. E. Rep. 171; Curd v. Miller, 7 Gratt. 185; Bindley v. Martin, 28 W. Va. 773.

And the fact of possession remaining with the mortgagor five years without demand made and pursued by a process of law on the part of the mortgagees, does not make a case in which, under the statute of frauds, the property is taken to be with the possession, and liable to the creditors of the person in possession. Rose v. Burgess, 10 Leigh 186.

d. Transactions between Relatives.—And in transactions between a father and his child, husband and wife, brother and sister, between whom there exists a strong natural motive to provide for each other, at the expense of existing creditors, it requires less proof to show fraud, where they are sought to be impeached as fraudulent; and, on the other hand, when a prima facie case is made, it requires much stronger proof to show fair dealing than would be required if the transaction were between strangers. Livey v. Winton, 30 W. Va. 554, 4 S. E. Rep. 451; Coleman v. Cocke, 6 Rand. 618.

Likewise if a conveyance be made by a father to his son in consideration of old debts alleged to be due from the father to the son, and the same is impeached by his creditors as having been made with intent to hinder, delay and defraud them in the collection of their debts, the son will be held to stricter proof of his honesty in dealing with his father, than a stranger would be. Knight v. Capito, 23 W. Va. 639.

Similarly, where a bill is filed by a creditor alleging that a deed from a father to his son was in fact voluntary, although reciting on its face a valuable consideration, and the son in his answer denies the allegation, and claims that he paid a valuable consideration for the land, the burden of proof is on the son, to show that a valuable consideration was paid, and the recital of the deed is no evidence against the creditor. Himan v. Thorn, 32 W. Va. 507, 9 S. E. Rep. 930.

e. Transactions between Husband and Wife.—Where creditors of the husband seek to subject real estate claimed by the wife, which has been conveyed to her, either directly or indirectly from her husband, the burden of showing that it was paid for by her out of her separate estate rests upon her, and, in the absence of such proof, it would be presumed that the purchase money was furnished by her husband. Hutchinson v. Boltz, 35 W. Va. 754, 14 S. E. Rep. 267; Mayhew v. Clark, 38 W. Va. 387, 10 S. E. Rep. 785; Wood v. Harmison, 41 W. Va. 876, 23 S. E. Rep. 560; Yates v. Law, 86 Va. 117, 9 S. E. Rep. 508; Spence v. Repass, 94 Va. 716, 27 S. E. Rep. 583; Crowder v. Garber, 97 Va. 565, 34 S. E. Rep. 470; McConville v. Nat. Val. Bank, 98 Va. 9, 34 S. E. Rep. 891; Runkle v. Runkle, 98 Va. 663, 37 S. E. Rep. 279; Maxwell v. Hanshaw, 24 W. Va. 405.

Thus, in a suit by creditors to set aside a deed to secure notes executed to the grantor by his wife, the grounds for setting aside being fraud, where the wife claims that the original transaction represented a loan by her to him, the burden is on her to show that fact, and also a contemporaneous promise by him to pay the debt. Darden v. Ferguson (Va. 1897), 27 S. E. Rep. 486.

And where a husband conveys a judgment to a trustee for the benefit of his wife, or executes a deed of trust for the same purpose, the burden is thrown upon the wife to show, as against creditors attacking either for fraud, that the transaction was fair and bona fide, to so secure to her a subsisting and valid debt. Livey v. Winton, 30 W. Va. 554, 4 S. E. Rep. 451.

Moreover, if property is alleged to have been purchased by a wife, or a conveyance of property is made to her during coverture, the burden is upon her to prove distinctly that she paid for it with means not derived from her husband. Evidence that she made the purchase, or that the property was conveyed to her, amounts to nothing, unless it is accompanied by clear and full proof that she paid for it with her own separate estate; and in the absence of such proof the presumption is that her husband furnished the means to pay for it and it will be subject to his debts. McMasters v. Edgar, 23 W. Va. 673; Stockdale v. Harris, 23 W. Va. 499; Brooks v. Applegate, 37 W. Va. 373, 16 S. E. Rep. 585; Grant v. Sutton, 90 Va. 771, 19 S. E. Rep. 784.

So if a wife delivers money or property of her own to her husband, which he uses in his business, the presumption is that such delivery was intended as a gift; and in order to constitute such delivery a loan, as against the creditors of the husband, the wife must prove an express promise of the husband to repay, or establish by the circumstances that it was a loan, and not a gift. Zinn v. Law, 32 W. Va. 447, 9 S. E. Rep. 871.

And in Morriss v. Harveys, 75 Va. 726, the court declared that, while it is true that neither a judgment nor the substitution of other securities will prevent a court of equity, when a deed is sought to be impeached, as voluntary, from looking to the original cause of action to ascertain whether it was a subsisting debt contracted at the time the deed was made, and where the right of third persons have intervened, as in the case of a settlement upon a wife and children, it is certainly competent for them to show, if they can, that not only the judgment, but the debt upon which it is founded, has been satisfied and discharged by the substitution of a new security. The burden of proving that a transfer by the husband to his wife's brother was bona fide and for a valuable consideration rests upon the wife and upon the creditors. Thus, in Herzog v. Weller, 24 W. Va. 199, an insolvent husband transferred to his wife's brother, by deed for an alleged valuable consideration, his personal property; soon thereafter the brother transferred the property in like manner to another brother, and the latter immediately transferred it to his sister, the wife of the insolvent husband, as a gift in consideration of fraternal affection. In a controversy between the wife and the creditors of the husband as to the right to have the property subjected to the payment of debts contracted by the husband before he made the transfer, the above principle was laid down.

f. Indebtedness as an Element.—Moreover, where there is a transfer of property, either directly or indirectly, by an insolvent husband to his wife during coverture, it is justly regarded with suspicion; and unless it fairly appears that it was entirely free from any wrongful intent or purpose to withdraw the property from the husband's creditors, it will not be sustained. And in such transfer there is a presumption against the wife in favor of the husband's creditors which she must overcome by affirmative proof. Maxwell v. Hanshaw, 24 W. Va. 406.

And in Hutchison v. Kelly, 1 Rob. 128 (1842), the presumption of fraud, in respect to voluntary conveyances when there are existing debts, came before the court for consideration. The conclusion drawn from the cases by CHANCELLOR KENT in Reade v. Livingston (N. Y.), 3 Johns. Ch. Rep. 500, that if the grantor be indebted at the time of a voluntary conveyance, it is presumed to be fraudulent in respect to debts then existing, and no circumstances can repel the legal presumption of fraud, was approved by JUDGE STANARD but was disapproved by JUDGE BALDWIN, who rendered the opinion of the court. The principle was declared by JUDGE BALDWIN to be, that, while the indebtedness of the grantor at the time a voluntary conveyance raises a legal presumption against its validity, yet the presumption is only prima facie and not conclusive. The principles laid down in this case were approved in the Bank of Alexandria v. Patton, 1 Rob. 499 (1848). For fuller discussion of principles, and collection of cases, see note, "Transfers Which Are Not Affected with Fraud, but Are Inoperative as to Certain Persons."

g. Intent of Grantor.—Under W. Va. Code 1899, ch. 74, relating to fraudulent conveyances, etc., a bona fide purchaser for valuable consideration, who has no notice of the fraudulent intent of his immediate grantor, or of the fraud rendering void the title of such grantor is protected. But when the plaintiff has shown that the conveyance was made by the grantor with intent to delay, hinder, or defraud creditors, then the grantor must meet this by showing that he was a purchaser for value, and without notice of the fraudulent intent of his grantor; and the recital in the deed of the payment of the purchase money is not sufficient. Blackshire v. Pettit, 35 W. Va. 547, 14 S. E. Rep. 132.

And where the facts and circumstances connected with a fraudulent conveyance necessarily establish the complicity of the grantee in the fraudulent intent of the grantor, it is not necessary by direct proof to show notice of such intent to the grantee. Core v. Cunningham, 27 W. Va. 206.

a. In General.—Large latitude is always given to the admission of evidence where the charge is fraud. Piedmont Bank v. Hatcher, 94 Va. 229, 26 S. E. Rep. 505. And it seems well settled, that the rule in pari delicto potior est conditio defendendis, does not apply, where the policy of the law requires that a fraudulent or vicious conveyance should be enforced; and, therefore, where a debtor makes a fraudulent conveyance of his property, for the purpose of protecting it from his creditors, the fraudulent grantee may enforce such conveyance in a court of law, and the debtor will not be allowed to defeat the claim by proving fraud. Starke v. Littlepage, 4 Rand. 368.

So the maxim, "Nemo allegans suam turpitudinem audiendus est," if it be law, does not apply, where it is the creditors of the parties who assail the deed, and call on one of them to prove the fraud. Brown v. Molineaux, 21 Gratt. 539.

b. Evidence Inadmissible by Reason of the Incompetency of Parties.—See monographic note on "Witnesses."

Husband and Wife.—In William and Mary College v. Powell, 12 Gratt. 372, a postnuptial settlement was made by a husband upon his wife. The wife afterwards died; then a bill was filed by a creditor of the husband, against her children, to set aside the settlement as fraudulent as to the creditor. The court held that the husband was not a competent witness to prove the consideration upon which the settlement was made. So where husband and wife are both parties, and interested, their evidence is not admissible, because they are incompetent to testify. Perry v. Ruby, 81 Va. 317; Burton v. Mill, 78 Va. 468; Thornton v. Gaar, 87 Va. 315, 12 S. E. Rep. 753; Flynn v. Jackson, 98 Va. 341, 25 S. E. Rep. 1; De Farges v. Ryland, 87 Va. 404, 12 S. E. Rep. 805; Scott v. Rowland, 82 Va. 484, 4 S. E. Rep. 595.

c. When Evidence Is Admissible to Prove Consideration.—When the deed is assailed by third parties on the ground of fraud, it is admissible to show, in addition to the consideration expressed in the deed, that a substantial and valuable consideration was paid, or the converse. Casto v. Fry, 33 W. Va. 440, 10 S. E. Rep. 799. And this principle is extended to the introduction of parol evidence to show other valuable consideration, where a deed is made in consideration of "natural love and affection," and the further consideration of "one dollar." Harvey v. Alexander, 1 Rand. 219.

And in Eppes v. Randolph, 2 Call 125, decided in 1799, and before the provision making any gift, conveyance, etc., upon consideration of marriage, void as to existing creditors (see Va. Code 1887, § 2459), and therefore not in the light of that provision, it was held that, although a deed does not mention that it was made in consideration of a marriage contract, the party may, nevertheless, aver and prove it.

d. When and against Whom Recitals in Deeds Are Admissible as Evidence.—It is the settled law of this state that the recital in a deed of the payment of a valuable consideration for the property therein conveyed is not admissible as evidence of such payment as against a stranger or a creditor of the grantor assailing the deed as voluntary, and fraudulent as to him. Cohn v. Ward, 32 W. Va. 34, 9 S. E. Rep. 41; Childs v. Hurd, 32 W. Va. 66, 9 S. E. Rep. 302.

And under Va. Code 1887, § 2461, after a loan to a person with whom, or with those claiming under him, possession had remained five years, a deed is made by the lender, declaring the original loan and continuing it; but this deed is never admitted to record, the deed cannot affect the creditor of the person in possession and ought not to be received as evidence against such creditors. Pate v. Baker, 8 Leigh 80.

Nevertheless, the recital in a postnuptial settlement of a consideration for the deed, is evidence against persons claiming under the settler, but not against the creditors of the settler contesting the fairness or the validity of the deed. Blow v. May- nard, 2 Leigh 29; Lawrence v. Blow, 2 Leigh 29; Perry v. Ruby, 81 Va. 317; Flynn v. Jackson, 93 Va. 341, 25 S. E. Rep. 1.

c. Prior or Subsequent Conduct of Persons Interested.—Parol declarations of a grantor previous to the execution of a deed, and at the very moment of executing it, are admissible to explain the intention with which it was made. Land v. Jeffries, 5 Rand. 211.

But it is a well-settled rule of evidence that the declarations of the grantor, made subsequent to the conveyance, are not admissible to affect the title of his grantee; and this is most certainly true if made a year subsequent. Casto v. Fry, 33 W. Va. 449, 10 S. E. Rep. 799; Claytor v. Anthony, 6 Rand. 285.

However, where fraud in the sale and purchase of property is in issue, the evidence of other frauds of like character, committed by the same party, at or about the same time, is admissible. Piedmont Bank v. Hatcher, 94 Va. 229, 26 S. E. Rep. 505.

a. In General.—In order to set aside a conveyance claimed to be fraudulent as to creditors, it must be shown that both grantor and grantee participated in, or had knowledge of the fraud. Mer. Bank v. Belt (Va. 1898), 30 S. E. Rep. 467. And the fraud must be clearly proved. First Nat. Bank v. Bowman, 36 W. Va. 649, 14 S. E. Rep. 989; Greer v. O'Brien, 36 W. Va. 277, 15 S. E. Rep. 74; Arnold v. Slaughter, 36 W. Va. 589, 15 S. E. Rep. 250.

However, it is not necessary to prove that the grantee had positive knowledge of such fraudulent intent. It is sufficient to prove that the grantee had knowledge of facts and circumstances which would have excited the suspicion of a man of ordinary care and prudence, and put him upon inquiry as to the bona fides of the transaction, which inquiry would necessarily have led to a discovery of the fraud of his grantor. American Net & Twine Co. v. Mayo, 97 Va. 182, 33 S. E. Rep. 523.

And it is not enough that the purpose of the grantor be fraudulent. Knowledge of such purpose must be clearly brought home to the alienee. Where the latter had denied such knowledge on oath, it cannot be held that his denial is overthrown by mere circumstances of suspicion adduced against him. Batchelder v. White, 80 Va. 103.

But if a husband conveys a tract of land to his wife, and the conveyance is attacked by his creditors, the deed should be set aside if the evidence is conflicting; though the preponderance is against the good faith of the transaction. Noyes v. Carter (Va.), 23 S. E. Rep. 1.

Moreover, if a deed bears upon its face such marks or badges of fraud as to clearly show that the intent of the grantor was to delay, hinder, or defraud his creditors, such deed is fraudulent on its face, and the court will so hold it on inspection. In such case the thing itself speaks, and conclusively proclaims the fraudulent intent, because the grantor is taken to intend what he does, and the natural or necessary consequences of his act. Douglass Mdse. Co. v. Laird, 37 W. Va. 687, 17 S. E. Rep. 188. And evidence will not be received to contradict such conclusion. Long v. Meriden, etc., Co., 94 Va. 594, 27 S. E. Rep. 499.

And the usual badges of fraud are: Gross inadequacy of price; no security taken for the purchase money; unusual length of credit for the bonds which have been taken at long periods; conveyance in payment of antecedent indebtedness of a father to his son when they reside together; threats and pendency of suits; concealment of the transactions which relate to the conveyances; keeping the deed unacknowledged and unrecorded for a considerable time; remaining in possession by the grantor as before the conveyance. Any of these facts may make a case of prima facie fraud, calling on the parties for explanation. Hickman v. Trout, 83 Va. 478, 8 S. E. Rep. 131; Todd v. Sykes, 97 Va. 143, 33 S. E. Rep. 517; Paul v. Baugh, 85 Va. 955, 9 S. E. Rep. 329; Young v. Willis, 82 Va. 291; Armstrong v. Lachman, 84 Va. 726, 6 S. E. Rep. 129; Reilly v. Barr, 34 W. Va. 95, 11 S. E. Rep. 750; Didier v. Patterson, 93 Va. 534, 25 S. E. Rep. 661. But the privilege of longer time and possession, not exceeding five years, upon paying interest, does not affect validity; nor will the fact that creditors may be hindered and delayed, in the absence of fraudulent intent. Keagy v. Trout, 85 Va. 390, 7 S. E. Rep. 329; Sipe v. Earman, 26 Gratt. 563; Young v. Willis, 82 Va. 291.

b. In Equity.—While no rule can be laid down as to the extent of evidence required to set aside a conveyance as fraudulent, it must satisfy the chancellor's conscience, and it may be, and generally must be, circumstantial. Armstrong, Cator & Co. v. Lachman, 84 Va. 726, 6 S. E. Rep. 129; Witz, Biedler & Co. v. Osburn, 83 Va. 227, 2 S. E. Rep. 33; Moore v. Ullman, 80 Va. 307.

c. Circumstantial Evidence.—While the burden of proving a deed fraudulent as to creditors is upon the creditors, positive evidence of fraudulent intent is not required, but it may be deduced from the circumstances of the transaction and the relation and situation of the parties to it and to each other. Circumstantial evidence if adequate to satisfy the court of such fraudulent intent, is sufficient, and often the only evidence attainable. Reynolds v. Gawthrop, 37 W. Va. 3, 16 S. E. Rep. 364; Moore v. Ullman, 80 Va. 307; Armstrong, Cator & Co. v. Lachman, 84 Va. 726, 6 S. E. Rep. 129; Witz, Biedler & Co. v. Osburn, 83 Va. 227, 2 S. E. Rep. 33.

Therefore, a fraudulent intent need not be established by express proof but may be shown by just legal implication from the evidence where the circumstances are such that the intent may be justly inferred. Pratt v. Cox, 22 Gratt. 330; Johnson v. Wagner, 76 Va. 501; Lockhard v. Beckley, 10 W. Va. 101.

Or, as expressed in Martin v. Rexroad, 15 W. Va. 512, fraud should be legally inferred from the facts and circumstances of the case, when the facts and circumstances are of such a character as to lead a reasonable man to the conclusion that the sale was made with the intent to hinder, delay or defraud existing or future creditors. And further, where the facts and circumstances in any case are such as to make a prima facie case of fraudulent intent, they are to be taken as conclusive evidence of such intent, unless rebutted by other facts and circumstances in the case. Sturm v. Chalfant, 38 W. Va. 248, 18 S. E. Rep. 451; Goshorn v. Snodgrass, 17 W. Va. 717; Hutchinson v. Boltz, 35 W. Va. 754, 14 S. E. Rep. 267; Himan v. Thorn, 32 W. Va. 507, 9 S. E. Rep. 980; Parker v. Valentine, 27 W. Va. 677; Lockhard v. Beckley, 10 W. Va. 88; Richardson v. Ralphsnyder, 40 W. Va. 15, 20 S. E. Rep. 854; Livesay v. Beard, 22 W. Va. 585; Saunders v. Parrish, 86 Va. 502, 10 S. E. Rep. 748; Paul v. Baugh, 85 Va. 955, 9 S. E. Rep. 329; Hickman v. Trout, 83 Va. 478, 8 S. E. Rep. 131; Alsop v. Catlett, 97 Va. 364, 34 S. E. Rep. 48; Reilly v. Barr, 34 W. Va. 95, 11 S. E. Rep. 750; Ferguson v. Daughtrey,

d. Nature and Circumstances of the Transaction.

(a) In General.—While fraud must be proved, the transaction itself may furnish proof of the fraud so satisfactory and conclusive as to outweigh the answers of the defendants denying the fraud, or even the evidence of witnesses. Hazlewood v. Forrer, 94 Va. 703, 27 S. E. Rep. 507; Todd v. Sykes, 97 Va. 143, 33 S. E. Rep. 517.

Therefore, wherever there appears to be connected with the transaction circumstances indicating excessive effort to give the appearance of fairness or regularity, which are not usual attendants of such business, the courts will regard such circumstances as badges of fraud. Hart v. Sandy, 39 W. Va. 644, 20 S. E. Rep. 665.

Thus, the including in such a deed perishable property which must be consumed or become worthless before the time fixed for the sale, though it may not of itself be sufficient to set aside the deed as fraudulent, yet it is a fact indicative of a fraudulent intent. Quarles v. Kerr, 14 Gratt. 48.

So when the facts and circumstances tend to show that a gift was intended, and that the husband used and dealt with the property as his own, the mere parol testimony of the husband and wife of a private understanding between themselves that the transaction should be considered or was intended as a loan to the husband by the wife, and not a gift, will not, as against the creditors of an insolvent husband, rebut the presumption of a gift. Zinn v. Law, 32 W. Va. 447, 9 S. E. Rep. 871.

(b) Conduct.—Fraud may be deduced from deceptive assertions, and from incidents and circumstances evincing a fraudulent intent. Sturm v. Chalfant, 38 W. Va. 248, 18 S. E. Rep. 451.

Thus, in a suit, if the burden of proof as to the existence and validity of certain alleged debts, be cast upon the grantee, and the persons, to whom or by whom any of such debts were paid, as well as the subscribing witnesses to such deed, are within the power of the grantee, and instead of examining them he becomes a witness for himself in regard to such consideration, such failure to call and examine such witnesses unless satisfactorily explained will be regarded as a badge of fraud upon said conveyance. Knight v. Capito, 23 W. Va. 639.

(c) Possession.—Concurrent possession of both the grantor and grantee in an absolute deed after the conveyance is a badge of fraud. Livesay v. Beard, 22 W. Va. 585.

However, it is not an evidence of fraud, for a mortgagor, of personal property to continue in possession, if the mortgage appears to have been made upon a bona fide consideration, and is duly recorded. But if the mortgagor afterwards by deed releases the equity of redemption to the mortgagee (which deed is not duly recorded), and still retains the possession, such evidence is sufficient to render the deed void as against creditors. Clayborn v. Hill, 1 Wash. 177.

So when a conveyance is made in consideration of a pre-existing indebtedness, it is a badge of fraud for the grantee to retain the evidence of such indebtedness, in his possession uncanceled, after the conveyance has been completed. Webb v. Ingham, 29 W. Va. 389, 1 S. E. Rep. 816.

And in Forkner v. Stuart, 6 Gratt. 197, it was held, on a sale of slaves, if the possession of the slaves does not accompany the sale, but remains with the vendor, such retention of possession by the vendor is prima facie evidence of fraud, but is not conclusive; and it is liable to be repelled by satisfactory legal evidence of the fairness and good faith of the transaction.

(d) Relationship.—Transactions between a father and child, brother and sister, and many others, between whom there exists a natural and strong motive to provide for a dependent at the expense of honest creditors, if such transaction be impeached as fraudulent, may be shown to be fraudulent by less proof than would be required when different relations exist; and the party claiming the benefit of such transaction, will be held to a fuller and stricter proof of its justice; and the fairness of the transaction, after it is shown to be prima facie fraudulent, will require greater proof to be established than would be required if the transaction were between strangers. Burt v. Timmons, 29 W. Va. 441, 2 S. E. Rep. 780.

Therefore, where a conveyance is made to a near relative, the fact is calculated to awaken suspicion, and the transaction will be closely scrutinized, though the fact is not of itself sufficient to raise a presumption of fraud. So mere proof of inadequacy of price is insufficient to implicate the grantee in the fraudulent intent as inadequacy of price, unless extremely gross, does not per se prove fraud. It must appear that the price was so manifestly inadequate as to shock the moral sense, and create at once upon its being mentioned a suspicion of fraud. Bierne v. Ray, 37 W. Va. 571, 16 S. E. Rep. 804.

But while transactions between father and son are subject to critical scrutiny, yet if the circumstances show them to be fair, open, and free from fraudulent intent, the relationship of the parties will not vitiate or render them void. Douglass v. Douglass, 41 W. Va. 18, 23 S. E. Rep. 671.

Consequently the mere fact that a party conveys his property to a son or a brother is not per se a badge of fraud, but, when such conveyance is attacked as fraudulent, such relationship, connected with other circumstances may strengthen the presumption of fraud. Farmers' Transp. Co. v. Swaney (W. Va. 1900), 37 S. E. Rep. 592.

And the evidence to sustain an alleged parol gift by a father to his daughter on her marriage, should be clear and cogent. Collins v. Lofftus, 10 Leigh 5.

(e) Husband and Wife.—Transactions between a husband and wife, between whom there exists a natural and strong motive to provide for a dependent at the expense of honest creditors, if such transaction be impeached as fraudulent, may be shown to be fraudulent by less proof than would be required when different relations exist; and the party claiming the benefit of such transaction will be held to a fuller and stricter proof of its justice; and the fairness of the transaction, after it is shown to be prima facie fraudulent, will require greater proof to be established than would be required if the transaction were between strangers. Burt v. Timmons, 29 W. Va. 441, 2 S. E. Rep. 780.

And moreover, if a husband conveys a tract of land to his wife, and the conveyance is attacked as fraudulent by his creditors, the deed should be set aside if the evidence is conflicting, as the presumption is against the good faith of the transaction. Noyes v. Carter (Va.), 23 S. E. Rep. 1.

e. Insolvency.—Insolvency does not deprive the owner of property of the right to sell it, unless the sale be made with intent to hinder, delay and defraud his creditors; and even then, the title of the purchaser will not be invalidated if the sale is for valuable consideration, and the purchaser has no notice of the fraudulent intent of the grantor. It is not necessary, however, to prove positive knowledge of the fraudulent intent of the grantor. Ferguson v. Daughtrey, 94 Va. 308, 26 S. E. Rep. 822.

And the fact that a deed of trust of all of an insolvent's property, executed to secure part of his creditors, provides for payment of the surplus to the grantor, is not of itself evidence of fraudulent intent. Harvey v. Anderson (Va.), 24 S. E. Rep. 914.

But when a debtor in failing circumstances conveys property for a grossly inadequate consideration, that is evidence of fraudulent intent. Livesay v. Beard, 22 W. Va. 585.

f. Consideration.—Where fraudulent intent against creditors is sought to be made out against a transfer of his property by a debtor on the sole ground of inadequacy of consideration, without any other element tending to show fraud, the inadequacy must be so great as fairly to induce the belief of fraudulent intent. Wood v. Harmison, 41 W. Va. 376, 23 S. E. Rep. 560.

But it is evidence of fraud for a debtor who is in failing circumstances to convey property for a grossly inadequate consideration. Livesay v. Beard, 22 W. Va. 585.

g. Bill Pro Confesso.—And in Price v. Thrash, 30 Gratt. 515, it was held that, fraud could be proven by a bill taken pro confesso, in which notice of the fraud is clearly charged. Welsh v. Solenberger, 85 Va. 441, 8 S. E. Rep. 91.

F. INJUNCTION.—Where a deed is made by a father to his son of land for one-half of its value with the fraudulent intent of hindering, delaying and defrauding his creditors, and the deed of trust is executed at the same time to secure the payment of the bond for the purchase money, which bond is assigned to a third person, and the trustee in the deed of trust advertises the land for sale, and the creditor of the father at the time of the conveyance to the son obtains an injunction to prohibit the sale of the land by the trustee, the injunction ought not on motion to be dissolved whether the third person to whom the bond was assigned, was or was not a party to the fraud. Beall v. Shaul, 18 W. Va. 258.

And in Terrell v. Imboden, 10 Leigh 321, an obligee in a bond secured by a deed of trust, made a deed transferring the bond and deed of trust for the benefit of his creditors. Afterwards, at the request of the obligor, the obligee signed a receipt, stating, that on the day of the date thereof he received the amount of the bond. The bond was in fact executed without consideration, and the receipt was in fact given without any payment. The creditors for whose benefit the bond was assigned had no notice of its being without consideration until after the assignment: but the obligor knew of the assignment when he took the receipt. In a suit between the obligor and those claiming under the assignment, an injunction awarded to restrain the sale of the property conveyed to secure the bond, was dissolved; and the court of appeals affirmed the order of dissolution. See monographic note on "Injunctions" appended to Clayton v. Anthony, 15 Gratt. 518.

G. TRIAL.

Directing an Issue—When Proper.—Where a charge of fraud is made in the bill, but denied in the answer, and the testimony is such as to leave it doubtful, a court of equity ought to direct an issue to ascertain it. Bullock v. Gordon, 4 Munf. 450; Marshall v. Thompson, 2 Munf. 412.

When New Trial Proper.—If the jury find a sale to be bona fide and valid, the court ought not to set aside the verdict and award a new trial, unless the evidence is plainly insufficient to warrant the jury in concluding, that despite the fact that the vendor continued in possession of the property after the sale and the strong legal presumption thence arising, that the sale is not for a fair and valuable consideration, and that the vendor retained an interest in the property after the sale, and that such sale is fraudulent and void, the consideration is fair, and no interest in the property is retained by the vendor after the sale, and it is otherwise untainted with fraud. Bindley v. Martin, 28 W. Va. 773.

In another case the owner of a slave, residing in Tennessee, delivered a slave to his son-in-law, who was about to remove to Virginia, and took from him a deed, specifying that the slave was lent to his son-in-law who was to take good care of her and deliver her back to him when he should demand her; the owner told the subscribing witness, that the deed was taken to show that the slave was his property, in case she should be taken by his son-in-law's creditors while the slave remained in Tennessee, but that "he intended to give her to his son-in-law anyhow." The son-in-law removed with the slave to Virginia. In a contest between the owner and the son-in-law's mortgagees of the slave, who had possession, the jury found a verdict for the owner, and the court refused to grant another trial; upon appeal it was held that a new trial was properly refused. Mahon v. Johnston, 7 Leigh 317.

H. DECREE.

1. INTERLOCUTORY DECREE—AS A BAR TO ANOTHER SUIT.—In Quarles v. Kerr, 14 Gratt. 48, a trustee filed a bill to enforce the trust deed, and the court decreed the sale and distribution of the trust subject among the creditors provided for, except one, who was excluded under the provisions of the deed, because he sued out an execution on his judgment. The creditor who was excluded then filed a bill to set aside the trust deed, on the ground that it was fraudulent on its face. The court held that the question whether the deed was fraudulent was not put in issue in the first case, and therefore could not be decided; and that as the decree in the first case was interlocutory merely, it could be no bar to the second suit.

2. WHEN DECREE IS FINAL.—Where a decree annuls a conveyance for fraud and directs a commissioner to ascertain the location and value of the lands and the liens thereon, it is not a final decree in the sense that an answer may not be filed thereafter. Welsh v. Solenberger, 85 Va. 441, 8 S. E. Rep. 91; Va. Code 1887, § 3275.

3. WHEN DECREE IS ERRONEOUS.—If there be several parties who claim to be paid their debts, and to be indemnified for securityship out of the debtor's lands and chattels conveyed by a third party, and there be an adversary creditor by judgment, who claims to have the deed set aside for fraud, and the property sold to pay his judgment debt, an interlocutory decree, which, without deciding on the validity of the deeds or the extent to which, and in what order the said several debts are chargeable on the property, yet directs that the lands conveyed shall be sold for cash, and the proceeds to be paid into bank to the credit of the cause, is premature and erroneous, and has a tendency to sacrifice the property, by discouraging the creditors from bidding as they probably would, if their right to satisfaction of their debts, etc., had been previously ascertained.

Such a decree, however, may be proper as it regards the sale of chattels, because they are perishable, liable to be wasted, and no sacrifice need be apprehended, because they may be sold in detail. As to the lands, they should in such case, be put into the hands of the receiver, to be rented out, until the rights of the parties, in respect to the subject, are determined, having a due regard to the rights of the widow of the debtor. Cole v. McRae, 6 Rand. 644 (1828).

And in a suit by a judgment creditor to set aside a deed as fraudulent, it is error to set the deed aside in toto, as it is valid and binding between the parties to the fraud, and only void as to creditors. Love v. Tinsley, 32 W. Va. 25, 9 S. E. Rep. 44; Duncan v. Custard, 24 W. Va. 780.

Moreover, if a court, by its decree, has cancelled and set aside a fraudulent deed and charged the lands thereby attempted to be conveyed with the amount of the debt due to the fraudulent grantee, such decree is erroneous and will be for that cause reversed. Kan. Val. Bk. v. Wilson, 25 W. Va. 242.

4. WHEN IMPROPER FOR A COURT TO DECREE AS TO THE SUFFICIENCY OF PROPERTY TO PAY DEBTS.—Where a deed of trust to secure creditors has been assailed by an unsecured creditor, and one of the secured debts has been stricken out by the appellate court as fraudulent, that court will not, upon mere estimates of the value of the property conveyed, declare that it is not more than sufficient to pay to the other secured creditors whose debts are not disputed. Stoneburner v. Motley, 95 Va. 784, 30 S. E. Rep. 364.

5. WHEN VENDOR OF LAND AND ASSIGNEE OF DEBT NOT ENTITLED TO A DECREE.—Although a contract for the sale of a tract of land be made with a husband, yet if it is understood between the parties at the time the contract is made that the purchase money is to be paid by the wife out of her separate estate, and the deed is made by the vendor to the husband, and a vendor's lien retained to secure the purchase money, yet if the vendor knowingly receives the purchase money from the wife, in accordance with the original understanding, and such land is conveyed by the husband to the wife, in consideration of her payment of the purchase money, said vendor cannot attack such conveyance as fraudulent to a debt due from the husband as purchase money for a mule, of which the wife had no notice; neither can the assignee of such debt so attack such conveyance. Prim v. McIntosh, 48 W. Va. 790, 28 S. E. Rep. 742.

6. DECREE WHEN RELIEF IN GENERAL PRAYED FOR.—If in a bill by creditors to set aside a deed of trust for payment of debts, on the ground that it is fraudulent on its face, the bill does not ask for an account, but there is a prayer for general relief, and the deed is sustained as valid, the plaintiffs are entitled to an account. And in such case, the court below having dismissed the bill generally, and it not appearing that the plaintiffs asked for an account or that the court considered the question, the appellate court will affirm the decree sustaining the deed, and reverse it as to the account; but with costs to the appellee. Marks v. Hill, 15 Gratt. 400.

And in Beall v. Silver, 2 Rand. 401, a creditor obtained judgment against his debtor, without running interest, and his execution was obstructed by a fraudulent conveyance made by the debtor, of his property. Subsequently a suit in chancery was brought to remove the obstruction of the conveyance, and for relief generally. The court declared that it was proper for the chancellor to decree the interest, as well as to set aside the conveyance; the prayer for general relief being sufficient to cover the demand for interest.

Moreover, in Austin v. Winston, 1 H. & M. 33, the court declared, that where a transaction between a debtor and certain of his creditors, is intended by them both to defraud the other creditors of the debtor, but the latter, under all the circumstances of the case, is not so culpable as the former, it would seem that the court of equity ought not, altogether, to refuse relief to the debtor, but should apportion the relief granted to the decree of criminality in both parties, so as, on the one hand, to avoid the encouragement of fraud, and on the other, to prevent extortion and oppression.

7. DECREE SETTING ASIDE A CONVEYANCE.—It is error to decree a conveyance void, in toto, and to set it aside absolutely, when it is void only as to creditors, whose debts were contracted before the time of making the conveyance; but such error is not sufficient to reverse the decree, but may be corrected and the decree affirmed as corrected. Linsey v. McGannon, 9 W. Va. 154.

But when, in a suit to set aside a deed of conveyance as fraudulent and void as to plaintiff's debt, and to sell the real estate therefor, the court ascertains and decrees that it is so fraudulent and void, it is error not to decree further, and set aside said deed and provide for the sale of the property conveyed to pay the debt. Chrislip v. Teter, 48 W. Va. 356, 27 S. E. Rep. 288. See in general connection, Cronie v. Hart, 18 Gratt. 789.

However, if the value of property settled, exceeds the value of the dower relinquished, the deed should be set aside as to the excess, and supported as to the residue. Taylor v. Moore, 2 Rand. 563.

And in Beall v. Silver, 2 Rand. 401, a creditor obtained judgment against his debtor, without running interest, and his execution was obstructed by a fraudulent conveyance made by the debtor, of his property. Subsequently a suit in chancery was brought to remove the obstruction of the conveyance, and for relief generally. The court declared that it was proper for the chancellor to decree the interest, as well as to set aside the conveyance; the prayer for general relief being sufficient to cover the demand for interest.

Sale—Fraudulent Representations.—If a person purchases goods on credit by means of fraudulent representations, or was under age at the time, it is no ground for annulling a sale of the goods made to secure a debt for borrowed money, due a person ignorant of such means, there being no collusion with the buyer to defraud other creditors. Jones v. Christian, 86 Va. 1017, 11 S. E. Rep. 984.

Deed of Trust—Trustee Not a Party to the Fraud.—And although a deed of trust to secure a creditor be made with intent to defraud other creditors of the grantor, it will not be set aside in the absence of proof that either the trustee or the creditor secured was a party to the fraud. Alsop v. Catlett, 97 Va. 364, 34 S. E. Rep. 48; Oberdorfer v. Meyer, 88 Va. 384, 13 S. E. Rep. 756; Paul v. Baugh, 85 Va. 955, 9 S. E. Rep. 329; Penn v. Penn, 88 Va. 361, 13 S. E. Rep. 707.

Antenuptial Settlement—Wife Connives at Fraud.—An antenuptial deed of marriage settlement will not be set aside at the instance of the husband's creditors, on the ground that the wife connived at the fraud, when the entire testimony shows that the wife, before marriage, had no knowledge of any fraud in the settlement. Noble v. Davies (Va. 1887), 4 S. E. Rep. 206.

8. DECREE ORDERING SALE.

Necessity of Convening Creditors, Reporting Debts, Ascertaining Rents and Profits.—In a suit brought to have an alleged fraudulent conveyance set aside, and to subject the property to the payment of the creditor's claim, it is not required by statute, or by the general law on this subject, that all the creditors shall be convened, and their debts reported, or that it should be ascertained whether the rents will pay off his debts in five years, or in a reasonable time, before there can be a decree of sale. Core v. Cunningham, 27 W. Va. 206; Burt v. Timmons, 29 W. Va. 441, 2 S. E. Rep. 780; State v. Bowen, 38 W. Va. 91, 18 S. E. Rep. 375.

But the Code of Virginia 1860, ch. 186, § 9, requires that the lien of a judgment may be enforced in equity, but forbids a decree of sale unless it appears that the rents and profits of the land subject to the lien will not satisfy the judgment in five years. Under this statute it was held in Cronie v. Hart, 18 Gratt. 739 (1868), that, before setting aside a deed as fraudulent towards its creditors, the court should direct an inquiry as to whether plaintiff's debts could not be paid out of the rents and profits of the property conveyed in five years.

Propriety of Decree for Sale When Trustee is a Non-resident.—In a suit by judgment creditors against their debtors and others to set aside a deed of trust and to subject the land to the payment of their debts, it appeared that the trustee living out of the state, was not a party to the suit, and had not signed the deed; but it did not appear that he had accepted or acted under it. It was held, that the court might properly decree a sale of land, and appoint a commissioner to make the sale. Barger v. Buckland, 28 Gratt. 850.

When Deed Declared Void, It Should Be Set Aside and Provision Made for Sale.—When, in a suit to set aside a deed of conveyance as fraudulent and void as to the plaintiff's debt, and to sell the real estate therefor, the court ascertains and decrees that it is so fraudulent and void, it is error not to decree further, and set aside said deed and provide for the sale of the property conveyed to pay the debt. Chrislip v. Teter, 43 W. Va. 356, 27 S. E. Rep. 288; Coleman v. Cocke, 6 Rand. 618.

And if the sale or conveyance is fraudulent, and gives unlawful preferences, then such sale or conveyance will be set aside, and a resale be made, so far as may be necessary to pay the honest claims against such insolvent fraudulent debtor. First Nat. Bank of Cumberland v. Parsons, 42 W. Va. 137, 24 S. E. Rep. 554.

A Moiety of the Land, Only Decreed to Be Sold.—Moreover, if a judgment debtor has conveyed away lands fraudulently, and retained other lands, the court on setting aside the conveyance at the suit of a judgment creditor, should direct a sale of a moiety of the whole, embracing in the moiety decreed to be sold, the land not conveyed by the debtor, and taking only so much of the land conveyed as will, with the land retained by the debtor, constitute a moiety of the aggregate of the whole. This was the rule, as declared in McNew v. Smith, 5 Gratt. 84 (1848), decided prior to the Va. Code 1849.

9. DECREE FOR SALE OF PROPERTY OTHER THAN THAT CONVEYED.—And where a deed void as to creditors, is valid as between the parties, in a suit by the grantor's creditors to subject the lands to payment of their claims, other property of the grantor in the hands of parties to the suit will be so applied to the payment of the claims. Fones v. Rice, 9 Gratt. 568.

So, on a bill against fraudulent donees of a deceased person and his heir to subject the lands conveyed and those descended, the whole may be decreed to be sold to satisfy the plaintiff's debt. Blow v. Maynard, 2 Leigh 29.

10. PERSONAL DECREE.—And in a suit to subject lands to the payment of a lien and to set aside fraudulent conveyances, the report of sale having been made, and it being found that the sale will not produce sufficient money to pay the lien, expense of sale, and costs, a personal decree should be rendered against all the fraudulent grantors and grantees for any costs remaining after providing for the payment of the liens and expenses of sale. Hinton v. Ellis, 27 W. Va. 422.

However, where the property is still in possession of the fraudulent purchaser, the creditor cannot take a personal, money decree for his debt, or the value of the property, against the purchaser, but must subject the property itself; however, if the fraudulent purchaser has sold the property to a bona fide purchaser, so that it cannot be reached, the creditor may have a money decree against the fraudulent purchaser for the amount he received for the property, or, if that be less than its actual value, then for such value; if the bona fide purchaser yet owes for the property, the money in his hands may be followed and subjected in his hands. Vance Shoe Co. v. Haught, 41 W. Va. 275, 23 S. E. Rep. 553.

And a creditor cannot have a judgment for the recovery of money against the grantee of a debtor on mere proof that the conveyance was fraudulent. Ringold v. Sulter, 35 W. Va. 186, 18 S. E. Rep. 46.

But in a creditors' suit in chancery to avoid divers fraudulent conveyances made by the common debtor to different colluding grantees, all or an intermediate number of whom are made parties, the plaintiffs may elect to proceed wholly against any one of such grantees. And where such grantee, against whom plaintiffs elect to proceed, has, in the meanwhile, aliened the property received by him, and a personal decree is entered against him for the full amount of the plaintiffs' claims (not exceeding the value of the debtor's interest in the property so received by him), such grantee is not entitled to a decree over against his codefendants for contribution. Ellington v. Moore, 4 Va. Law Reg. 608.

In Greer v. Wright, 6 Gratt. 154, a defendant, to evade the payment of an anticipated judgment, transferred to his brother two bonds, executed by two obligors, and also his interest in the real estate of his deceased father. Judgment was rendered against him, and he took the oath of an insolvent debtor and surrendered nothing. The plaintiff then filed a bill against the defendant and his brother, and one of the obligors and the sheriff, and obtained a decree setting aside the transfers. It was held that, in the first instance, it was erroneous to make a joint and personal decree against the defendant and his brother, but it should have been against the two obligors for the amount they respectively owed.

11. OPERATION AND EFFECT OF DECREE.—Where in a bill by a creditor against the trustee and executor of his debtor to have payment of his debt, and charging, deed fraudulent, and voluntary in part, the court makes a decree directing a commissioner, among other things, to take an account of debts of the testator, the statute of limitations ceases to run against creditors from the date of that decree. Harvey v. Steptoe, 17 Gratt. 280.

J. LIEN OF ATTACKING CREDITOR.

1. LIEN OF PLAINTIFF.

When Lien Begins.—In Wallace v. Treacle (1876), 27 Gratt. 479, sec. 2, ch. 179, Code 1849 (Va. Code 1860, ch. 179, sec. 2), came before the court for the first time for its true construction. CHRISTIAN, J., delivering the opinion of the court, said: "I think there could be no doubt that it was the intention of the legislature to declare that a party creditor who filed his bill to avoid a fraudulent conveyance acquired a lien upon the property conveyed in such void conveyance, if he obtained a decree setting it aside, and in that event the lien attaches from the day the bill is filed."

This rule was also followed by the West Virginia court in Sweeney v. Grape Sugar Co., 30 W. Va. 443, 4 S. E. Rep. 431 (1887), where it was held, that general creditors who, by bill, answer, or petition, assail a deed of their debtor conveying lands as fraudulent, and succeed, have a lien on the land for their respective debts from the filing of such bill, answer, or petition. Hughes v. Hamilton, 19 W. Va. 306 (1882); Guggenheimer v. Lockridge, 39 W. Va. 457, 19 S. E. Rep. 874; Witz v. Lockridge, 39 W. Va. 463, 19 S. E. Rep. 876.

But subsequent to this time in the First National Bank of Cumberland v. Parsons, 42 W. Va. 137, 24 S. E. Rep. 554 (1896), and after the W. Va. Acts of 1891, p. 353, ch. 123 (W. Va. Code 1899, ch. 74, sec. 3), relating to acts void as to creditors and purchasers, the court held, that, in view of this statutory provision, "The former rule in equity of rewarding the diligence of the creditor who first assailed the fraudulent deed of an insolvent debtor with a preference over the other creditors must give way to the statute as inconsistent therewith upon this statute as thus amended. This equitable rule of rewarding the diligence of the first assailant of the fraudulent deed of an insolvent debtor sometimes led to such hardship, especially where the deed had to be held to be fraudulent on its face, that the preference given the vigilant assailant was sometimes worse than fraud."

However, by the Va. Code 1887, sec. 2460, it is expressly declared that when in such case a creditor institutes a suit to avoid a gift, conveyance, etc., on the grounds of its being void as to creditors and purchasers, such creditors shall have a lien from the time of bringing his suit. Craig v. Hoge, 95 Va. 276, 28 S. E. Rep. 317. And this advantage is not lost to a creditor secured by the deed of trust which is attacked as fraudulent, as he may, while claiming under the deed, assail the validity of other debts secured in the same deed. His attitude as purchaser does not impair his right as creditor to assail such debts as fraudulent or otherwise void. Runkle v. Runkle, 98 Va. 663, 37 S. E. Rep. 279. However, it was held in Craig v. Hoge, 95 Va. 275, 28 S. E. Rep. 317, that, if a creditor plaintiff succeeds in his attack upon a particular preferred debt secured in the deed, the debt being fraudulent, such debt will be eliminated from the security, but the creditor will not be substituted to the priority of the eliminated debt; the deed will stand just as it was, with the exception of the fraudulent debt, which will be excluded. See Runkle v. Runkle, 98 Va. 663, 37 S. E. Rep. 279. See Cohn v. Ward, 36 W. Va. 516, 15 S. E. Rep. 140. This lien, however, is conditional. As against creditors, with or without notice, and purchasers for value without notice, the lien is valid only from the time that the plaintiff creditor files his memorandum of lis pendens, as provided by Va. Code 1887, sec. 2460; Acts 1893-94, p. 614. Davis v. Bonney, 89 Va. 755, 17 S. E. Rep. 229. Moreover, this lien fastens only upon the property conveyed, and not, like the lien of a judgment on all of the debtor's estate. Davis v. Bonney, 89 Va. 755, 17 S. E. Rep. 229. Here, also, should be noted, the case of Oppenheim v. Myers (Va. 1901), 39 S. E. Rep. 218, in which an action was brought by defendants as creditors to set aside a voluntary conveyance by plaintiffs, and the conveyance was set aside. Afterwards the plaintiff's husband died and she petitioned to have the property set aside as her homestead. It was held that the petition should be granted under Va. Code 1887, sec. 3642, providing that the homestead may be set apart at any time before it is subjected to sale, notwithstanding sec. 2460 providing that the creditor causing such conveyance to be set aside shall have a lien on the property from the commencement of the action. See generally, Wright v. Hancock, 3 Munf. 521.

Furthermore, a creditor who joins in a suit to set aside a fraudulent conveyance some time after the filing of the bill is entitled to a lien prior to that of the creditor commencing the suit where the former filed such memorandum and the latter did not. Davis v. Bonney, 89 Va. 755, 17 S. E. Rep. 229.

Nevertheless, the priority of a creditor's lien obtained by first filing a memorandum concerning a creditors' suit to set aside a fraudulent conveyance as required by Va. Code 1887, sec. 2460, is not affected by the fact that the lien attached after the rendition of a decree in favor of such creditor and of another creditor who commenced the suit. Davis v. Bonney, 89 Va. 755, 17 S. E. Rep. 229.

2. PETITIONING CREDITOR'S LIEN.

When Lien Begins.—And it is further provided by Va. Code 1887, sec. 2460, that when a creditor comes into a suit which is brought by another creditor, to assail a fraudulent or voluntary conveyance, he shall have a lien from the time of filing his petition. This section was amended by Acts 1893-94, ch. 556, pp. 614, 615, so as to allow the petition to be filed in the clerk's office at rules. 2 Va. Law Reg. 433. Such lien is conditional, and subject to the principles governing plaintiff's lien, explained ante, "Lien of Plaintiff."

K. DISPOSITION OF THE PROPERTY.

1. IN GENERAL.

Placing Lands in Hands of a Receiver.—If there be several parties who claim to be paid their debts, and to be indemnified for securityship out of a debtor's land and chattels conveyed by deeds, and there be an adversary creditor by judgment, who claims the right to have the deeds set aside for fraud, and the property sold to pay his judgment debt, an interlocutory decree, which, without deciding on the validity of the said several debts, yet directs that the land conveyed shall be sold for cash, and the proceeds to be paid into bank to the credit of the cause, is premature and erroneous, because it has a tendency to sacrifice the property, by discouraging the creditors from bidding, as that probably would, if their right to satisfaction of their debts had been previously ascertained.

Such a decree may be proper as it regards the sale of chattels, because they are perishable, liable to be wasted, and no sacrifice need be apprehended, because they may be sold in detail.

As to the lands, they should in such case, be put into the hands of a receiver, to be rented out, until the rights of the parties, in respect to that subject, are determined, having a due regard to the rights of the widow of the debtor. Cole v. M'Rae, 6 Rand. 644.

Directing an Account.—And in McNew v. Smith, 5 Gratt. 84, it was held to be a correct practice, for a court, at the suit of judgment creditor, upon setting aside a sale of personal property by the debtor, as fraudulent and void, and directing the purchaser to deliver the property to a commissioner who was directed to sell it, to direct an account of its value in order to subject the purchaser for the amount, upon his failure to so deliver the property to the commissioner as directed.

2. SUBJECTING LAND TO CLAIMS OF CREDITORS.—Where a deed is proven to have been made on a secret trust in fraud of the grantor's creditors, it will be set aside; and the land subjected to the payment of the debts due the creditors. And a co-surety who has paid the debt by reason of the principal's insolvency, and has been subrogated to the lien of the judgment paid, may have the land conveyed subjected to the payment of his claim. Hawker v. Moore, 40 W. Va. 49, 20 S. E. Rep. 848.

And though a trust deed is held to be valid in a suit by a judgment creditor to set it aside the creditor is entitled to the surplus after paying the debt secured. Sipe v. Earman, 26 Gratt. 563.

3. COSTS AND ATTORNEY'S FEES.—In a suit to subject land to the payment of a judgment lien and to set aside deeds for fraud against the plaintiff, it is proper to decree that the costs of the suit shall be first paid out of the proceeds of sale of the land. Hinton v. Ellis, 27 W. Va. 422.

Moreover, in a suit by certain creditors to set aside a deed of trust because they were postponed to other creditors of the insolvent grantor, where the trustee was interested to a certain extent in one of the preferred claims, and, together with others, defended the suit, on a decree for plaintiffs, the court properly refused to allow the trustee attorney's fees out of the fund. Darby v. Gilligan, 37 W. Va. 59, 16 S. E. Rep. 507. See monographic note on "Costs in Civil Cases."

4. PRIORITIES OF CREDITORS.—It is unnecessary to ascertain the liens existing upon the land before making a distribution of the proceeds of the sale of the land, and the party filing the bill and setting aside the conveyance is entitled to be first satisfied out of such proceeds, unless there are prior liens. State v. Bowen, 38 W. Va. 91, 18 S. E. Rep. 375.

And where a deed of personal property, giving preference to creditors accepting its terms, was sought to be enforced in equity by creditors who had accepted its terms, and other creditors filed answers attacking it for fraud, such answers may be regarded as cross bills; and where such defendants were defeated in the court below and they alone appealed, and procured a reversal of the decree, and the deed was declared void, they have priority, there being no liens before their answers were filed, and are entitled to be first paid out of the fund. Clark v. Figgins, 31 W. Va. 156, 5 S. E. Rep. 643; First Nat. Bank v. Parsons, 42 W. Va. 137, 24 S. E. Rep. 554.

Moreover, where a grantor executes successive deeds of the same property to secure different debts, none of them being given subject to those previously executed, if any of the deeds are subsequently declared void as in fraud of creditors, the proceeds of the property must be applied to the payment of the remaining valid incumbrances in the order of their priorities, before any claims of unsecured creditors of the grantor can be paid. Lewis v. Caperton, 8 Gratt. 148.

In this connection, it was declared in Farmers' Bank v. Corder, 32 W. Va. 233, 9 S. E. Rep. 220, that, although where a deed was made directly from a husband to his wife, and as part of the consideration she agreed to pay one joint creditor of her husband $300, and another $100, with interest on the amount, which debt the husband owed to these parties, and to secure which amount the vendor's lien was reserved, the deed might be set aside as to general creditors as fraudulent, yet the liens thus reserved must be respected as liens on the equitable title conveyed as of the date of the record of said deed, if said claims were valid in other respects.

Nevertheless, creditors not secured in a deed of trust, who sue to overthrow it on the ground that the debts secured and preferred are fraudulent, and succeed in overthrowing some only of the debts secured, are not advanced in priority so as to take the rank of the debts overthrown, and get payment out of the property conveyed in preference to bona fide creditors preferred by the deed, but the whole property remains to answer the demands of the bona fide preferred creditors, according to the deed. Cohn v. Ward, 36 W. Va. 516, 15 S. E. Rep. 140. See ante, "Lien of Creditor."

1. PRESENTATION AND RESERVATION IN LOWER COURT OF GROUNDS OF REVIEW.

When Objection Should Be Made in Lower Court.

Charge of Fraud.—Where it is not charged in the court below that a conveyance is fraudulent, such charge cannot, for the first time, be made in the appellate court. Pracht v. Lange, 81 Va. 711.

Excessive Judgment.—Moreover, it is too late for a grantor in a fraudulent deed to urge in appellate court that the judgment is excessive in a suit to annul that deed and subject the property to that judgment. Wray v. Davenport, 79 Va. 19.

Omission by Court to Make Such Direction That a Complete Decree Can Be Rendered—Cause for Reversal.

—However, where it appears, in a suit to set aside a bond and trust deed as fraudulent towards creditors, that they have been assigned, the failure of the court, before entering a decree on the merits, to direct the assignee to be made a party, so that a complete decree, binding on all persons interested, may be rendered, is cause for reversal on appeal, though no objection for want of parties was taken in the trial court. Thornton v. Gaar, 87 Va. 315, 12 S. E. Rep. 753.

Failure to File Copy of Execution and Judgment—No Ground for Reversal.—But in a suit in equity by a judgment creditor to set aside fraudulent conveyances of property by his debtor, where the judgment and execution are admitted by the pleadings, the failure to file a copy of them in the cause is not a ground of reversal of the decree of the court below setting aside the conveyances, especially if no objection is taken in that court to the failure to file them. McNew v. Smith, 5 Gratt. 84.

Defendants Are Not Summoned to Answer Petition—Question Cannot Be Raised in Appellate Court.

—And in a suit to set aside an alleged fraudulent conveyance, other creditors filed their petitions setting up their debts, asked to be made parties plaintiff, and prayed certain relief, but did not ask for process against defendants. An account was directed to ascertain the priority of the claims, of which defendants had full notice, and on the coming in of the commissioner's report the grantee filed exceptions. It was held, that the objection that the defendants were not summoned to answer the petitions could not be raised for the first time on appeal. Flynn v. Jackson, 93 Va. 341, 25 S. E. Rep. 1.

2. WHAT PARTIES ARE ENTITLED TO ALLEGE ERROR.—And in a suit to set aside a fraudulent conveyance from a husband to his wife, it was declared that depositions taken after notice given the wife may be read against her; but, when read against her husband also, the wife, who alone appeals from a decree setting aside her deed, is not entitled to a reversal of the decree because of a want of notice to her husband of the taking of the depositions. Silverman v. Greaser, 27 W. Va. 550.

Moreover, in a suit to set aside a fraudulent conveyance, the judgment debtor cannot question the fraud on appeal, where the alienees do not appeal. Price v. Thrash, 30 Gratt. 515.

3. REVERSAL DEPENDENT UPON A QUESTION OF FACT.—And in a suit to set aside a deed from a man to his intended wife given, prior to 1887, in consideration of marriage, it was shown that, when the deed was given, he was insolvent, and had recently purchased a good deal of property on credit, and that the deed would leave the creditors unpaid. Prior to the marriage a notice was served on the wife in which such suspicious circumstances were set forth. Upon these facts, it was held that the commissioner who heard and saw the witnesses, having held that there was no proof of fraudulent participation on the part of the grantee, and his report having been confirmed by the circuit court the deed would not be set aside. Moore v. Butler, 90 Va. 683, 19 S. E. Rep. 850.

364 *Crawford's Ex'or v. Patterson.

July Term, 1854, Lewisburg.

Wills—Conditional Legacies—Case at Bar.—Testator by his will gave to his wife a plantation, slaves, stock, &c., for life. And he then added, "It is understood that my wife is to keep my children and raise them and give them sufficient schooling."
HELD:

1. Same—Same—Effect of Acceptance.—The widow takes the bequest cum onere, and is bound to provide for the support and education of the children in a manner suited to her circumstances.
2. Same—Same—Performance of Condition Excused—Case at Bar.—But if one of the children accepts the invitation of a relation to visit her, and remains with her for years, the widow of the testator being willing to keep the child with her and provide for her, the widow is not liable for the expenses of the child for board, clothing or education; and this though the relation with whom the child lives is a married woman, and her husband at the end of the time claims compensation.
3. Same—Same—Same—Same.—The executors of the testator having paid the accounts out of the estate of the child in their hands and upon her marriage her husband having given a receipt to the executors for the amount, he and his wife cannot recover the amount from the widow.

4. Commissioner's Report—Exceptions—Laches.*—A bill is filed by the husband and his wife against the executors and widow for a settlement of their administration accounts, and to recover from the widow the amount of these expenses: the account is ordered, and the commissioner allows the executors a credit for the amount they had paid for the wife, and reports a small balance in their favor. This report is returned in March 1824, and not excepted to; and the case lies from that time until June 1847, when the executors and widow are dead. It is too late for the plaintiff to revive the suit, and ask to have the report recommitted and reformed.

In the year 1810 Robert Crawford of Augusta county, departed this life, having first made his will, which was duly admitted to probat; and John and William Poage qualified as his executors. By his will he gave to his wife the negroes and all other property which had been hers before their marriage; and he *gave to her during her life, the plantation whereon he lived, two negroes, stock, plantation utensils and household furniture: And then added, "It is understood that my wife is to keep my children and raise them, and give them sufficient schooling." The balance of his estate he directed to be sold and divided among eight of his children.

At the time of Crawford's death, one of his children had received his share of his father's estate, and another was married; and the other seven lived at home, their ages ranging from four to seventeen years. The property thus left to Mrs. Crawford, it was estimated, would have rented for between three and four hundred dollars.

About the year 1813 Jane, one of the children of Robert Crawford by a former wife, being about thirteen years old, went on a visit to the house of James Bell, whose wife was her aunt; and she remained there three years. She then lived with her uncle James Craig for a year; and then married John C. Patterson. For her expenses of clothing and schooling, and some advancements of money, James Bell presented to the executors of Robert Crawford an account for one hundred and fifty-one pounds nine shillings and a penny, which was paid by the executors; and after her marriage, Patterson in August 1818 executed to them a receipt for this sum as in part of her proportion of her father's estate. In September of the same year the executors paid him in money one thousand one hundred and forty-six dollars and fifty cents, on account of her interest in said estate.

In September 1821 John C. Patterson and his wife instituted a suit in the late Staunton chancery court against the executors, Mrs. Crawford and the other residuary legatees; and in their bill, after setting out the provisions of the will of Robert Crawford, they charged that the executors 366 had received into their *hands a considerable estate which they had sold; and that they had made no settlement of their account or distribution of the estate which had come to their hands. They further charged that the female plaintiff had lived with her step mother only a part of the time between her father's death and her own marriage, and had not received that support and education provided for by the will. On the contrary, the executor John Poage had raised an account against her of one hundred and fifty-one pounds nine shillings and a penny, embracing nothing but those expenditures which her step mother was bound by the will to have defrayed, and that shortly after her marriage he had presented the account to Patterson and obtained his receipt therefor as a part of the estate to which she was entitled under the will of her father. And they file the account marked B. They allege that they were then ignorant of the propriety of these charges; but had since been advised that they were not bound to pay the account; the whole of it being justly chargeable to the widow. The prayer of the bill is for a settlement of the accounts of the executors; that the receipt aforesaid may be canceled and recalled, or that the widow may be compelled to pay the amount thereof with interest to the plaintiffs; that they may have a decree for so much of said estate as they are entitled to; and for general relief.

The executors answered the bill, admitting the sale of the property by them, stating that John Poage was the acting executor, and that he had paid out from time to time, to such of the devisees as were of age, as much as he conceived it would be prudent to pay until a settlement of the estate could be had. That they were always willing to make this settlement, but it was not until about the commencement of this suit that guardians had been appointed for all the infants; and that they were then willing to settle their accounts.

367 *John Poage stated that he advanced the money charged in the account exhibited with the bill, under the belief that it was in discharge of the interest of the female plaintiff in her father's estate; and under this belief he required and obtained the receipt from her husband.

Mrs. Crawford alleged that she had strictly complied with the provisions of the will in favor of the female plaintiff as long as she lived with her, which was until she was between fourteen and fifteen years of age. That she then left the defendant's house, and went to live with her aunt Mrs. Bell, at Mrs. Bell's solicitation, who proposed to take her, as defendant believed through friendship, to do more for her than the defendant would have in her power to do. That defendant consented, believing it would be of advantage to the plaintiff, and not from any unwillingness in herself to comply with the provisions of the will aforesaid. And she insisted that the moneys expended whilst at Mrs. Bell's could not be considered as embraced by the provisions of the will; but was properly chargeable against plaintiff's interest in the estate.

In June 1823 the death of the plaintiff John C. Patterson was suggested, and on the motion of the surviving plaintiff, it was ordered that the executors of Robert Crawford do render an account of their administration before a commissioner of the court. In March 1824 this commissioner filed his report, in which he credited the executors in their account with the plaintiff, with the amount they had paid; and she was brought in debt thirty-eight dollars and thirty cents. Some of the other children were over paid, and there were balances due to others.

After the return of this report the cause slept, without a step being taken therein, until June 1847, when the death of John Poage and Sarah Crawford were suggested, and it was ordered to be revived in 368 the *names of Poage's executors and of Silas Henton as executor of Sarah Crawford. The death of several of the legatees of Robert Crawford was also suggested, and the suit was revived in the names of their personal representatives; and then the record states that by consent it is ordered that the report of Commissioner Clarke theretofore made in the cause be recommitted to Commissioner Hendren, who is required to consider and modify the same, and to report specially to the court any matter, &c.

In October following Commissioner Hendren returned his report, in which he disallowed the credits to the executors for moneys paid to Bell, to the amount of one hundred and thirteen pounds eleven shillings, on the ground that it was money expended for necessities during her infancy, and therefore properly chargeable to the widow. And he reported a balance due to the plaintiff of four hundred and fifty-five dollars and ninety-nine cents, with interest from June the 30th, 1821. This was the only account stated by the commissioner. The cause came on to be heard upon this report in August 1848, when the court made a decree directing Henton, the executor of Mrs. Crawford, to pay to the plaintiff, out of the assets of his testatrix, the amount reported by the commissioner; with liberty to the plaintiff, if this decree should be unavailing, to apply for a decree against the executors of Robert Crawford.

Soon after this decree was pronounced Henton presented a petition to the court, in which he stated that the cause had been revived without his knowledge or consent, and that the decree had been made without his having had an opportunity to make his defence; and he verily believed he should be able to show that it was erroneous. The court accordingly set aside the decree; and the cause was recommitted to Commissioner

Hendren, who was directed to state
369 the accounts *between the parties according to his own view of what was equitable: And Henton was allowed to file his answer. In his answer, after stating the proceedings in the cause up to the report of Commissioner Clarke, he alleged that Chancellor Taylor considered the cause, and filed a memorandum in his own handwriting, among the papers, in the following words: "The report not being excepted to, is affirmed, and a decree to be entered in pursuance thereof;" but that no decree was entered on the order book. That thus the cause rested for more than twenty years, until John Poage the principal acting executor, who was cognizant of all the facts of the case, and Sarah Crawford the widow, had gone down to their graves in the firm conviction that this stale demand had been finally adjusted. He insisted upon the objections taken by the original defendants; upon the staleness of the demand, and upon the statute of limitations; upon the report of Clarke made when all the parties were alive, and on the acquiescence by the plaintiff for twenty-five years in that report; on the subsequent death of all the parties who were personally cognizant of the transactions; and upon the manifest injustice of compelling him, ignorant of all the matters, to enter into a controversy which seemed to have been carefully kept out of view during the time of his testatrix.

In September 1849 Commissioner Hendren made his second report, in which he charged Mrs. Crawford with the annual sum of forty dollars for five years, with interest commencing with the year 1814, and coming down to 1818; and making the balance due upon the account on the 1st of November 1849, six hundred and six dollars and sixty-six cents, of which two hundred and twenty-four dollars and sixty-nine cents was principal. The plaintiff excepted to the report, because it reduced the charges below the amount paid by the executors to Bell.

370 *The cause came on to be finally heard in November 1849, when the court overruled the plaintiff's exceptions and confirmed the report; and decreed that Henton the executor of Mrs. Crawford should, out of the assets of his testatrix in his hands, pay to the plaintiff the amount reported by the commissioner, with interest on the principal sum due, from the 1st of November 1849 until paid, and her costs. And liberty was reserved to the plaintiff to apply for a decree against the executors, if this decree should be unproductive. From this decree Mrs. Crawford's executor applied to this court for an appeal, which was allowed.

Stuart, for the appellant.

Michie, for the appellee.

MONCURE, J. The will of Robert Crawford imposed a charge on the estate given to his wife for the keeping, raising and schooling of his children. The estate was of the annual value of three or four hundred dollars; and seems to have been not more than adequate to the support of the family in a plain and comfortable manner. At the testator's death the family consisted, besides the widow, of seven children, ranging from four to seventeen years of age. The widow having accepted the estate, took it of course cum onere; and was bound to keep and raise the children, and give them sufficient schooling. Had she turned the appellee away from home when of tender years, and unable to provide for herself, and failed to provide her with necessary board, clothes and schooling, she would have been liable, in equity at least, if not at law, for the value of such necessities to any person who might furnish or pay for them. But she did not turn the appellee away. She kept her until she was thirteen years of age, when the appellee went to live with her aunt Mrs. Bell, by the

371 *latter's invitation, and continued to live there for three or four years, and she then lived with her aunt Mrs. Craig for a year or more until her marriage. The widow, as she alleges in her answer, would have continued to keep the appellee according to the terms of the will; but she believed, and was well warranted in believing, that it would be for the advantage of the appellee to live with her aunt; and that she would be better provided for there than at home, and free of charge. The account which was the cause of this suit, being exhibit B filed with the bill, is for cash paid by the executor John Poage to and for the appellee while she lived with Mrs. Bell and Mrs. Craig; a large part of it having been paid to James Bell the husband of the former. It was not created at the instance of the widow, or on her credit, and she never assumed its payment. It does not appear to have been ever demanded of her, or that she was ever informed of its existence, until the institution of this suit. She was therefore never liable for the amount of the account or any part of it, at law or in equity, either by reason of the charge created by the will of her husband, or by any contract, express or implied. The case, in principle, is very much like that of Urmston v. Newcomen, 4 Adol. & Ell. 894. 31 Eng. C. L. R. 222. There, a grand mother offered to a father to take care of his child without putting him to any expense; upon which he gave up the child to her. Afterwards the grand mother gave up the child to the mother, who was living apart from the father; and afterwards the child, to escape cruel treatment, returned to the grand mother, who maintained it thenceforward. In the argument of the case, (which was an action of assumpsit brought by the grand mother against the father to recover the expense of maintenance after the return of the child,) the general question was raised, Whether a

372 father, if he desert his child, be not liable in assumpsit *to any one who provides food and clothing for it? The judges declined giving an opinion upon the general question, thinking that it did not arise in the case. But they all concurred in deciding that the father, who had no notice of the child's quitting the grand mother at all, or of the cruelty, was not liable to her for the maintenance, in as much as the facts did not show any desertion of the child by the father, and negatived a contract between him and the grand mother. They also decided that it made no difference that the grand mother, when she made the original undertaking, was a married woman; the ground of the decision being not that she had made a valid contract, but that the circumstances negatived desertion; and that therefore the question as to the implied liability did not arise.

The widow, in this case, not being liable originally for the account or any part of it, cannot be rendered liable to the executor John Poage in consequence of its payment by him; nor to the appellee in consequence of its payment by her husband to the said executor; neither of such payments having been made at the request of the widow, express or implied.

But even if she were ever liable for this account, or any part of it, or any of the expenses of the appellee while she lived with her aunts, such liability had ceased to exist in June 1847, when the suit was revived against the appellant as executor. The widow answered the bill in June 1822, stating the facts, and denying her liability. In June 1823 an order was made for the settlement of the account of the executors of Robert Crawford. In March 1824 the commissioner's report was returned, showing a balance due by the plaintiffs Patterson and wife to the executors on the 30th of June 1821, of thirty-eight dollars and thirty and seven-eighth cents, after charging the former with the amount of the said account marked exhibit B, which charge the 373 commissioner stated that *he conceived to be justified by the answers of the executors and of the widow. There was no exception to this report. In May 1824, the cause was set for hearing: And no further order was taken in it until June 1847; when the widow, the acting executor, and several of the other parties having died, the cause was revived and proceeded in to a final decree, which was rendered in November 1849. I think that the bill should have been dismissed as to the appellant, not only on the grounds of defence relied on in the answer of the widow, but also on the additional grounds relied on in the answer of the appellant her executor, filed in December 1848, to wit, the staleness of the demand and the statute of limitations, and the acquiescence of the appellee in the report of the commissioner for more than twenty years, and until after the death of all the parties who were personally cognizant of the transactions. The death of the plaintiff John C. Patterson was suggested in June 1823, and the suit was thereafter prosecuted in the name of his surviving wife the appellee, who has ever since been free from legal disability. Her extraordinary laches in the prosecution of the suit has not been sufficiently accounted for. The only excuse relied on is furnished by a statement made in the answer of the appellant, that in consequence of a paralysis with which Chancellor Brown was afflicted about the time the commissioner made his report, and which in a great measure disabled him from attending to business, no action was taken by the court on the report; and that Chancellor Taylor, who succeeded Chancellor Brown in 1826, was for some years before his transfer to the Botetourt circuit, almost incapable, from indisposition, of attending to his official duties. But this excuse accounts for comparatively a small portion of the long lapse of time between the return of the report and the revival of the suit, and is wholly insufficient.

374 *The fair presumption from the record is that all the parties acquiesced in the report, and did not choose to prosecute the case any farther; especially the appellee, who appeared by the report to be a debtor. This presumption is confirmed by the fact, also stated in the answer of the appellant and admitted to be true by the counsel for the appellee, that after Chancellor Taylor came into office, but at what precise period does not appear, he filed in the papers a memorandum in the following words: "The report not being excepted to is affirmed, and a decree to be entered in pursuance thereof." Though such a decree was never actually entered, yet the rights of the parties seem to have been considered as settled by the report, sanctioned as it was by the chancellor. The further prosecution of the suit having been delayed for twenty-three years, and until after the death of the widow and of the acting executor, who were acquainted with the transactions, it was too late then to revive it against their representatives, who were ignorant of them, and had not the means of making a proper defence. The case falls within the principle of the cases of Hercy v. Dinwoody, 2 Ves. jr. 87, and Hayes v. Goode, 7 Leigh 452; that in a court of equity it is not only required that claims should be brought forward in a reasonable time, but also that they shall be prosecuted with reasonable diligence.

I think the bill should have been dismissed, not only as to the appellant, but as to the other defendants also; and on the principle of the cases just cited. The executors of Robert Crawford had certainly no right as such to make the payments charged in exhibit B; and John C. Patterson was not bound to have given them credit for the amount in the settlement of his wife's portion of their testator's estate. He did, however, give them a receipt therefor as so much of the said portion.

Whether the receipt was given under 375 *such mistake of law or fact, or whether the relations between them were such as to have entitled him to set aside the transaction if due diligence had been used in the prosecution of the suit, are questions which it is unnecessary to decide.

That the suit was not prosecuted with due diligence, has already been sufficiently shown. It may be said that none of the defendants have appealed from the decree except the appellant. But I think his appeal brings up the whole case; on the ground that the reversal of the decree and dismissal of the bill as to him would, directly or incidentally, disturb the rights of the other defendants as settled by the decree. See Dickenson v. Davis, 2 Leigh 401, and the opinion of Stanard, J., in Powell's ex'ors v. White, 11 Leigh 309, 317. The decree was, primarily, against the appellant; but liberty was reserved to the appellee, if the decree against the appellant should prove unavailing, to apply for further relief against the executors of Robert Crawford, or any other person liable in the premises, either primarily or eventually. The executors, if they could appeal from such a decree, may not have thought it necessary to do so; as it was primarily against the appellant, and would probably have been effectual but for his appeal. The reversal of the decree, and dismissal of the bill as to him, therefore, would materially disturb their rights as settled by the decree, if in fact it settled anything as to them. But the reservation is a mere incident of the decree, and the reversal of the decree would leave nothing to sustain the incidental reservation. The same may be said of the liberty reserved to the other residuary legatees of Robert Crawford to apply for decrees upon the report, although the court was of opinion, and rightly so, that they had been satisfied. Patterson and wife were the only plaintiffs in the suit, and it is obvious they never would have brought it but for the purpose

376 *of recovering the amount of the account for which he had given a receipt to the executors. None of the other residuary legatees have ever complained of the executors, or asked for any decree against them. The report of the commissioner returned in 1824, showed that payments had been made by the executors to all of them, in regard to some exceeding, and to others falling short of, their respective portions of the estate. After the return of that report the executors proceeded to settle with the legatees accordingly; and receipts in full of several of the balances have actually been filed in the papers of the suit. In consideration of all the circumstances, and especially of the great lapse of time, I think no such reservation should have been made in favor of the other residuary legatees.

I am therefore of opinion that the decree should be reversed, and the bill dismissed; with costs to the appellant, both in this court and the Circuit court.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Moncure, J.

Decree reversed.

*McDowell's Ex'or v. Crawford.

July Term, 1854, Lewisburg.

1. Debt on Bond—Plea of Non Est Factum—Evidence—Case at Bar.—In an action of debt upon a bond for two thousand dollars, purporting to be for money loaned, the issue is made up upon the plea of non est factum. On the trial the plaintiff introduces ten intelligent and credible witnesses, well acquainted with the handwriting of the obligor, all of whom express a confident opinion that the signature to the bond is his. The defendant, to support his plea, introduces evidence of the circumstances of the obligor, the relations and conduct of the parties, and the ability of the plaintiff to lend the money. To rebut the evidence on the last ground the plaintiff who was a merchant, introduced a witness C, who had been his book keeper, who professed to speak from memoranda taken by him on a recent examination of the plaintiff's books; and he stated that the plaintiff had a large amount of cash-notes and accounts not known to the defendant's witnesses, and that he had the control of a large estate of S, of which he was the executor. When the cross examination of this witness, and the examination of witnesses to rebut his testimony, was ended, which was late in the evening, the defendant's counsel announced that they had no other witnesses to examine, but would on the next day introduce some documentary testimony. On the next day they offered in evidence the settled accounts of the plaintiff as executor of S, to show that he could not have from that source united with his own means, sufficient to enable him to make the loan. To this evidence the plaintiff objected, and the court excluded it; and in doing so, remarked that the evidence previously introduced by the defendant without objection, as well as that than offered, was too vague, remote and indefinite in its character, to sustain the plea of non est factum against such evidence of factum as the plaintiff had introduced; and would have been excluded if objected to. The defendant then asked that the witness C might be recalled, and that they might be permitted to re-examine him, and test the accuracy of his statements, by requiring the production of the books, which were near and might be obtained in a few minutes. But the court refused to permit the witness to be recalled, or to require the books to be produced; because the evidence was irrelevant, and because the defendants had announced on the day before, that they had concluded the examination of witnesses. HELD:

In either case they are authentically informed of the opinion, and it must have an influence upon their judgment,—probably as much in the one case as in the other; but whether the same, or more, or less, the principle involved is not affected." ‡Admitting Evidence after Argument—Discretion of Trial Court.—On trials before a jury, when the evidence has been closed on both sides and the argument of the cause has commenced, as a general rule, no further evidence should be received from either party; but the judge presiding at the trial, in the exercise of a sound discretion, may relax the rule under peculiar circumstances, and receive additional evidence, if the nature of the case and the ends of justice require it. But if the introduction of such additional evidence takes the adverse party by surprise, he should be allowed time and opportunity, if desired, to meet it with further evidence on his side. George v. Pilcher, 28 Gratt. 310, citing the principal case. See principal case also cited in Schonberger v. Com., 86 Va. 492, 10 S. E. Rep. 713. See, in accord, Perdue v. Caswell, etc., Co., 40 W. Va. 372, 21 S. E. Rep. 870; foot-note to George v. Pilcher, 28 Gratt. 301. On this subject, the judge, before whom the case is tried, must necessarily have large

John McDowell deceased. The action was founded upon a bond; and the plea was non est factum, upon which the issue was made up.

Upon the trial the plaintiff introduced in evidence a bond in the following terms:

"$2000. One day after date, I promise to pay or cause to be paid unto Hugh J. Crawford or order, two thousand dollars, for borrowed money, with legal interest from date; to which payment well and truly to be made, I bind myself, my heirs, administrators, executors, &c. Witness my hand and seal this the 18th day of March 1846.

"In consequence of not giving to said Crawford, at this time, a trust deed to secure the above two thousand dollars, which would give publicity to this debt, and be prejudicial to my interest, I agree to execute to him a valid deed of trust upon all my real estate in Staunton, at the expiration of three years from date, for which time I am to have the use of the money, if I should fail to pay him, his heirs, &c., the above sum within thirty days after payment is demanded.

John McDowell. [Seal.]"

379 *This bond was wholly in the handwriting of the plaintiff, except the signature; and there were two endorsements upon it, also in the handwriting of the plaintiff, of the receipt of the interest for 1847 and 1848. The plaintiff then introduced ten witnesses of intelligence, good character, and unquestioned and unques-room for discretion, and the appellate court should seldom interfere with its exercise. Hunter v. Snyder, 11 W. Va. 212, quoting with approval from the principal case.

So, in its discretion, the court may allow other changes in the regular order of introducing evidence. Brooks v. Wilcox, 11 Gratt. 411, and foot-note.

Instructions—Should Be Given if Correct and Relevant.—In Harman v. Cundiff, 82 Va. 246, it is said: "It is well settled, says Lewis, P., in Central Lunatic Asylum v. Flanagan, 80 Va. 110, that when instructions are given which cover the entire case, and which properly submit the case to the jury, it is not error to refuse to give others, even though in point of law they are correct. Citing Laber v. Cooper, 7 Wall. 565. It is safest, however, for the court to give instructions asked for when they correctly expound the law, and are relevant to any evidence in the case. tionable credibility, consisting of clerks, lawyers, magistrates, merchants, a commissioner in chancery, and the family physician of the obligor, all of them familiar and well acquainted with the handwriting of the obligor, and whose acquaintance and intimacy varied with the different witnesses from twenty-five to forty years. These ten witnesses with one accord testified that they had been long and familiarly acquainted with the handwriting of John McDowell, from having seen him write, and from correspondence and business transactions with him. That they had carefully examined the signature to the bond in question, and they believed it to be the true and genuine signature of John McDowell. Several of these witnesses stated that the signature is written "with a lighter pen" than the common signature of John McDowell, but that in the general character of the writing, and in the formation of the letters, it has every appearance of being genuine. The plaintiff also introduced two receipts in his own handwriting, corresponding with the endorsements on the bond, for the interest for the years 1847 and 1848, and also introduced the deposition of a sister of McDowell, who was one of his heirs at law and a legatee in his will, and the evidence of another witness, showing how and when the receipts were found in the house in which McDowell had lived and where he died.

The defendant, to support the issue on his part, without offering any opposing testimony as to the genuineness of the signature to the bond, proceeded, by cross examination of the plaintiff's witnesses, and *by witnesses on his own part, to offer evidence tending to show:

1. That the existence of the bond in controversy had been concealed, during the life time of John McDowell, in a manner and under circumstances in themselves unnatural, and wholly inconsistent with the habits of McDowell, and with the interest of the plaintiff.

2. That the plaintiff had not the pecuniary ability to make a loan of the amount and character evidenced by the bond in controversy, and that he could not at the date of the bond have had such an amount of money for any purpose.

3. That from the social and business relations of the plaintiff and John McDowell, it was altogether improbable that such a transaction could have taken place between them.

4. That from the pecuniary circumstances and standing of John McDowell at the date of the bond, it is altogether improbable that any one would have loaned him such a sum of money without security.

5. That the transaction, as appearing on the face of the bond, was altogether inconsistent with the known circumstances, habits and character of the parties at the date of the bond; and that the subsequent conduct of both was inconsistent with the idea that such a contract had ever been made. That therefore, it was not the act and deed of John McDowell, either because it was not his genuine signature, notwithstanding the plaintiff's evidence of handwriting; or if genuine, it was obtained surreptitiously, fraudulently or otherwise, in such an illegal manner as to render the bond not his act and deed.

The evidence introduced by the defendant to sustain the foregoing conclusions is set out in the record, but need not be stated here.

To rebut the evidence of the defendant as to the *pecuniary condition of the plaintiff at the date of the bond, he introduced a witness, William B. Crawford, who testified that he was, up to the — day of November 1845, book keeper for the plaintiff in his mercantile establishment; and that at that time plaintiff was in possession of a large amount of cash-notes and accounts, of his own property, which had not been known to any of the witnesses who testified as to his circumstances; and also that the plaintiff had the control of a large estate of John C. Sowers deceased, of which he was the executor. The witness professed to speak from memoranda taken upon a recent examination of the books kept by him in 1845.

To meet this new evidence of the plaintiff, the defendant offered evidence of book keepers expert in the business, to show that the books described by the witness could not have enabled him to state such results with any certainty.

It being late in the evening when this evidence was given and finished, defendant's counsel announced that they had no other witnesses to examine, but that next morning they would probably offer documentary evidence; and the court adjourned with the announcement that any such evidence, provided it could be shown to be relevant to the issue, would be received.

On the next day the defendant offered to introduce the settlements made by the plaintiff, of his accounts as executor of John C. Sowers deceased, to show that at the date of the bond in controversy, the plaintiff could not have had funds of that estate in his hands sufficient of themselves or with his own means, to have enabled him to make such a loan as that shown by the bond; and also to show that the plaintiff, as legatee and devisee of that estate, and deriving his whole property from that source, could not possibly have had the amount of available funds stated by his witness William B. Crawford. To the introduction of *these settlements as evidence, the plaintiff's counsel objected as irrelevant to the issue in the cause; and the court sustaining the objection, refused to permit them to go to the jury.

In delivering the opinion excluding the evidence, the court stated that upon the issue in this cause, the plaintiff having introduced ten witnesses, all of whom swore positively to the genuineness of the signature to the bond, it was sufficient evidence, the bond being found in possession of the plaintiff, from which the jury should presume sealing and delivery, and due execution thereof, unless met and overthrown by opposing testimony on the part of the defendant; and that as the defendant had failed to introduce any opposing proof as to the genuineness of the signature, all the other testimony introduced by him, without objection, as well as that now objected to, was too vague, remote and indefinite in its character to sustain the plea of non est factum against such evidence of factum as the plaintiff had introduced, and would have been excluded if objected to; but as it was not, all the court could do was to exclude that now objected to.

Upon this statement of the court the counsel for the plaintiff remarked that they had considered the whole of the defendant's evidence illegal, but had not objected to it because they wished to permit the fullest investigation. The counsel for the defendant then suggested to the court and the counsel for the plaintiff, that if the evidence should then be excluded in accordance with the opinion of the court, the defendant would at once except and submit to a verdict; but plaintiff's counsel refused to make a motion to exclude any part of defendant's evidence which had already gone to the jury, only objecting to the further introduction of illegal evidence by the defendant. The court stated its inability to exclude without such a motion, and declined to instruct the jury in conformity 383 with the *opinion stated; but upon the motion of the defendant, before the jury retired to consider of their verdict, instructed the jury as follows:

1. "The jury are bound to weigh and consider all testimony introduced by either party without objection, unless upon a motion made to the court, such evidence is excluded."

2. "That upon the issue in this cause it is competent for the defendant to show by evidence as to the circumstances, relations and business of the parties, and by their whole conduct in connection with the bond in controversy, that it is either impossible or improbable that the bond sued upon is the act and deed of the defendant's testator: Remarking that the instructions were clearly correct as abstract propositions of law, and that it might be safely left to the jury to determine how far they were applicable to the facts and evidence in the cause." To which action of the court excluding the testimony offered, and the opinion of the court pronounced concerning the evidence already introduced by the defendant, he excepted.

Immediately after the court had excluded the evidence as before stated, the defendant's counsel asked that William B. Crawford, the plaintiff's witness, might be recalled, and that they might be permitted to re-examine him, and test the accuracy of his statements as to the facts appearing upon the books of the plaintiff, by requiring the production of the books which were near and might be obtained in a few minutes. But the court refused to permit the witness to be recalled, or to require the books to be produced, for two reasons: 1. Because the evidence would not be relevant to the issue. 2. That the defendant's counsel had, on the evening before, announced that they had concluded the examination of witnesses, as before stated. And the defendant again excepted.

Pending the trial the defendant
384 offered in evidence *a paper signed by himself, in which he expressed his consent to the production and use as evidence, on the trial, of the mercantile books of the plaintiff, provided they were at once put into the hands of his counsel for examination: And he proposed to show, that during the then term of the court, and some four days before the trial commenced, that paper had been presented by the defendant in open court, and filed in the cause; and that the plaintiff had refused or failed to avail himself of the privilege therein offered him; but at the same time had notified the defendant that if he really wished the production of the plaintiff's books, to say so distinctly, and they should be forthcoming without even requiring of the defendant the regular written notice, verified by affidavit. But the court excluded the paper and the evidence; and the defendant again excepted.

The jury found a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the amount of the bond with interest; and the court rendered a judgment thereon. Whereupon the defendant applied to this court for a supersedeas, which was awarded.

SAMUELS, J. In my opinion it appears with sufficient clearness that the account of Crawford's administration on the estate of John C. Sowers, and the books of Crawford, respectively, afforded evidence rele-385 vant *to the issue, and were therefore improperly excluded from the jury. I deem it unnecessary, in this case, and therefore improper, to express an opinion whether a judgment in any case should be reversed unless error appears in the proceedings; or whether a judgment should be reversed because the record leaves it doubtful whether the court below did or did not err. With this explanation, I concur with Judge Moncure in reversing the judgment; agreeing fully with him in regard to the other questions.

LEE, J. I agree that upon the issue joined in this cause enquiry into the pecuniary circumstances and condition of the defendant in error at the date of the paper writing in question, was strictly relevant and germane; and if the rejection of the settlements said to have been made by Crawford as executor of Sowers, as evidence in this case, was only to be justified by holding that such enquiry was impertinent or irrelevant, or if the action of the court as disclosed by the first bill of exceptions, is properly to be regarded as an instruction to the jury to that effect, I should have little difficulty in holding that error had been committed for which the judgment should be reversed. But there is a distinct ground upon which, as I understand the rule, to be deduced from the later cases on the subject, the rejection of these settlements must be sustained in this court. The witness William B. Crawford, in testifying as to the sources from which, as he supposed, the defendant in error might have derived the means to make the supposed loan, professed to speak from memoranda taken upon a recent examination of books kept by him in the year 1845. This applies, as I understand the statement, as well to what he testified in reference to the estate of Sowers as to what he stated in regard to the other resources which Crawford had at command. Now, oral evidence of the 386 *contents of the books referred to was clearly inadmissible without the production of the books themselves; nor could the witness be permitted to speak as to the facts noted upon them unless he had a knowledge or recollection of them as distinct from the entries; though he might refer to the latter for the purpose of reviving his knowledge or refreshing his recollection. 1 Starkie Ev. 390; Ibid. 128; Doe ex dem. Church v. Perkins, 3 T. R. 749; Henry v. Lee, 2 Chitty's R. 124, 18 Eng. C. L. R. 273. Thus, all the evidence as to Sowers' estate, derived from the books referred to, might have been readily excluded, if the plaintiff in error had made this objection; and if the settlements of the accounts of that estate would have been otherwise irrelevant, they cannot be admitted in evidence, if objected to, because improper evidence had been given without objection on the part of the plaintiff in error or with his consent. For one party's consenting to the admission of incompetent testimony for his adversary, is no reason for admitting other incompetent testimony in favor of the party so consenting, where objected to on the other side, even although the latter might serve to explain or contradict the former. Wilkinson v. Jett, 7 Leigh 115; Unis v. Charlton, 4 Gratt. 58; Stringer v. Young's lessee, 3 Peters' R. 320.

But supposing no question could have been made as to the competency of the evidence in relation to Sowers' estate, or that the witness gave other testimony independently of the books, tending to show that the defendant in error might have had means at his command derived from Sowers' estate, this would not necessarily render the settlements of the accounts of that estate admissible in evidence. Their admissibility would depend upon their relevancy; and this of course refers to the nature and character of their contents.

When examined, these might be 387 found to be *relevant or wholly irrelevant. They might tend to meet the testimony of the witness Crawford, by showing that he could not have the control of funds to any large amount from that source, or they might fail to shed any light whatever upon the question of the means he had at command. But what state of facts they would disclose, we are not informed. They are not made a part of the bill of exceptions, so that the court can inspect them and judge whether they would be relevant or otherwise; nor does the bill of exceptions state their purport or what they would prove if received in evidence. Now it cannot be sufficient ground for reversing a judgment that evidence was excluded which might or might not have been relevant to the issue. On the contrary, it has been expressly decided by this court that when it is alleged error has been committed in excluding proper and relevant testimony from the jury, it is incumbent on the party seeking to reverse a judgment for this cause, to show that error has been committed: And to this end the evidence offered and rejected must appear to have been relevant from the statement of the evidence alone; or if the relevancy of the evidence depends on other facts, the party alleging the error must present such a case on the record as shows its relevancy. And if the testimony does not appear of itself or upon the facts stated in the record, to have been relevant, it will be held in the appellate court to have been properly excluded. Rowt's adm'r v. Kile's adm'r, 1 Leigh 216; Carpenter v. Utz, 4 Gratt. 270; Johnson's ex'r v. Jennings' adm'r, 10 Gratt. 1.

I am aware there are certain cases from which it might seem to be deducible that the practice in such a case, where the bill of exceptions fails to show the relevancy of the evidence rejected, is to reverse the judgment and remand the cause for a new trial. Fowler v. Lee, 4 Munf. 373;
388 Hairston v. Cole, 1 Rand. *461. I conceive, however, the later cases above referred to establish a different rule, one more conformable to general principle, and in more strict analogy to the settled practice of the court in the case of a motion for a new trial where the bill of exceptions sets out the evidence instead of the facts proved in the cause. Bennett v. Hardaway, 6 Munf. 125; Deems v. Quarrier, 3 Rand. 475; Carrington v. Bennett, 1 Leigh 340; Ewing v. Ewing, 2 Leigh 337.

Without, therefore, entering into the reasons which may have weighed with the court in rejecting these settlements, I think it a sufficient answer to the objection to say, that enough is not shown by the bill of exceptions to enable this court to see that they furnished relevant testimony.

and to say that the Circuit court erred in pronouncing them irrelevant.

Nor do I think the action of the court, as disclosed by the bill of exceptions, or the opinions which it expressed, should be regarded as an instruction to the jury that enquiry into the pecuniary circumstances of Crawford was not germane to the matter upon which they were called to pronounce. It is true, in delivering its opinions excluding the settlements of Sowers' estate, the court said that the evidence offered by the defendant was "too vague, remote and indefinite" in its character to sustain the plea of non est factum against such positive evidence of the genuineness of the signature to the bond. But this remark was not addressed to or intended for the jury. It was made upon a point which had been expressly withdrawn from their consideration, and submitted to the judgment of the court. It was intended to explain to the counsel the reasons of the court for rejecting the testimony. It may not necessarily have been heard by the jury or all of them. The presence of the jury is not necessary during the discussion and decision of a question of law arising incidentally before the 389 court *during a trial, and advantage is frequently taken, in practice, of the occurrence of such a question to permit jurors to withdraw; and sometimes the discussion and decision take place before the jury are called to take their seats after a recess of the court.

But even if this remark is to be regarded as having been heard by the jury, and if, standing alone and unexplained, it might have had an improper influence upon their minds, enough occurred immediately afterwards and in the same connection, to prevent any such consequence. For the court formally and expressly declined to give an instruction in conformity with the opinion thus expressed: and this refusal to give such an instruction must be supposed to have engaged the attention of the jury equally with the opinion itself so incidentally expressed; and it served to admonish them that the opinion of the court upon the point of the exclusion of testimony was not to influence them in their deliberations upon the question of fact submitted to their decision. Surely it cannot be imputing too high a degree of intelligence to the jury to suppose that when the court formally declined to declare to them, as a matter for their guidance, what it had previously intimated, though incidentally, in giving an opinion excluding testimony, they would at once see that that opinion was not intended for them, and was to have no weight in their consideration of the case. Moreover, the court formally instructed the jury that they were bound to weigh and consider all testimony introduced by either party; and that it was competent for the defendant to show, by evidence as to the circumstances, relations and business of the parties, and by their whole conduct in connection with the bond in controversy, that it was either impossible or improbable that it was the act and deed of the defendant's testator. So far, therefore, from the instruction given by the court amounting to a ruling which excluded 390 *enquiry into the pecuniary circumstances of Crawford, it directly and in terms authorized the jury to make such enquiry.

It cannot be important to the ends of justice, nor will it tend to promote its due administration, but rather to obstruct it, to hold that an opinion expressed by a judge on the trial of a cause, perhaps not well considered, or touching a matter upon which it is the province of the jury to pass, but upon an incidental question arising in its progress, and not intended for or addressed to the jury, should be deemed to have the force and sanction of an express instruction, and to require a reversal of the judgment; especially, too, where enough occurred at the time and in the same connection to guard against the consequences of the inadvertence, and to leave the jury to form their own judgment. Such, I think, may fairly be considered the character of the present case, and in this respect it very much resembles the case of Brooks v. Calloway, 12 Leigh 466. That was an action of slander. During the trial the court had ruled that the plaintiff might read the bill and answer in a cause in which his deposition (the truth of which had been impugned by the words imputed to the defendant), had been taken, for the purpose of showing the materiality of the deposition to the matters in issue. The defendant insisted that not the bill and answer only, but the whole record should be read. The court permitted the bill and answer to be read alone; and the judge said that if the whole record should be introduced, it would prove that the defendant was a slanderous man, from the efforts made in that cause without success, to impeach the character of so many witnesses who had testified against him: but he at the same time told the jury, that the statement so made by him touching the contents of the record, had nothing to do with the case, and should not be regarded by them in their deci-391 sion. *In delivering his opinion, in which the other judges concurred, Judge Allen said, "The expression used by the judge in excluding these depositions, was not intended for the jury. So he informed them, and that it should not be regarded by them as anything in the decision of the cause. Nothing is more common than an instruction to the jury to disregard evidence improperly admitted. The jury are presumed to possess ordinary intelligence, and to be able to discriminate between what is proper for them to consider in forming their conclusions, and what, though occurring in their hearing, is no part of the case. Here the court did all it could to correct the inadvertence into which it had fallen." In this case the court did not in so many words tell the jury that the remarks which had fallen from it were not intended for their consideration, and should be disregarded by them, but taking all that was said and done by the court at the time together, I think it was about equivalent.

But it is urged that the remark of the court accompanying the instructions to the jury was improper and objectionable, because it trenched upon the proper province of the jury, and might have had an improper influence upon them.

To say of instructions asked for by counsel, that they were "clearly correct as abstract propositions," might, perhaps, convey by implication, to the mind of a lawyer, though probably not to that of a jury, the idea that there was no evidence which could give the principles of law, thus propounded, any application to the case. But if we are even to suppose that the jury would necessarily understand that such was the opinion of the court, still the court did not act upon that opinion, by refusing to give the instructions, but expressly gave them as propounding the law correctly; and adding, "that it might be safely left to the jury to determine how far they were 392 applicable to the facts *and evidence in the cause." Giving to the language of the court, then, its fullest import, it would seem to amount to no more than this, that although the court might perhaps in strictness refuse to give the instructions, yet as they propounded the law correctly, they could do no injury, and it might be safely left to the jury to say how far the facts and evidence in the cause called for their application. Thus interpreted, the remark of the court cannot afford any serious cause of complaint, though it was perhaps unnecessary, and might well have been omitted.

Another ground of error assigned is the refusal of the court to permit the recall of the witness W. B. Crawford, and the renewal of his cross examination, and to require the production of the plaintiff's books, for the purpose of testing the accuracy of his statements. The witness had been cross examined on the day before, and the counsel had announced that they had concluded the examination of witnesses, but might on the following day offer some documentary testimony. Now, after a witness has been examined and dismissed, whether he may be recalled and re-examined is a matter within the sound discretion of the court; and this court cannot so well apprehend and appreciate all the circumstances which should weigh in the exercise of that discretion as the Circuit court might; and unless, therefore, it be plainly shown to have been unduly and improperly exercised, this court should not interfere. Nothing of the kind is shown here. No reason was assigned why the examination of the witness had not been completed before he had been dismissed; no mistake, or oversight or after discovery suggested; but the recall appears to have been claimed as a matter of right, to enable the party to test the accuracy of his statements by reference to the plaintiff's books. No notice or rule had been given for the production of these. 393 nor had they been produced, *though it is stated they were within one hundred yards of the court-house; and it may be inferred their production was only then desired in case the party could be permitted to recall the witness. I think, therefore, whether the evidence that might have been educed by the recall of the witness and the production of the books, would be relevant or otherwise, this court cannot undertake to say that the Circuit court improperly exercised its discretion in refusing to recall the witness, or erred in failing to require the production of the books in that connection.

The paper referred to in the third bill of exceptions was, I think, very properly rejected by the court. It was a tender of his consent by the defendant to the production and use of the plaintiff's books as evidence on the trial, upon certain conditions therein stated, accompanied by the reasons which he thought proper to assign for making the offer. If he desired to have those books on the trial, the law pointed out the mode in which their production could be enforced; this proposal to the plaintiff to produce and use them on the condition named, was entirely gratuitous, and the plaintiff had a perfect right to accept or decline it, as he might think proper. Nor was any presumption to be raised against him in any sense or for any purpose, if he chose the latter alternative. The offer having been made but declined by the plaintiff, there I think was the end of the matter, and the offer and nonacceptance, either with or without the reasons which the party chose to assign for making the offer, could not be made legitimate evidence in the cause for any purpose whatever.

I am of opinion to affirm the judgment.

MONCURE, J. This action was brought upon an instrument purporting to be the bond of John McDowell to Hugh J. Crawford, in the sum of "two thousand 394 *dollars, for borrowed money;" the whole of which, with the endorsements of credits thereon, except the signature of the obligor, was admitted on the trial to be in the handwriting of the obligee. The bond was unattested by any subscribing witness. The only issue in the case was on the plea of non est factum. The obligee, to sustain the issue on his part, introduced a number of witnesses, who testified that they were well acquainted with the handwriting of the said McDowell, and believed the signature to the bond to be his true and genuine signature. He also introduced two receipts, in his own handwriting, purporting to be receipts for interest on the bond; and introduced testimony to show that they were found in the house, and among the papers, of said McDowell, after his death. And here the obligee closed his evidence in chief. The executor of McDowell, to support the issue on his part, without offering any opposing testimony as to the genuineness of the signature to the bond, introduced evidence as to the circumstances, relations and business of the parties, and their conduct in connection with the bond in controversy, tending, in the opinion of his counsel, to show that it was not the act and deed of said McDowell, either because the signature thereto was not genuine, or if genuine, the bond was obtained fraudulently or otherwise, in such an illegal manner as to render it not his act and deed. In the evidence so introduced by McDowell's executor, there was evidence tending to show that the obligee had not the pecuniary ability to make a loan of the amount and character evidenced by the bond in controversy, and that he could not, at the date of the bond, have had such an amount of money for any purpose. To rebut the evidence of the defendant as to the pecuniary condition of the plaintiff at the date of the bond, the plaintiff introduced a witness, who testified, among other things, that the plaintiff had the *control of a large estate of John C. Sowers, of whom he was executor. To meet this evidence, the defendant offered to introduce the settlements made by the plaintiff of his accounts as executor of John C. Sowers, to show that at the date of the bond in controversy, the plaintiff could not have had funds of that estate in his hands, sufficient of themselves, or with his own means, to have enabled him to make such a loan as that shown by the bond; and also to show that the plaintiff, as legatee and devisee of that estate, and deriving his whole property from that source, could not possibly have had the amount of available funds stated by his said witness. To the introduction of these settlements, as evidence, the plaintiff's counsel objected, as irrelevant to the issue; and the court, sustaining the objection, refused to permit them to go to the jury. The defendant excepted; and this exception presents the first question which we have to decide in this case.

It is true, that the plea of non est factum to an action of debt upon a bond, puts in issue only the validity of the bond; and no evidence is relevant to the issue, or admissible, that does not tend to prove or disprove that the bond is the act and deed of the alleged obligor. If the defendant wishes to rely for his defense on any want or failure of consideration, or fraud, (unless it relates to the execution of the instrument; as if it be misread to the party, or he did not intend to sign such an instrument,) he must plead the matter specially, or apply for relief to an equitable forum. The evidence introduced by the defendant as to the circumstances, &c., of the parties, was introduced not to show any want or failure of consideration, or any fraud on the part of the plaintiff antecedent to, or independent of the execution of the bond, but to show that the supposed bond was not the act and deed of the defendant's testator: And if it tended in any degree to show *that fact, it was relevant and admissible evidence to be weighed by the jury. I think the evidence did tend to show that fact, and that it was therefore relevant and admissible. If authority were necessary to show the relevancy of such evidence, the cases of Sides v. Schnebly, 3 Harr. & McH. 243, and Rowt's adm'r v. Kile's adm'r, Gilm. 202, cited by the counsel for McDowell's executor, would, I think, be sufficient for the purpose. But the Circuit court in this case conceded the relevancy of the evidence in the instructions given to the jury, which will be hereafter noticed. This evidence of the defendant being admissible, and the plaintiff, to rebut it, having introduced testimony tending to show that he derived the means of making the loan for which the bond purports to have been given, or part of it, from the estate of Sowers, of whom he was executor; the question is, whether the settlements of his accounts as such executor, which the defendant offered to introduce to meet the said testimony of the plaintiff, were not admissible for that purpose? I am of opinion that they were, and therefore, that the court erred in excluding them. It may be said that the evidence being documentary, should have been inserted in the bill of exceptions, according to the case of Hairston v. Cole, 1 Rand. 461. But the only reason for inserting the document in the bill of exceptions is to enable the appellate court to see whether it is relevant evidence. If its relevancy otherwise sufficiently appears upon the record, its insertion in the bill of exceptions is not necessary. Archer v. Archer's adm'r, 8 Gratt. 539. In this case I think the relevancy of the evidence which was excluded is sufficiently apparent on the record. The question upon which it was offered was whether the plaintiff could have derived from the estate of Sowers, of whom he was executor, and also a devisee and legatee, the sum of two thousand dol-

397 lars, *or any part of it, alleged to have been loaned by him to the defendant's testator on the 18th of March 1846? Upon this question, it seems to me, the settlements of the accounts of the plaintiff as executor of Sowers must necessarily shed some light. Indeed, the Circuit court seems not to have excluded these settlements because they did not shed light upon that question, but because it considered all the testimony of the defendant "too vague, remote and indefinite in its character, to sustain the plea of non est factum, against such evidence of factum, as the plaintiff had introduced;" and the court would have excluded all of the said testimony if it had been objected to; but as it was not, the court only excluded the settlements aforesaid which were objected to. No matter how favorable they may have been to the defendant's side of the question, in regard to which they were offered, the court considered them inadmissible, and therefore excluded them: and this accounts for the failure of the court to insert them in the bill of exceptions. In Hairston v. Cole, supra, the document offered was a copy; and it did not appear from the bill of exceptions that the copy was duly authenticated. In this case the settlements themselves, and not a copy, appear to have been offered as evidence. The settlements had probably been made in the Circuit court; or if in the County court, the originals may have been offered.

But even if the admissibility of these settlements as evidence, be not sufficiently apparent on the record, and they should therefore have been inserted in the bill of exceptions, I think the Circuit court erred in not inserting them; and the judgment must, on that ground, be reversed, according to numerous and uniform decisions of this court, of which that in Hairston v. Cole is directly in point. The principle of these decisions is, that when an opinion of an inferior court *admitting or excluding evidence, or giving or refusing an instruction, is excepted to, the court must take care so to state the case in the bill of exceptions as that the appellate court may supervise the opinion, and determine whether it is right or wrong: otherwise, the judgment must be reversed in order that the case may be correctly stated. Therefore, the judgment must always be reversed where the bill of exceptions to an opinion of the court, admitting or excluding evidence, is defective in not setting out the evidence admitted or excluded. The cases of Fowler v. Lee, 4 Munf. 373; Hairston v. Cole, 1 Rand. 461; Raines v. Philips' ex'or, 1 Leigh 483; Bowyer v. Chestnut, 4 Leigh 1, are cases in which exceptions were taken to the admission or exclusion of evidence. Barrett & Co. v. Tazewell, 1 Call 215; Beattie v. Tabb's adm'rs, 2 Munf. 254; Brooke v. Young, 3 Rand. 106, are cases in which exceptions were taken to instructions given or refused by the court. In all these cases the judgments were reversed on the ground that the statement of facts in the bill of exceptions was too imperfect to enable the appellate court to determine the question. The same course was pursued in Thompson v. Cumming, 2 Leigh 321, where the instruction excepted to was so ambiguously and imperfectly expressed, that the appellate court could not collect the import and bearing of the opinion complained of.

I know of no case in this court which is inconsistent with this uniform course of decision. There may be one or two apparently so, but when strictly scanned they will be found to be otherwise. The case of Rowt's adm'x v. Kile's adm'r, 1 Leigh 216, is one of this class. That was a suit upon a bond, and the issue was on the plea of non est factum. An exception was taken to the exclusion of the evidence of a remark of Richard Rowt (no party) that his pen had not forgot to write. There was no ground laid connecting this with the issue, no *conversation stated, which led to or followed the remark; nothing to show how it could possibly bear on the case: And Judge Carr said, "I cannot think that so light and trivial and unconnected a remark should induce us to send back a case, where there have been two trials, in both of which the jury have found the same way." He had previously, it is true, made the general remark, that "when we are called on to reverse the decision of a judge, it is incumbent on the party seeking this, to show that there is error; and to this end he ought to present to us such a case as shows the relevancy of the evidence rejected." But that remark must be referred to the case under consideration; in which it did not appear that the facts were imperfectly stated in the bill of exceptions. Non constat that there was any evidence which connected the "light and trivial" words of Richard Rowt with the case. The conjecture that there might have been such evidence, was not a sufficient reason for reversing the judgment, and sending the case back for a third trial. If there was such evidence, the party seeking the reversal of the judgment ought to have presented such a case as to have shown it. In that case, as before remarked, the bill of exceptions is perfect on its face. In this case defect, if any is apparent on the face of the bill of exceptions, consists in not setting out the settlements therein stated to have been offered as evidence. Judge Carr certainly did not intend, by anything which he said in that case, to controvert the principle of the decisions to which I have referred; for he had expressly admitted that principle, and followed the authority of the earlier decisions in the case of Brooke v. Young, 3 Rand. 106. The case of Carpenter & wife v. Utz, 4 Gratt. 270, is another of the class before referred to. There the judgment was affirmed, because the evidence stated in the bill of exceptions as having been excluded by the court below, *was, standing by itself, clearly irrelevant and inadmissible; and there was nothing to show that it had any connection with the case. It presented precisely the same question which was presented by the case of Rowt's adm'x v. Kile's adm'r: and Judge Allen, in delivering the opinion of the court, uses substantially the same general remark which was used by Judge Carr, as before stated, "that where it is alleged that error has been committed in excluding proper and relevant testimony from the jury, it is incumbent on the party seeking to reverse a judgment for this cause, to show that error has been committed." But, as in that case, this remark must be referred to the case under consideration; and then it will be consistent with all the other decisions on the subject. That it was intended to be so referred, plainly appears by what immediately follows in the same sentence, viz: "and to this end the evidence offered and rejected must appear to have been relevant from the statement of the evidence alone; or if the relevancy or irrelevancy of the evidence offered depends upon other facts in the cause, the party alleging the error should present such a case on the record as shows the relevancy of the evidence rejected." The court ought not to reverse a judgment upon a mere conjecture that there may have been other evidence showing the relevancy of that stated in the bill of exceptions. The difference between the two cases is like the difference between a defective case, and a case defectively stated. In the one case the appellate court, so far as appears from the record, has the same question before it which was passed upon by the court below, and may therefore revise the decision of that court. In the other, the appellate court has not the question passed upon by the court below fairly before it, and must therefore remand the case, that a more perfect statement may be made. The cases in 401 which exceptions have been *taken to opinions of the court overruling motions to set aside verdicts on the ground that they were contrary to evidence, form a peculiar class, resting on peculiar reasons, and are not in conflict with the principle before stated. Such opinions may, in Virginia, be revised by an appellate court; but, generally, only where the facts, and not the evidence, are certified by the court below: And if the evidence, instead of the facts, be certified, the appellate court will, generally, on that ground decline the supervision of the opinion, and affirm the judgment. It will not remand the case for a more perfect certificate, because non constat that such a certificate could be made. There may have been a conflict of evidence, or it may have been complicated, or come from witnesses of doubtful credibility; and the court below may have been unable or unwilling to weigh the evidence, and determine and certify the facts.

In delivering the opinion excluding the evidence before mentioned, the Circuit court stated, "that upon the issue in this cause the plaintiff having introduced ten witnesses, all of whom swore positively to the genuineness of the signature to the bond, it was sufficient evidence, the bond being found in possession of the plaintiff, from which the jury should presume sealing and delivery, and due execution thereof, unless met and overthrown by opposing testimony on the part of the defendant; and that as the defendant had failed to introduce any opposing proof as to the genuineness of the signature, all the other testimony introduced by him without objection, as well as that now objected to, was too vague, remote and indefinite in its character to sustain the plea of non est factum against such evidence of factum as the plaintiff had introduced, and would have been excluded if 402 *now objected to." The defendant excepted to this opinion of the court pronounced concerning the evidence already introduced by him; and the question now arises, whether the court erred in giving the opinion; and if so, whether, on that ground, the judgment ought to be reversed?

It is a fundamental maxim, that the court responds to questions of law, and the jury to questions of fact. The court must decide as to the admissibility of evidence, that being a question of law; but not as to its weight after it is admitted, that being a question of fact. The cases in this court in affirmance of this position are too numerous to be cited. Most of them are collected in 1 Rob. Pr. 338-344. As the author says, they "evince a jealous care to watch over and protect the legitimate powers of the jury. They show that the court must be very careful not to overstep the line which separates law from fact. They establish the doctrine that where the evidence is parol, any opinion as to the weight, effect or sufficiency of the evidence submitted to the jury; any assumption of a fact as proved; or even an intimation that written evidence states matter which it does not state, will be an invasion of the province of the jury." Berry v. Ensall, &c., 2 Gratt. 333, is a case on the same subject, which occurred after the publication of that work. There may be others, but it is unnecessary to cite them, as they all, I believe, tend to sustain the same doctrine.

There can be no doubt, I think, but that the opinion in question is in conflict with this doctrine. The court declared that the evidence of the defendant as to the circumstances, relations and business of the parties, and their conduct in connection with the bond in controversy, which was admissible evidence, and was so considered and had been admitted by the court, 403 was *too vague, remote and indefinite in its character to sustain the plea of non est factum against such evidence of factum as the plaintiff had introduced.

The court here weighed the plaintiff's evidence of factum against the defendant's evidence of non est factum, and decided the question of preponderance in favor of the former. If the court had given this opinion to the jury in the shape of an instruction, it would clearly have been such an invasion of their province as to have required the reversal of the judgment. But had not the expression of the opinion in the course of the trial, and in the presence of the jury, the same effect? Had it not at least a strong tendency to influence the minds of the jury? I think that it certainly had. It is the duty of the jury to be governed by the opinion of the court on questions of law arising in the course of the trial; and they will naturally and properly attend to and respect every such opinion, however it may be expressed to them; whether in the form of an instruction or not. The more intelligent and upright the jury, the more apt they will be to pursue this course. They are unlearned in the law, and cannot be expected to know the precise line which divides their province from that of the court. It will not do, therefore, to say that when the court, by the expression of any opinion, crosses the line and invades their province, they may and ought to disregard the opinion and weigh the evidence for themselves. The same may be said in every case in which the court gives an opinion to the jury on the weight of evidence. In the case of Gregory v. Baugh, 2 Leigh 665, the Circuit court, in a charge or instruction to the jury, stated matters as being a written deposition, and instructed the jury that that matter was legal evidence; but in point of fact no such matter was in the deposition: It was held that this was calculated to mislead the jury, and was error for which the verdict should be set aside, *and the judgment reversed. The court, consisting of four judges, was unanimous in this decision. It was argued with great force that it was impossible the charge could have deceived or misled the jury: The depositions were before the jury; the cause turned chiefly on them; they were doubtless the subject of minute examination and discussion at the bar; and it was to be presumed they were carried by the jury from the bar into the jury room, read there, and considered. "It was said," answered Judge Carr to this argument, that "the jury would read" the affidavit "for themselves, and not take the court's version of it. This they might do, as in any other case where the court undertook to instruct them on the weight or effect of evidence, they might disregard such an instruction; yet it would be error in the court to give it." Judge Green said, "The instructions were calculated to mislead the jury, more or less, by inducing them to believe that the court was of opinion that such was the effect of the depositions." Judge Cabell concurred with Judge Green. And Judge Brooke said, the objection to the instruction is not "obviated (as was argued by counsel) by the circumstance that the evidence was in writing, and would be seen by the jury, who might correct the mistake of the judge." In that case the mistake of the court was as to a mere matter of fact, and could have been corrected by merely reading the deposition, which it was the duty of the jury to do, and which, therefore, they probably did; and yet, because they may have been misled by the statement of the court, the judgment was reversed. In this case the court weighed the evidence, and pronounced an opinion upon it, and the error, if any, could not be so easily corrected. It is the ordinary case of an opinion of the court as to the weight, effect, or sufficiency of evidence submitted to the jury; which is a good ground for reversal of a judgment according *to all the authorities. Such an opinion is certainly calculated to mislead them, whether it be communicated to them in the form of an instruction, or be merely expressed by the court in their presence, in the progress of the trial. In either case, they are authentically informed of the opinion, and it must have an influence upon their judgments; probably as much in the one case as the other; but whether the same, or more or less, the principle involved is not affected.

It may be said that it does not certainly appear from the record that the opinion of the court was expressed in the presence of the jury. I think the fact sufficiently appears from the record. The presumption is that the jury is present during the whole progress of the trial. It may sometimes happen that the jury may be temporarily absent during the discussion of a question of law arising in a case: But this rarely occurs; and when it does occur, the party interested in the fact should take care to have it stated on the record. In the absence of such a statement, the appellate court will presume that that occurred which generally, rather than that which very rarely, occurs. The statement in the bill of exceptions tends strongly, if not conclusively, to show that the jury were present when the opinion was expressed. The opinion was excepted to; which would not have been done, if the jury had not been present and heard the opinion; or if it had been done, the court would have certified that the jury were not present when the opinion was expressed; for that fact would have shown that the defendant was not prejudiced by the opinion. It was not intimated in the argument of the case in this court that the jury did not hear, or might not have heard the opinion. It may, therefore, be safely assumed that they did hear it.

I do not think the error of the court in giving the opinion was cured by not excluding the evidence from *the jury.

The court would have excluded it, if a motion had been made for that purpose; and so declared. The error consists in giving an opinion of the weight, effect, or sufficiency of evidence submitted to the jury.

Nor do I think the error was cured by the instructions which, on the motion of the defendant, were given by the court to the jury before they retired to consider of their verdict. Those instructions were:

1. That the jury are bound to weigh and consider all testimony introduced by either party without objection, unless upon a motion made to the court, such evidence is excluded.

2. That upon the issue in this cause, it is competent for the defendant to show, by evidence as to the circumstances, relations and business of the parties, and by their whole conduct in connection with the bond in controversy, that it is either impossible or improbable that the bond sued upon is the act and deed of the defendant's testator.

If the force of these instructions had been undiminished by any accompanying remark of the court, they would merely have declared to the jury their obligation to weigh the evidence before them, and the competency of the defendant, by such evidence, to maintain his plea of non est factum; and would not have obviated the effect of the opinion previously expressed as to the insufficiency of the evidence. Whenever a court gives an opinion upon the weight, effect or sufficiency of evidence submitted to the jury, it would no doubt also, if required, instruct them that it is their duty to weigh the evidence: but surely such an instruction would not remove the influence of the opinion, which would still remain unretracted, notwithstanding the instruction.

But the court accompanied these instructions with the remark, that they were clearly correct, as abstract propositions of law, and that it might be safely left 407 to *the jury to determine how far they were applicable to the facts and evidence in the cause. The meaning of the court in this remark is perfectly intelligible, when taken in connection with the opinion previously expressed, and must have been understood by the jury. Instead of being a retraction, which might have cured the error, it was a reaffirmance, of that opinion. It was a strong intimation, if not an express declaration, that the propositions of law embodied in the instructions were mere abstractions, having, in the opinion of the court, no sufficient foundation in the evidence to give them practical effect. The remark that it might be safely left to the jury to determine how far they were applicable to the facts and evidence in the cause, does not mend the matter; for the jury had just in effect been informed that the instructions had no application to the facts and evidence in the cause, which in the opinion of the court were wholly insufficient to sustain the issue on the part of the defendant.

The case of Brooks v. Calloway, 12 Leigh 466, does not affect this case. There the judge made a statement in regard to the contents of a record which was not in evidence; but he at the same time told the jury that the statement had nothing to do with the case, and should not be regarded by them as anything in their decision of it. The inadvertence was corrected as soon as it was committed. The difference between the two cases is too palpable to require further remark.

In regard to the question presented by the second bill of exceptions, that is, whether the court erred in refusing to permit the plaintiff's witness William B. Crawford to be recalled, or to require the production of the plaintiff's books, which were then within one hundred yards of the court-house: Two reasons are assigned by the court for the refusal: 1. That the evidence would not be relevant to the issue; and 2. That the defendant's counsel 408 had, on the evening *before, announced that they had concluded the examination of witnesses, as stated in the first bill of exceptions.

In regard to the first reason: The plaintiff, to prove his ability to make the loan to the defendant's testator, introduced the witness above named, who testified that he was the book keeper of the plaintiff in his mercantile establishment up to November 1845; and that at the time the plaintiff was in possession of a large amount in cash-notes, and accounts, of his own property, which had not been known to any of the witnesses who had testified as to his circumstances. The witness professed to speak from memoranda taken upon a recent examination of the books kept by him in 1845. I think this statement of the case, with what has been already said in answer to the questions presented by the first bill of exceptions, is sufficient to show that the books were relevant and admissible evidence for the purpose for which they were proposed to be introduced. They were referred to by the plaintiff's witness, who spoke from memoranda taken from them; and they were the best evidence of what they contained; and were easily accessible.

In regard to the other reason assigned by the court: Although the practice of our courts has been liberal in allowing parties, after their evidence is closed, to recall witnesses for the purpose of supplying facts omitted from inadvertence; and although I think such permission should be given wherever there is no ground to suspect improper practice; the object being to elicit truth, and secure the attainment of justice; yet I am aware that the judge, before whom a case is tried, must necessarily have larger room for discretion on this subject, and I think an appellate court should seldom interfere with its exercise. In this case the judge would doubtless have permitted the witness to be recalled and have required the production of the books, 409 *if he had considered them relevant evidence. Moreover, it may be said that though the defendant's counsel had, on the evening before, announced that they had concluded the examination of witnesses, yet they also announced that they would probably, on the next day, offer documentary evidence; which they accordingly did, but it was excluded by the court. The exclusion of this evidence may have been a reason for the motion made immediately thereafter by the defendant's counsel, to have the witness recalled and the books produced; and ought, I think, to have had some effect in inducing the court to sustain the motion. I am of opinion that the court erred in overruling it.

In the cases of Stringer v. Lessee of Young, 3 Peters' R. 320; Wilkinson v. Jett, 7 Leigh 115; and Charlton v. Unis, 4 Gratt. 58, it was decided that the introduction of irrelevant or incompetent evidence by one party without being objected to by the other party, or with his assent, does not authorize the latter to introduce such evidence. This doctrine is reasonable; but does not, I think, affect the question I have just been considering. It does not appear that the memoranda taken by the witness from the plaintiff's books, were exhibited as evidence before the jury, or even that he had them before him when he gave his testimony. He professed to speak from them; and seems to have used them merely for the purpose of refreshing his recollection of facts within his personal knowledge. If they had been exhibited before the jury, they would not have been irrelevant, but merely secondary, evidence; to which the other party might have objected because secondary, and required the production of the books themselves as primary evidence: But he was not bound to make such objection; and not having made it, the evidence, which was before relevant, would then have become competent, and he might counteract its effects by the production of the books or any other *legal evidence.

If the memoranda were merely referred to by the witness to refresh his memory, that fact could certainly be no good reason for refusing to require the production of the books, which were not only relevant, but primary evidence.

In regard to the question presented by the third and last bill of exceptions: I think the court properly excluded the evidence therein mentioned. If the defendant wished to use the plaintiff's books as evidence, the law provided ample means to enforce their production; and not having chosen to pursue those means, he had no right to resort to other means, and prove the plaintiff's refusal to comply with them, in order that inferences to the prejudice of the plaintiff might be drawn by the jury from the fact of such refusal.

Upon the whole, I am for reversing the judgment, setting aside the verdict, and remanding the cause for a new trial to be had therein.

Judgment reversed.

411 *Brooks v. Wilcox.

July Term, 1854, Lewisburg.

Absent DANIEL, J.

1. Distress for Rent—Ascertainment of Value of Rent—Case at Bar.—A landlord having distrained for rent in arrear reserved in salt, has the affidavit and warrant of distress returned to the Circuit court; and the defendant appears there, and a jury is impaneled to ascertain the value of the rent in arrear, which not being able to agree is discharged; and the landlord dismisses the case in that court. He may then apply to the County court to have the value of the rent ascertained, basing his application on the same affidavit and warrant of distress.*

2. Same—Additional Levy.—If the officer levying the distress thinks that he has not taken sufficient effects, he may make a second levy.

3. Same—Ascertainment of Value of Rent—Oath to Jury.—The defendant having elected to have the value of the rent reserved ascertained by a jury, it is not error to swear them to ascertain the rent said to be due.

4. Evidence—Order of Introduction—Discretion of Court.†—Whether a plaintiff shall be permitted to †Evidence—Order of Introduction—Discretion of Court.—In the fourth headnote of the principal case it is said that, whether the plaintiff shall be permitted to introduce further evidence after introduce further evidence after the defendant's evidence is introduced, is a matter within the discretion of the court trying the cause; and its exercise will rarely, if ever, be controlled by an appellate court: Clearly he is entitled to introduce evidence to rebut that of the defendant.

5. Distress for Rent—Object of Jury.—The only object of the proceeding before a jury in the case of a distress for rent, is to ascertain the value in money of the rent in arrear. It is not necessary for the landlord to prove to the jury that a distress warrant has been levied for rent in something other than money, and that it is due and in arrear.

6. Same—Value of Rent Ascertained—Order of Court.—The jury having ascertained the value of the rent in arrear, the court makes an order directing the officer to sell the property distrained as is directed by law, and after satisfying the rent due, with interest and costs, to pay over the balance to the tenant. This is substantially in accordance with the statute.

7. Interest on Rent in Arrear—Statute.—Under the act of March 2d, 1827, the landlord was entitled to interest on rent in arrear, from the time it was due.*

412 *At the January term 1850 of the County court of Kanawha, Luke Wilcox filed a notice, with an affidavit of its service, to James G. O. Brooks, that he would apply to said County court to ascertain the value in money of five thousand bushels of salt of first quality, &c., it being for rent in arrear, and reserved upon contract with him, and for which said Brooks' property had been distrained; and for such other and further order as the court might lawfully make in the premises. Upon this notice he founded a motion to ascertain the value of five thousand bushels of salt reserved for rent. This motion was continued until the December term of the court, when the defendant appeared and moved to quash the motion, on the ground that the plaintiff had previously made a similar motion in the Circuit court, which had been entertained in that court, and there had been a trial by a jury, which could not agree, and were discharged: And then the court on his

the defendant's evidence is introduced, is a matter within the discretion of the court trying the cause. motion, had permitted him to withdraw his notice and motion, and dismiss the same from the docket at the December term 1849. And he produced a record of the proceedings in the Circuit court, which showed that these proceedings were based upon the same affidavit of the plaintiff as to the rent due, and the same warrant of distress, on which this motion in the County court was based. And he showed that the officer had first levied the warrant on four hundred and five barrels of salt pending the proceeding in the Circuit court; and after that proceeding was dismissed, he levied on an additional two hundred and thirty-five barrels. The County court refused to quash the motion; and the defendant excepted.

The defendant then elected that the value of the salt said to be due from him to the plaintiff, should be ascertained by a jury; which was accordingly impaneled, and sworn to ascertain the value of the

On the trial the plaintiff introduced witnesses to prove the value of salt in 1849, and then rested. Thereupon the defendant by his counsel then informed the plaintiff that if he had other evidence of the value of salt in that year, he should then introduce it, or it would be objected to if offered after the defendant had introduced his evidence on that subject. The plaintiff, however, declined to examine other witnesses; and the defendant introduced his evidence as to the value of salt in 1849, and closed. The plaintiff then introduced a witness whom he had sworn before and omitted to examine, and asked him as to the value of salt in 1849; to which evidence the defendant objected, on the ground that it was evidence in chief which the plaintiff had voluntarily omitted to introduce in the opening of the case after notification by the defendant. But the court overruled the objection; and the defendant again excepted.

After all the evidence had been introduced, the defendant moved the court to give six several instructions to the jury. These instructions were in substance, that to entitle the plaintiff to a verdict he must prove a lease by himself to the defendant, reserving a rent in some other property than money; and that the rent was in arrear, and a distress had been levied. The court refused to give the instructions; and the defendant again excepted. The jury then found a verdict by which they ascertained the value of twenty-five hundred bushels of the salt to be five hundred dollars, and the value of the other twenty-five hundred bushels to be five hundred and seventy-five dollars: And they ascertained the value of fifty barrels of salt, which had been received in part of the rent due, to be eighty-three dollars and sixty-three cents. Whereupon the court made an 414 order directing the officer who *had made the levy, to make sale of the salt mentioned in his return, as is directed by law: And out of the proceeds of such sale, if sufficient for the purpose, to pay to the plaintiff the amount ascertained by the verdict, with interest from the time it was due until paid; subject to the credit ascertained by the verdict; and also to pay the plaintiff his costs. And he was further directed to pay any balance of the proceeds of sale to the defendant.

The defendant obtained a supersedeas to this judgment from the Circuit court, where it was affirmed. Whereupon he applied to this court for a supersedeas, which was allowed.

McComa's, for the appellant.
Fry, for the appellee.

MONCURE, J. This is a supersedeas to a judgment of the Circuit court affirming an order of the County court of Kanawha, directing a sale of certain property distrained for rent reserved in salt. The order was made in pursuance of 1 Rev. Code of 1819, ch. 113, § 12, p. 449, which declares, that "Whenever any distress shall be made for rent reserved in wheat, corn, or anything other than money, it shall be lawful for the landlord or lessor to apply to the court of the county or corporation, or to the Superior court of law for the county in which the leased tenement may lie, to ascertain the value in money of the rent in arrear so reserved, and to order the property so distrained, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be sold for the satisfaction of such rent. And the court to which such application shall be made, ten days' previous notice thereof having been given to the tenant, or in case of his absence from the county, being set up at some conspicuous place on the tenement, shall proceed 415 to ascertain the value in money of the rent in arrear *so reserved, either by their own judgment, or if required by either party, by the verdict of a jury summoned and impaneled at their bar for that purpose, without the formality of pleading; and having so ascertained the value, shall order a sale of the property so distrained, and award costs to the landlord or lessor."

Various errors in the proceedings in the case were assigned by the plaintiff in error, some of them in the petition for a supersedeas, and others, for the first time, in the argument of his counsel in this court. I will notice them in the order of time in which the proceedings complained of occurred.

First. I think the court did not err in overruling the motion of the tenant, the plaintiff in error, to dismiss or quash the notice and motion of the landlord, the defendant in error. The grounds on which it was contended that the landlord's notice and motion should be quashed, were, that they were founded on the same affidavit and distress warrant, on which similar proceedings had been instituted in the Circuit court, but the jury having disagreed and been discharged, the landlord, with the leave of the court, withdrew his notice and motion in that behalf, and the case was dismissed from the docket of the court; and also, that after such dismissal, and before the institution of the proceedings in the County court, the warrant was levied on two hundred and thirty-five barrels of salt, in addition to the quantity on which it had been previously levied. The statute gave the landlord a right to make the application to the Circuit or County court at his election. He made it to the Circuit court; but having withdrawn it by the leave of that court before it was finally acted on, he had a right to make it to the County court. There was no necessity for a new affidavit and warrant to authorize the proceedings in the County court. The affidavit

416 *and warrant were not affected by the abortive proceedings in the Circuit court; and the landlord had the same right to proceed thereon in the County court, as if the proceedings in the Circuit court had not taken place. The warrant had not become functus officio when the additional levy on two hundred and thirty-five barrels of salt was made; and that levy was therefore legal. A writ of fieri facias, after being levied on property insufficient, in the opinion of the officer making the levy, to satisfy the writ, may be levied on other property at any time on or before the return day of the writ. The same principle applies to a distress warrant, except that it has no return day, and may be levied at any time; at least, if it be a reasonable time after it is placed in the officer's hands. The officer may be mistaken in the value of the property first levied on, or he may not be able to find sufficient property at first to satisfy the execution or distress warrant. And "it is for the advantage of the owner of the goods," as was said by Lord Mansfield in Hutchins v. Chambers, 1 Burr. R. 579, 589, "that this should be so: it is better for him that the officer should be at liberty to seize a second time, in case he makes an insufficient seizure the first time. Or else it might induce him to a necessity of taking effects of very great value at first; for, if he is to be precluded from thus making up the deficiency, he will certainly take care not to take too little at first."

Secondly. I think the objection made to the form of the oath administered to the jury, "to ascertain the value of the rent in money, of the salt said to be due from the" tenant to the landlord, is invalid. The statute does not prescribe the form of the oath; and its requisitions were substantially complied with in this case. The words "said to be due" obviously refer to the notice in which the kind and amount of the rent in arrear, the times when

417 payable, and the *fact that it was reserved upon contract, and had been distrained for, are minutely set forth. Thirdly. I think the court did not err in permitting the landlord's witness to answer the question, and give testimony as to the value of salt in the year 1849, after the tenant had examined his witnesses, as stated in the second bill of exceptions. The subject of the examination of witnesses lies chiefly in the discretion of the court in which the cause is tried, and its exercise will rarely if ever be controlled by an appellate court. It does not appear to have been improperly exercised in this case, but the contrary. The testimony objected to seems to have been offered to rebut the evidence of the tenant's witnesses, and for that purpose was certainly proper.

Fourthly. I think the court did not err in refusing to give the instructions asked for by the tenant. They are based on the supposition that in such a proceeding it is necessary for the landlord to prove to the jury that a distress warrant has been levied for rent reserved in something other than money, and due and in arrear. I think that no such necessity exists. No judgment is rendered against the tenant. The only object of the proceeding is to ascertain the value in money of the rent in arrear. When that is done the landlord is placed in the same situation in which he would have stood if the rent had been reserved in money. The officer proceeds in the same way to complete the execution of his duty under the warrant: and the remedies of the tenant for a wrongful distress are the same in the one case as the other. The order of court ascertaining the value of the rent, and directing a sale of the property distrained, did not prevent the tenant from resorting to his remedy by writ of replevin, before that remedy was abolished by the Code; but he might have done so at any time before the property was actually sold. See

In the case of Redford v. Winston, 3 Rand. 148, which was an attachment for rent before the passage of the act of March 2d, 1827, Sess. Acts, ch. 27, p. 25, it was decided that the tenant could not put in any plea or make any defence which might call in question the truth of the landlord's oath before the magistrate, or contest his claim to rent upon the merits, although two of the judges were of opinion that a writ of replevin could not be maintained in such a case; the other two giving no opinion upon the question. There is less reason for permitting the tenant to make any such defence in this proceeding, as none of his remedies for a wrongful distress are impaired or affected by it. Of course the court would not entertain an application for an enquiry as to the value of the rent, without being satisfied that rent reserved in something other than money had been distrained for: The warrant and return would be sufficient evidence of that fact. If the notice stated the fact with sufficient certainty, and the tenant did not controvert it, the court, without requiring further evidence, might properly proceed to ascertain the value of the rent, either by their own judgment, or if required by either party, by the verdict of a jury. The only function of the jury if required, is to ascertain the value of the rent mentioned in the warrant or the notice. In this case the affidavit, warrant, return and notice were all before the County court; and the tenant elected to have the value of the rent ascertained by a jury; which was accordingly done.

Fifthly. I think that the objection to the terms in which the order of sale was made, is invalid. That objection is, that the statute directs only so much of the property distrained, as may be necessary for the satisfaction of the rent and costs, to be sold, and the *residue to be returned to the owner: Whereas the order directs all the property distrained to be sold, and the overplus, after satisfying the rent, interest and costs, to be paid to the tenant. I think the order conforms to the statute, which directs the court to order a sale of "the property distrained;" not so much of it only as may be sufficient for the satisfaction of the rent and costs. It is true that the statute makes it the duty of the officer, in executing the order of sale, to sell only so much as may be sufficient for that purpose. But there is nothing in the order which is in conflict with that duty of the officer; for it expressly requires him to make sale of the property distrained, "as is directed by law." The direction to pay the overplus, if any there be, remaining from said sale, after satisfying to the landlord his rent, interest and costs, may be referred to an overplus which might exist, if the officer should conform as nearly as he could to the directions of the law; for the officer cannot know how much of the property distrained will sell for precisely the amount of the rent, interest and costs.

Sixthly and lastly. I think the landlord was entitled to interest upon the rent from the time it became due, as mentioned in the order, by virtue of the act of March 2d, 1827, before referred to; the 3d section of which provided, that interest should thereafter be allowed on rent in arrear from the period or periods at which the whole or any portion thereof should become due.

I see no error in the judgment of the Circuit court, and am therefore for affirming it.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Moncure, J.

Judgment affirmed.

420 *Koiner v. Rankin's Heirs.

July Term, 1854, Lewisburg.

1. Writ of Right—Adverse Possession—What Tenant May Show.—In a writ of right the tenant, to defend his possession under the statute of limitations, may show a possession anterior to his patent; and to show color of title may introduce the entry and survey upon which his patent issued.

Adverse Possession—What Junior Patentee May Show.—In Cline v. Catron, 23 Gratt. 392, it is said: "It is a well-settled principle that there can be no adversary possession against the commonwealth. But a junior patentee may show that he had possession of the land in controversy prior to the emanation of his patent, under a claim of title, legal or equitable, good or bad; and also, in order to explain the character of his possession anterior to the emanation of the elder patent. But his possession cannot be adversary until the emanation of this elder patent, for it is consistent with the rights of the commonwealth, in whom the legal title resides. After the title passes from the commonwealth to the patentee it instantaneously becomes adverse to him. Shanks and Others v. Lancaster, 5 Gratt. 110; Koiner v. Rankin's Heirs, 11 Gratt. 420."

But as there can be no adversary possession against the commonwealth, he cannot show possession further back than the senior grant.

2. Patent upon Inclusive Survey—Evidence by Tenants Claiming under.—The effect of a patent issued upon an inclusive survey, and the right of the tenant claiming under it to show possession under color of title, is the same as in other grants. He may give in evidence the entries for the different tracts embraced in the inclusive survey, the order of court authorizing the survey, and the survey made in pursuance of the order: But he cannot show possession further back than the senior grant.

Same—Nullum Tempus Occurrit Regi.—In Reusens v. Lawson, 91 Va. 244, 21 S. E. Rep. 347, the principal case and Shanks v. Lancaster, 5 Gratt. 110, are cited as authorizing the proposition that the statute of limitations never runs against the commonwealth unless there be an express provision in the statute to that effect.

Same—Equitable Title as Basis.—In Hale v. Marshall, 14 Gratt. 497, the court, citing the principal case and Shanks v. Lancaster, 5 Gratt. 110, to support the proposition, said that a court of law never refuses to accept an equitable title as a sufficient basis for an adversary possession on which to make out a defence under the statute of limitations.

Same—How Entry Should Be Made.—In Turpin v. Saunders, 32 Gratt. 34, it is said: "In Dawson v. Watkins, 2 Rob. R. 250-260, JUDGE ALLEN, delivering the opinion of the court, said: 'To operate a disseisin of one having right, the entry should be made under a claim of title with the intention of taking possession, and be accompanied with such visible acts of ownership as from their nature indicate a notorious claim of property in the land. To hold otherwise, would be to establish a principle by which every proprietor of vacant lands might be disseized without his knowledge, or even the possibility of protecting himself.' The same doctrine is laid down in Taylor's Devisees v. Burnsides, 1 Gratt. 165, 195; Koiner v. Rankin's Heirs, 11 Gratt. 420; Kincheloe v. Tracewells, Ibid. 587, 602; Ewing's Lessee v. Burnet, 11 Peters' R. 41."

Same—Essentials.—In Creekmur v. Creekmur, 75 Va. 435, it was said: "It is not necessary in the present instance to attempt any general definition of what is meant by 'adversary possession.' It is sufficient to say that, according to the best authorities, a possession to be adverse must be actual, exclusive, open and notorious. It must be accompanied with a bona fide claim of title against the title of all other persons, and it must be continued for the period prescribed by the statutory bar. A mere naked possession without a claim of right, no matter how long continued, never ripens into a good title, but is regarded as being held for the benefit of the true owner. In all cases, a bona fide claim of title is essential. When, however, the actual occupation of land, accompanied with such claim, continues

3. Adversary Possession—Continuity of Possession Necessary.†—To protect himself under the statute of limitations, the tenant must show continued adversary possession for the time of limitation of some part of the land in controversy. Actual possession of a part of his land outside of the boundaries of the demandant's elder patent, is not sufficient.

4. Patented Land—Uncleared—When Subject to Adverse Possession.‡—While patented lands remain for the period prescribed by the statute, the effect is to confer title upon the occupant without reference to the original merits of the controversy, and even against the plainest and most convincing proof of a better original title. Koiner v. Rankin's Heirs, 11 Gratt. 420, 426."

On the subject of adversary possession, see the principal case also cited in Oney v. Clendenin, 28 W. Va. 53; Taylor v. Town of Philippi, 35 W. Va. 560, 14 S. E. Rep. 132. See generally, monographic note on "Adversary Possession" appended to Nowlin v. Reynolds, 25 Gratt. 137.

Same—Interlock.—It is now also well settled, that where there is an interference of the patents, so that they lap or interlock, the occupation or residence of the junior patentee upon a part of his tract outside of the interlock does not give him possession of that part of his tract which is embraced within the limits of the elder patent, but his possession is restricted by the boundary of the elder patent. But, if he has an actual occupation and improvement of a part of the interlock, and the elder patentee has actual possession of no part of it, the actual possession of the junior patentee is co-extensive with the limits of his patent, and is exclusive and adversary, and if continued uninterruptedly for the period of limitation, defeats the elder patentee's right of entry, or his better title, as the case may be. Cline v. Catron, 22 Gratt. 393, citing the principal case; Taylor v. Burnslides, 1 Gratt. 165; Overton v. Davison, Id. 211; French v. Loyal Company, 5 Leigh 627. The principal case was also cited in Garrett v. Ramsey, 26 W. Va. 354, for the first part of the proposition above laid down, and in Stull v. Rich Patch Co., 92 Va. 276, 23 S. E. Rep. 293; Garrett v. Ramsey, 26 W. Va. 356, 374, and Ilsey v. Wilson, 42 W. Va. 767, 26 S. E. Rep. 555, for the second part of the proposition above laid down.

On this subject of interlock, see the principal case also cited in Garrett v. Ramsey, 26 W. Va. 357, 362, 377; 3 Va. Law Reg. 764, 767, 845; 4 Va. Law Reg. 567; monographic note on "Adversary Possession" appended to Nowlin v. Reynolds, 25 Gratt. 137.

†Same—Continuity of Possession Necessary.—"Whenever one quits the possession, the seisin of the true owner is restored, and an entry afterwards by another wrongfully constitutes a new disseisin. The continuity of possession having been broken before the expiration of the period of time limited by the statute of limitations, an entry within the time destroys the efficacy of all prior possession, so that to gain a title under the statute, a new adverse possession for the time limited is required. The tenant cannot sustain his defence of continued adversary possession if, within the period of limitation, the premises have been abandoned by him or those under whom he claims." Hollingsworth v. Sherman, 81 Va. 674, citing among others the principal case; Taylor v. Burnslides, 1 Gratt. 208, 210; Overton v. Davison, 1 Gratt. 223; Cline v. Catron, 22 Gratt. 378; Dawson v. Watkins, 2 Rob. 269.

‡Patented Lands—Uncleared—When Subject to Ad- verse Possession, or in a state of nature, they are not susceptible of adversary possession against the elder patentee, unless by acts of ownership effecting a change in their condition.

5. Writ of Right—Variance between Declaration and Verdict—Effect.§—The quantity and boundaries of the land described in the count and in the verdict vary from each other; but the verdict finds that the land therein described is the tenement mentioned in the count. It is to be presumed that the description given in a count is a mistaken description, and that the land recovered is the land demanded.

This was a writ of right brought in July 1829 in the County court of Augusta, by Joseph Rankin against Robert Koiner, which upon the death of Rankin was revived in the name of his heirs. The count claimed twenty acres of land adjoining the lands of Joseph Rankin and Robert Koiner, beginning at two white oaks corner to James Rankin's land on the wetstone verse Possession.—In Harman v. Ratliff, 93 Va. 253, 24 S. E. Rep. 1023, it is said: "While lands remain uncleared, or in a state of nature, they are not susceptible of adverse possession against the older patentee, unless by acts of ownership effecting a change in their condition, and to constitute adverse possession there must be occupancy, cultivation, improvement or other open, notorious, and habitual acts of ownership. Koiner v. Rankin, 11 Gratt. 420; Taylor v. Burnslides and Overton v. Davidson, supra."
421 *line, and then describing eight lines

§Ejectment—Variance between Declaration and Verdict.—Benn v. Hatcher, 81 Va. 25, 30, was a case of ejectment. In the declaration, the land was described as lying north of a certain road, but in the verdict as south of that road. In all other essential particulars, the verdict minutely followed the declaration. The court, citing the principal case to warrant its decision, held that the description in the declaration must be presumed to be a mistaken one, and that the plaintiffs recovered the land demanded though by a different and corrected description.

See generally, monographic note on "Ejectment" appended to Tapscott v. Cobbs, 11 Gratt. 172.

Same—Verdict.—If, in an action of ejectment, the jury find for the plaintiff the land in the declaration mentioned, if the declaration sufficiently described the land to enable the officers to deliver possession, a judgment may be properly rendered on such verdict. It is not void for uncertainty; but, if the declaration had described the land so vaguely as not to enable the officer to deliver possession of the land, the verdict would have been void for uncertainty, and the court should not enter up a judgment on it, but award a venire de novo. Williams v. Ewart, 29 W. Va. 607, 2 S. E. Rep. 887, citing the principal case. See also, Hitchcox v. Rawson, 14 Gratt. 526, and foot-note. Verdict—Impeachment by Jurors.—To the point that the testimony of jurors is generally admissible to support, though not assail, the verdict, see the principal case cited in *Bull v. by course and distance, which upon being laid down on a plat did not close.

The cause was removed to the Circuit court of Augusta, and came on for trial in November 1849. The tenant claimed under a patent founded on an inclusive survey which embraced the land in controversy. He proved an entry by John McDougall for twenty acres of land on the 23d of May 1793, a survey thereon on the 18th of June in the same year, and a patent for it to McDougall dated the 12th of August 1795. He also proved the application by McDougall to the County court for an inclusive survey, which was authorized by the court; and also the survey which embraced the tract aforesaid and three others for which patents had been granted by the commonwealth in 1742, 1772 and 1778: This survey contained six hundred and eighteen acres; and a patent was issued thereon bearing date the 17th of May 1797. He further proved a regular conveyance of this tract of land through several successive conveyances to himself; and that the land in controversy was the land embraced in the patent for twenty acres, dated the 12th of August 1795; and that the true quantity was twenty-three acres one rood and twenty-six poles. The tenant also proved by a witness that he was personally acquainted with the tract of six hundred and eighteen acres, from a period between 1801 and 1804; and he was acquainted with it from information from the year 1797, when McDougall conveyed it to the witness's father. That witness's father was in possession of the land when witness became acquainted with it; and it had been held by the successive purchasers under McDougall from that time to the time of the trial. That a part of the land in controversy had been cleared in 1812 or 1813 by the purchaser from his father; and that the taxes had been regularly paid upon it since 1797. *And that Joseph Rankin had never had possession of any part of the land in controversy.

The demandants, to sustain the issue on their part, introduced in evidence a patent from the commonwealth, bearing date the 21st of July 1794, by which there was granted to Joseph Rankin two hundred and ninety acres of land; which it was proved included the land in controversy: And they introduced the will of Joseph Rankin, by which he devised his property to them.

After all the evidence had been introduced, the court, upon the motion of the demandants, instructed the jury as follows:

1. If the jury believe from the evidence, that the demandants have the elder patent to the land in controversy, then the effect of the emanation of the junior inclusive patent under which the tenant claims, is no more than the effect of any other patent would be; and only operates as any other patent would do, to give the tenant color of title; which color of title can only serve him in this cause provided he shall have shown, in addition thereto, a continued, actual adversary possession in himself and those under whom he claims, of the land in controversy, for a period of at least thirty years immediately preceding the emanation of the demandant's writ in this cause.

2. That possession to avail the tenant must have been an actual adversary possession of a part or the whole of the land in controversy; and cannot be acquired by open and notorious acts of ownership short of actual occupation, use or enjoyment.

3. That while patented lands remain uncleared, or in a state of nature, they are not susceptible of adversary possession against the elder patentee, unless by acts of ownership effecting a change in their condition. No exception was taken to these instructions by the tenant.

423 *The jury found a verdict for the demandants for twenty-three acres, one rood and twenty-six poles, designating the boundaries thereof by lines, all of which varied from those described in the count: And the court rendered a judgment for the demandants according to the verdict.

After the jury had rendered their verdict, the tenant moved the court for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was contrary to the evidence; but the court overruled the motion, stating that the only question in the cause was the statute of limitations, the demandants having clearly proved the elder title; and that upon the statute of limitations, if the jury had found for the tenant, they would have done no more than he would have done had he been sitting as a juror; but the court could not consider the verdict as involving such a manifest departure from the evidence as to justify its interference by setting aside their verdict.

At a subsequent day of the term the tenant again moved the court for a new trial, upon the grounds, first, that the jury misunderstood the instruction of the court; and he produced an affidavit of three of the jurors, in which they state that after the argument was closed they had made up their minds to find for the tenant on the statute of limitations, and would have so found but for an instruction of the court, which they understood to be substantially, "That the tenant must have proved an adversary possession of the land in dispute for thirty years prior to the suit, separate and independent from possession for that length of time of the inclusive survey which embraced within its limits the disputed land." That they were satisfied the tenant and those under whom he claimed had actual possession for more than thirty years prior to the institution of the suit of part of said inclusive survey; and if that was sufficient, they were satisfied *the jury

424 found an improper verdict; but if the law required the tenant to prove actual occupation and improvement of the land in dispute, without reference to it as a part of the inclusive survey, then they thought the verdict correct. The second ground for the new trial was that if the instruction was not misunderstood, the court had misdirected the jury as to the law: For that possession under the inclusive survey and patent of any part of the land included therein, was in legal contemplation, possession of the twenty-three acre tract, which was the tract in controversy, although no actual occupation or possession of that tract or any part of it was proved. But the court overruled the motion; and the tenant excepted; embracing the action of the court upon both motions in his exception: And he applied to this court for a supersedeas, which was allowed.

LEE, J. I think the first instruction given to the jury on the motion of the demandants' counsel, will not bear the construction placed upon it by the counsel for the plaintiff in error in this court. He supposes that it confined the tenant to proof of adversary possession under the grant obtained upon his inclusive survey, and deprived him of the right of going behind that patent, and for the purpose of making out his defence under the statute of limitations, of showing possession under color of title anterior to its emanation. That he had the right to do so will not be denied. For this purpose he was authorized to give in evidence the entries for the different tracts embraced in the inclusive survey; the order of court authorizing the survey, and the survey made in pursuance of the order; though as there can be no adversary 425 possession *against the commonwealth, he could not go behind the senior grant. Shanks v. Lancaster, 5 Gratt. 110. But there is nothing in the terms or in the effect of this instruction, to prevent him from availing himself of all this evidence, if he had chosen so to do. All that it purports to do is to declare the effect of the junior patent obtained upon the inclusive survey, as the foundation for the defence of adversary possession under the statute of limitations; and it informed the jury that its effect was just the same as that of any other patent, and that it only operated as any other patent would, (if the demandant had shown title under an older grant in himself,) to give the tenant a color of title under which he might, if he could, show an adversary possession sufficient to bar the action under the statute of limitations. That this is strictly correct cannot be doubted. A grant obtained upon an inclusive survey under the statute, possesses no peculiar or distinctive virtue to support a defense under the statute of limitations, not pertaining to any other grant. For this purpose any grant would equally serve by affording the necessary show or color of title to which the adversary possession might be referred. Nor is there the slightest ground for supposing that the tenant was restricted in making out his case, to this particular patent. He was at perfect liberty after showing it, to go on and show any other instruments under which he claimed title, whether the claim was a good or a bad title, a legal or an equitable title, (Shanks v. Lancaster, ubi supra,) and make out his possession if he could, under any one or all combined.

But in truth the tenant could not have been prejudiced if he had been restricted to his inclusive patent as the basis of the claim of title under which he held possession, because that patent issued in 1797, and it was not necessary, in order to complete the bar under the statute, to carry back the adversary possession 426 *further than the year 1799. So that if he could make out the necessary thirty years' adversary possession next before the emanation of the writ, it would have fallen under the date of this patent, and this would have furnished the needful color of title and made out the defense as effectually as if any number of different claims of title had been exhibited.

The instruction to the jury that the possession which would avail the tenant under the statute of limitations must be an actual and continued adversary possession of the land in controversy, or some part thereof, is, I think, strictly correct, nor do I perceive how there can be any objection to it. If the tenant had not had such possession, he could not maintain this defense. The actual adversary possession of the premises in controversy is the very essence of a defense under the statute of limitations. Its effect is to render such possession conclusive in behalf of either demandant or tenant, without reference to the original merits of the controversy, and even against the plainest and most convincing proof of better original title. To say that a party sued for land in his possession is defending himself under the statute of limitations, is exactly equivalent to saying that he is seeking to defeat the action by proving actual adversary possession of the subject in controversy in himself and those under whom he claims, for the period necessary to complete the bar. How he is to make out this possession, whether by proof of actual settlement and occupancy, or of such open, notorious and habitual acts of ownership importing the use and enjoyment of the property, and equivalent to actual occupancy, or by proof of such actual occupation and enjoyment of another portion of the tract claimed by him, of which the disputed premises is also parcel, is a totally different question. This involves other and distinct principles, and especially the enquiry in what sense the rule that 427 *possession of part is possession of the whole, is to be understood, and of what modifications it is susceptible in its application. To this precise question, as I understand the bill of exceptions, it would seem that the attention of the court was not specifically directed. But if it be susceptible of a different construction, and if we are to understand the instruction as implying that the occupancy and enjoyment by the tenant of a portion of his land other than the parcel in controversy, with whatever claim, could not constitute such a disseizin of the demandant as would enable him to maintain his defense under the statute of limitations, I should still think it strictly correct. The case is one of two patents conflicting in part, occasioning what is called a "lap" or "interlock." The elder patentee under his grant acquires at once constructive seizin in deed of all the land embraced within its boundaries, although he has taken no actual possession of any part thereof. Clay v. White, 1 Munf. 162; Green v. Liter, 8 Cranch's R. 229. The junior patentee under his grant acquires similar constructive seizin in deed of all the land embraced by his boundaries, except that portion within the interlock, the seizin of which had already vested in the senior patentee. Clark's lessee v. Courtney, 5 Peters' R. 318, 354; Langdon v. Potter, 3 Mass. R. 215.

In this state of the case, if the junior patentee settle upon that portion of the land within the interlock, claiming the whole within his boundary, he thereby ousts the senior patentee of his constructive seizin, and becomes actually possessed to the extent of his grant. Calk v. Lynn's heirs, 1 A. K. Marsh. R. 346; West v. Price's heirs, 2 J. J. Marsh. R. 380; Fox v. Hinton, 4 Bibb's R. 559. Here possession of part is possession of the whole. But if his settlement be outside of the interlock, there the possession of part is to be construed in reference to the conflict of 428 boundaries, *and with whatever claim it be taken, it gives him possession of that part of the land, only, lying without the interlock. Of that within, he does not thereby acquire the possession. The constructive possession which he would have gained if there had been no conflict, does not take effect; and there is nothing which can serve to overcome the constructive seizin in deed of the elder patentee, and work an ouster. To effect this, there must be an actual invasion of the boundary of the senior patentee, by some act or acts palpable to the senses, and which would serve to admonish him that his seizin was molested. He is of course presumed to know his own boundary, and if that be invaded by plain, open, visible acts of possession on the part of the other, and he submits or fails to assert his right, an ouster will be accomplished, and he shall be said to be disseized. But if the acts be not of the character above indicated, if they amount to a mere adverse claim, however connected with possession of another part of the land, they will not have that effect. The consequence of a different rule, as justly remarked by Judge Baldwin in Taylor v. Burnside, 1 Gratt. 165, 196, would be that a man might be disseized of his freehold not only without his knowledge but even without the possibility of his knowing it. See also Buford v. Cox, 5 J. J. Marsh. R. 589.

There is nothing in any of the cases cited by the counsel for the plaintiff, in conflict with the opinion above expressed. In the cases of Green v. Liter, 8 Cranch's R. 229;

Clarke v. Courtney, 5 Peters' R. 319; Bradstreet v. Huntington, Ibid. 402; Taylor v. Burnside, 1 Gratt. 165; and Overton v. Davisson, Ibid. 211, the possession relied on was within the limits of the opposing claim, and so the question did not and could not arise. In the case of Taylor v. Burnside, however, Judge Baldwin, in the able and luminous opinion delivered by him, 429 adverts to this question, and expresses *views with which the opinion here advanced will be found to be strictly coincident: and it would seem to be fully supported by numerous cases. Burns v. Swift, 2 Serg. & Rawle 436; Napier's lessee v. Simpson, 1 Overton's Tenn. R. 443; Voorhies v. Bridgford, 3 A. K. Marsh. R. 27; Trimble v. Smith, 4 Bibb's R. 257; Smith v. Mitchel, 1 A. K. Marsh. R. 208; Pogue v. McKee, 3 A. K. Marsh. R. 128; Bodley v. Logan's heirs, 2 J. J. Marsh. R. 254; Fox v. Hinton, 4 Bibb's R. 559.

It is objected to the third instruction, first, that it is abstract in its character; secondly, that it is not law. That an instruction presents merely an abstract proposition, is certainly a very sufficient reason why a court may refuse to give it: but if given and it state the law correctly, I am not aware that it has ever been held a sufficient cause for reversing the judgment. And though erroneous, it would, as it seems, not be deemed sufficient to reverse. Hunter v. Jones, 6 Rand. 541. But the instruction was not of this character; for there was evidence in the case which might involve the question as to the nature of the acts which would amount to an adversary possession. And whatever doubts may formerly have been entertained as to the correctness of the doctrine which it asserts, it must now be regarded as settled in Virginia by the cases of Taylor v. Burnside, 1 Gratt. 165, and Overton v. Davisson, Ibid. 211. The authority of these cases upon the points decided by the court, has been, I believe, universally acquiesced in by the profession, and I deem it unnecessary to do more than simply to refer to them: They will be found fully to cover the instruction in all its breadth; and indeed the language in which it is expressed would seem to have been adopted from the judgment of the court in Overton v. Davisson. If it be said that "the acts of ownership" effecting a change in their condition which shall constitute an adversary possession of lands un-430 cleared and *in a state of nature, and the character and extent of this change are not defined or explained, the answer is that the court has conformed to the ruling of this court in the case before referred to, and was not asked to give such definition or explanation. This will perhaps constitute the subject of consideration upon some future occasion. In this case I do not deem it necessary or proper to do more than simply to allude to it.

I think the motion for a new trial was properly overruled. The contest in the case turned upon the statute of limitations; and to make out the defense it was necessary for the tenant to carry back the possession of those under whom he claimed to July 1779. There was no proof of possession of any part of the lands covered by the inclusive patent prior to the year 1800; nor was there proof of any actual possession or entry upon the disputed portion prior to the year 1812. In the view I have taken of the case, there was no disseizin of the demandants' ancestor prior to the year last named. But if even the possession of part of the land without the interlock could be regarded as importing adversary possession of the portion within, and thus working a disseizin, still the evidence fails to carry it back far enough to complete the bar. From the possession in 1800 no inference can legitimately be drawn that the same party had had possession for the previous year. Nor do the circumstances referred to, the making the inclusive survey, obtaining the patent thereon, probable notice of those proceedings to the demandants' ancestor, &c., &c., constitute any proof of such possession as is necessary to work a disseizin. They tend to make out rather a case of adverse claim than one of adversary possession; and they fall within the influence of the rules in Taylor v. Burnside and Overton v. Davisson. Nor do they raise, in connection with the possession in 1800, any necessary presumption of previous 431 possession, *because they are all entirely consistent with the hypothesis that the possession had its commencement in the year first spoken of by the witness.

As to the supposed misunderstanding of the instructions by some of the jury: I will remark that while affidavits of jurors will generally be received in support of their verdict, they will not readily be received to invalidate it. The cases in the books upon this subject are numerous; and it is true in the multitude of decisions there will appear to be some contrariety; and quite a number of cases are to be found in which such affidavits have been received for the purpose of impeaching verdicts, and new trials have been sometimes granted. But the leaning of the courts of most approved authority is against the practice of grounding such motions upon them; and a disposition has been manifested greatly to restrict the class of cases in which, upon such affidavits, new trials will be allowed. In the case of Harnsberger v. Kinney, 6 Gratt. 287, Judge Allen, delivering the opinion of the court, states strongly the reasons founded on principles of public policy for discouraging a resort to evidence of this character. It was a case in which a new trial was asked for on the ground that the instruction of the court had been misunderstood by some of the jury. The Circuit court had set aside the verdict and granted the new trial; and this court reversed the judgment of the Circuit court, and proceeded to render judgment on the verdict. I should therefore feel very reluctant to entertain a motion for a new trial, upon the ground that some of the jurors, as disclosed by their own affidavits, had misunderstood the instructions of the court in a case in which the court before which the trial was had, had refused to set aside the verdict as contrary to evidence, and in which, so far as this court could see, full justice had been done.

But in truth, were it not for the statement in the *bill of exceptions, 432 that the judge himself, if he had been a juror, would have carried the possession back to the date of the inclusive survey, and have found for the tenant, I should have thought there was no ground whatever for imputing any such mistake or misunderstanding of the instruction as is supposed. From the terms in which it is expressed, the Circuit court was of opinion the tenant must show actual possession of part at least of the land within the interlock, as contradistinguished from such possession as he would have acquired if there had been no conflict of boundaries, by taking such possession of part of the land without, and that it must have been held adversely for thirty years prior to the institution of the suit. The proof is clear that he had no actual possession by occupancy or enjoyment of any part within the interlock prior to the year 1812; and there could be no doubt, therefore, if such a possession was required to be proved, that he had failed to make out a bar under the statute. Such an interpretation might very well, I think, be given to the instructions, and they are complained of here because such was their meaning; and I feel some little difficulty in reconciling it with the statement above referred to. But however this be, the instructions, as understood by the three jurors referred to, in my view propounded the law in substance correctly; and I think there is not the slightest ground for disturbing the verdict because of any supposed mistake or misapprehension as to what was really the law of the subject.

There remains to be considered but one other question, and that is as to the effect of the imperfect description of the land in the count, and the variance between it and the verdict as to quantity and boundaries. And on my first examination, I felt some difficulty on this point. Further reflection, however, has served to remove it. 433 The form of the count in a writ *of right under the act of 1819, as prescribed in the act, requires the boundaries of the land to be stated. The count filed attempts to set them out, but those given do not make a diagram that will close, an open line or lines being left between the end of the course S. 80 W. 52 poles, and the beginning corner. But no objection was made for this defect, by demurrer or otherwise; the usual plea was filed and the issue joined on the mere right; and the jury have found a verdict precisely describing the tenement demanded by its exact quantity and specific boundaries. By this means the defect is cured. Turberville v. Long, 3 Hen. and Munf. 309; Lovell v. Arnold, 2 Munf. 167; Bolling v. Mayor of Petersburg, 3 Rand. 563. It is true the verdict describes the land as bounded by seven lines while in the count the number of lines is eight, and no one of the lines named in the former coincides with any one of those given in the latter; and the quantity of land found by the jury is twenty-three acres, one rood and twenty-six poles, while that demanded in the count is twenty acres. But these things are only matters of description; and the jury having found the tenement described by them in their verdict, to be the same tenement mentioned in the count, we have to suppose that the description given in the count is a mistaken one; and that the demandants have recovered the precise tenement demanded in the count, though by a different and corrected description.

Upon the whole case, I am of opinion to affirm the judgment.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Lee, J.

4. Marriage Settlements—Payment of—Case at Bar.

The widow having received from the executors two bonds of her son by a former marriage which he had executed to her husband, in part satisfaction of the amount due to her under the marriage agreement, and having given to them a receipt for the amount, it is a valid payment to her to that extent.

The case is sufficiently stated in the opinion of Judge Samuels.

Baldwin and Stuart, for the appellants.
Michie and H. W. Sheffey, for the appellee.

SAMUELS, J. On the 12th of November 1841 Samuel Findley and Elizabeth S. Harnest entered into an agreement of that date, in writing and under seal, reciting in effect that a marriage was shortly intended to be had and solemnized, by the permission of God, between the parties; declaring, amongst other things, 435 *that it was distinctly understood and agreed, that in the event of said Samuel Findley departing this life first, or before the said Elizabeth, that said Findley bound his heirs, executors, &c., to pay to the said Elizabeth the sum of ten hundred dollars: say about one-half in cash, and the other half in property at a fair valuation price. But if said Findley should live five years or more after the date of their marriage, or the said Elizabeth have one or more children to said Findley, and living at the death of said Findley; in either or both of these last events happening, then Findley bound his heirs, executors, &c., to pay said Elizabeth the further sum of ten hundred dollars, payable as before stated, within six months after Findley's decease, in money, say about one-half, and the other half in household and other property, as it might suit equally for his estate to pay out, and her to receive; which sum or sums were to be considered as in bar of and in full compensation for said Elizabeth's dower; and that said parties agreed that Findley would only have the right to exercise authority over the rents and profits of said Elizabeth's real estate, and the same to use so long as they both lived. This agreement was duly recorded; and immediately thereafter the marriage was consummated. Findley having lived more than five years after the marriage, departed this life May 5th, 1847, leaving his wife to survive.

Findley died leaving a will, which had been written a short time before the marriage, but which contains no reference to that event. Three several codicils are annexed to the will, all written after the marriage. One of these codicils gave to the appellee the personal property she had brought to her husband at the marriage; and in case the testator and his wife should die before Margaret the daughter of the wife, then this daughter was to have and enjoy the property. Another of the codicils gave to the appellee a portion of a tract 436 *of land which testator had purchased of J. Bushong, as her dower right for and during the term of her natural life. The will and the codicils annexed were admitted to probat. On the 23d of August 1849 Elizabeth S. Findley, in conformity with the terms of the statute, by deed under her hand and seal, declared that she would not take or accept the provision made for her by the will of Samuel Findley, or any part thereof, and that she did thereby renounce all benefit she might claim under said will; and that she elected to take such portion of the estate of Samuel Findley, in virtue of her right as widow and relict, as the law of the land allowed.

The appellee Elizabeth S. Findley thereafter, by bill and amended bill, convened the executors and devisees of Samuel Findley before the Circuit court of Augusta county. The bill alleged the facts above stated, and some others not material to be considered; and the prayer of the appellee is, that she may have a decree for her distributive share in the personal estate of her late husband; that she may have a day in court to elect between the provisions of the jointure settlement and her dower in the real estate of Samuel Findley; and for general relief.

The answer of the defendants admitted the marriage and other allegations of the bill, so far as they were founded on written evidence. They question the right of complainant to distribution of her husband's personal estate, alleging that upon the true construction of the marriage contract standing alone, her claim to distribution is barred; or if this be not so, yet, construing that contract by the light of surrounding circumstances, as shown by extrinsic proof, they insist her claim is barred.

The case thus presented brings before the court the questions, What rights complainant acquired under the marriage contract? What rights she gave up by 437 that *contract? What rights she took under the will of her husband? To what extent her rights under the will are affected by her renunciation of its provisions?

It was properly conceded in the argument here that parties, when about to contract the relation of husband and wife, may, by agreement, vary or wholly waive the rights of property which would otherwise result from the marriage. See Faulkner v. Faulkner's ex'ors, 3 Leigh 255; Charles v. Charles, 8 Gratt. 486; 1 Lom. Dig. 423-4.

By the terms of the marriage contract in this case, the appellee was to have one thousand dollars in the event of surviving her husband; and the like sum payable six months after Findley's death, if he should live five years or more, and then die leaving the appellee surviving. The husband lived more than five years, and at his death left the appellee surviving, who thus became entitled to the two sums of one thousand dollars each, payable at the times and in the mode provided in the agreement.

The question, what rights the appellee gave up by the contract, was argued with great earnestness by the counsel. On the part of the appellants it was insisted, that she had given up not only her right of dower, but her claim to a distributive share of the personal estate. On the part of the appellee it was insisted, that the right of dower only was intercepted, and that the claim to a distributive share remained untouched.

It may be laid down as a rule of construction established beyond question, that a written contract must be construed by the terms used therein if plain and intelligible; that extrinsic proof is not admissible for the purpose of adding to, or detracting from, or explaining, or in anywise varying the plain meaning of the instrument itself; that extrinsic proof may be heard only for the purpose of explaining a latent ambiguity or of applying ambiguous words may be further laid down as equally well settled, that if parties in making a contract, use words of definite legal signification, they must be understood as using such words in their definite legal sense. For these positions a large number of authorities were cited by the appellee's counsel; amongst them the cases of Tabb v. Archer, 3 Hen. & Munf. 399; Gatewood v. Burrus, 3 Call 194; McMahon v. Spangler, 4 Rand. 51; Bowyer v. Martin & al., 6 Rand. 525; Ball's devisees v. Ball's ex'ors, 3 Munf. 279. Wigram, in his treatise on the construction of wills, lays down certain rules, some of which are equally applicable to written contracts. The second of these rules is in these words: "When there is nothing in the context of a will from which it is apparent that a testator has used the words in which he has expressed himself in any other than their strict and primary sense, and when his words so interpreted, are sensible with reference to extrinsic circumstances, it is an inflexible rule of construction, that the words of the will shall be interpreted in their strict and primary sense, and in no other, although they may be capable of some popular or secondary interpretation; and although the most conclusive evidence of intention to use them in such popular or secondary sense be tendered.

Applying these rules to the language of the contract, "which sum or sums is to be considered as in lieu of and in full compensation for the said Elizabeth's dower," we must hold that the appellee's right of dower only, properly so called, is barred. That word means an entirely different thing from distributive share. Dower is a widow's life estate in land; a widow's distributive share is a third part of the slaves for life, and of the other personal estate absolutely. The statutes regulating these different subjects, call them by different names; and prescribe different rules and incidents 439 *about them. If we suppose for a moment, that the parties intended to bar the right of dower only, what mode of expression more appropriate for the purpose than that used by them?

Again: If we suppose that they intended to leave her right in the personal estate untouched, the readiest mode of attaining their purpose was to say nothing about it in the contract. I am of opinion the appellee's claim to distribution is not intercepted by the antenuptial contract between herself and her late husband. See Stegall v. Stegall's adm'r, 2 Brock. R. 256; Ellmaker v. Ellmaker, 4 Watts' R. 89.

The question next in order is, What effect the will of Samuel Findley had upon the rights of the appellee his widow to distribution of the personal estate? This question has occurred in many cases under the law as it stood at the death of the testator; and in every case it has been decided that unless the widow renounce the provision made for her by the will, she could claim nothing more than was given by it. The appellee having renounced the will, is entitled to a distributive share of the personal estate of her husband; her dower in the real estate is barred by the contract entered into before the marriage.

The appellee cannot assert her paramount claim to distribution against the will, and also claim the provision, or any part of it, made for her by the will. Having made her election to take the first, she must give up the last to indemnify the parties who are disappointed by her election. Mitchells v. Johnsons, 6 Leigh 461; McReynolds v. Counts & als., 9 Gratt. 242. The appellee should account for the value of her interest under the will, in the personal estate brought by her to her husband. She should also give up her life estate in that portion of the land bought of Bushong and devised to her by her husband, and account for the rents and profits thereof, if any, received by her, or *lost by her want of diligence, if any were so lost. This property and its profits should go to indemnify the legatees who are disappointed by the widow's renunciation.

An error appears on the face of the account taken in the court below for ascertaining the balance to be distributed. That balance will be what remains after paying debts and charges. The amount yet due the appellee on the marriage contract is a debt of Findley's estate, and should be paid before the balance can be properly ascertained.

Without deciding whether the appellee was bound as security for her son William M. Harnest, in the bond amounting to two hundred and fifty-three dollars and fifty-eight cents, yet as she voluntarily paid that bond as well as another bond given by William M. Harnest to Samuel Findley, amounting to fifty-eight dollars and eighty-seven cents, these sums should be charged against her in the account of money due her under the marriage contract.*

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Samuels, J.

Decree reversed.

This was a suit in equity in the Circuit court of Augusta county brought by Jane Thompson, widow of William Thompson, against his representatives, the administrator of Thomas R. Blair, Matthew Blair, William C. Snapp and Jacob Michael, to recover her dower in a tract of land then owned and in the possession of Michael. The facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion of Judge Allen.

Stuart, for the appellee Michael.

ALLEN, P. This was a bill filed by the appellee Jane Thompson, widow of William Thompson, to have her dower assigned to her in a tract of land purchased by, and conveyed to her husband during the coverture. It appears that William Thompson purchased the land from Thomas R. Blair as executor of Matthew Blair, and received an absolute conveyance therefor on the 25th of December 1830. The consideration expressed in the deed was two thousand and seventy-five dollars, the receipt of which was acknowledged on the face of the deed. On the 4th of June 1832, William Thompson pal case is cited and followed in Wilson v. Branch, 77 Va. 69; Harrison v. Payne, 32 Gratt. 389, 391. and note; Jarrell v. French, 48 W. Va. 470, 27 S. E. Rep. 268.

In Verlander v. Harvey, 36 W. Va. 379, 15 S. E. Rep. 56, the principal case is cited for the above proposition, but the second headnote of that case is as follows: Sections 10, 11, and 12 of chapter 65 of our Code, on dower, jointure, and curtesy, construed, and held, that where the husband has sold realty in his lifetime, which was subject to dower, the value of the widow's dower is to be computed, as against the alienee, at the date of her recovery, if in kind, with lawful interest from her suit; but she cannot insist that her dower shall be assigned in specie nor can she refuse to receive the equivalent annuity, or a gross sum in lieu thereof, the option in this matter being lodged by the statute exclusively with the alienee; and when, under section 12, the alienee elects to pay an annuity, or a gross sum in lieu thereof, the value of the dower is computed as of the time of the alienation.

See further, on this subject, sec. VII, monographic note on "Dower" appended to Davis v. Davis, 25 Gratt. 587.

§Chancery Practice—Decree between Codefendants.

—On this subject, see the principal case cited in the following cases: Steed v. Baker, 18 Gratt. 384; Ould v. Myers, 23 Gratt. 405, and extensive foot-note, where a large number of cases are collected and the question discussed; Glenn v. Clark, 21 Gratt. 39, and note; Hansford v. Coal Co., 22 W. executed a deed of trust on the land, and on a quantity of personal property, to secure the payment of the deferred installments of the purchase money, for the payment of which he had executed his several single bills, with William C. Snapp as security, payable in six equal annual payments, the first falling due on the 25th of December 1832. Thompson thereafter took the oath of insolvency, and in November 1832 conveyed his equity of redemption to the sheriff, who made a return that he had sold the same to Thomas R. and Matthew Blair, to whom he conveyed it by deed dated the 27th of June 1834. On the same day Thomas R. Blair, Matthew Blair and William C. Snapp united in a deed conveying the land to Jacob Michael with covenants of general warranty, for the consideration, as expressed in the deed, of two thousand four hundred dollars; and Michael on the same day executed a deed of trust to secure the deferred installments. This deed was signed by both the Blairs, by Michael and the trustee, and with the other deeds of the same date, duly recorded.

443 *The bill makes the representatives of William Thompson, the administrator of Thomas R. Blair, Matthew Blair, William C. Snapp and Jacob Michael, the purchaser in possession of the land, defendants, and prays that her dower be decreed to her, to be laid off by metes and bounds; and that an account of the rents and profits be ordered; and for general relief.

Jacob Michael in his answer, admits the execution of the deed of trust to secure the deferred payments on the land; avers that the deed was executed in pursuance of the original understanding between the parties and William C. Snapp, that the land should be bound for the deferred payments; and insists that the vendor's lien for the unpaid purchase money was not released or discharged as it respected the purchaser himself or his widow claiming dower in the land so purchased after the coverture. But should her claim to dower be sustained, he prayed in his answer, that the value of her dower interest should be ascertained in money, and a decree be rendered in her favor directly against William C. Snapp, Matthew Blair and the representative of Thomas R. Blair.

It is said by Chancellor Kent, 4 Kent's Com. 153, "That the taking the note, bond or covenant of the vendee is not of itself an act of waiver of the vendor's lien; for such instruments are only the ordinary evidence of debt. But taking a note, bill or bond, with distinct security, or taking distinct security exclusively by itself, either in shape of real or personal property, from the vendee, or taking the responsibility of a third person, is evidence that the seller did not repose on the lien, but upon independent security; and it discharges the lien. Gilman v. Brown, 1 Mason's R. 212; Cole v. Scott, 2 Wash. 141; Brown v. Gilman, 4 Whart. R. 290. So too the presumption that the vendor intended to rely on the implied equitable lien, is repelled by the ven-

444 dor's taking a mortgage *on the property subsequent to the deed of conveyance to the vendee. Little & al. v. Brown, 2 Leigh 353. In such case the vendee becomes the owner without qualification at the time of the conveyance; he becomes beneficially seized for his own use; and the wife's title to dower attaches, and cannot be divested by the subsequent incumbrance, unless she concurs therein.

In this case there was the personal security of a third person for the deferred payments, on which the vendor rested from the 25th of December 1830, until the 4th of June 1832, which of itself shows no lien was reserved; and the deed of trust upon that and other property would have superseded it. The purchaser Michael has not introduced any evidence to sustain the affirmative allegation of his answer, that the deed of trust was executed in pursuance of the original understanding of the parties and William C. Snapp, that the land should be bound for the deferred payments. The court properly determined by the interlocutory decree of November the 1st, 1848, that the appellee was entitled to her dower, and that commissioners should be appointed to allot and assign the same to her.

The decree furthermore directed the commissioners to report what sum would be a fair annual rent or annuity for the dower estate, and what gross sum in fee, payable in presenti, would be a fair equivalent for the plaintiff's dower interest. This provision of the interlocutory decree seems to have grown out of a prayer in the answer of the defendant Michael, that in the event of the claim to dower being sustained, the value thereof should be ascertained in money, and a decree be rendered directly against his vendors in favor of the appellee. In pursuance of this order the commissioners laid off the dower by metes and bounds, and ascertained the yearly 445 rent; and a report was *made ascertaining the present fee simple cash value of the dower estate: And a final decree was rendered in favor of the appellee for the arrears of rent, and the cash value of the dower estate, against said Michael. And the court furthermore proceeded to give Michael a decree over against his vendors, for the amount so decreed against him; and being satisfied that Snapp and Matthew Blair were only sureties of Thomas R. Blair in the deed and warranty to Michael, liberty was reserved to them, in the event of their being compelled to pay the sum decreed in favor of Michael, to apply for a decree against the estate of Thomas R. Blair; or the said M. Blair was, if he so elected, to be permitted to make a certain offset referred to in the decree.

From this decree the appellant Matthew Blair has appealed. The suit was a simple claim for dower to be laid off and assigned to the plaintiff in the court below, in lands of which she alleged her husband was beneficially seized during the coverture, and for an account of rents and profits. The purchaser in possession, Michael, holding the legal title by deed duly recorded, was the only necessary defendant, the only person against whom the plaintiff was entitled to a decree. She had no privity with or claim against the intermediate parties through whom the legal title may have passed from her husband to the purchaser in possession. In giving the history of her claim, the bill set out the various alienations and made the vendors of Michael defendants, but asked no decree against them. It was for Michael's benefit that they were made defendants, as it gave them notice of a claim for which they might be eventually liable on the warranty in their deed, and so enabled them to unite with him in resisting the plaintiff's claim; but there was nothing in the allegations of the bill which raised any question as between the codefendants themselves. The right of the appellee Jane Thompson to have her dower assigned and the extent of it, was in 446 nowise *dependent on the transactions between the codefendants. Yet the litigation and delay which the female appellee has been compelled to encounter and submit to, has grown out of and been caused by matters to which she was a stranger, and entirely beside the issues raised by the bill and pleadings. The appellant Matthew Blair does not seriously controvert her right to have her dower assigned; but files an elaborate answer to show that he should not be held liable on the warranty in his deed to Michael; a matter foreign to the issue presented by the bill, and with which the female appellee had no concern. The final decree not only determines this question as between Michael and his vendors, though no issue had been raised between them, but proceeds a step further, and decides that as between these vendors, one was principal in the joint warranty and the other two were sureties.

But little is to be found in the English books in relation to proceedings in equity upon the subject of decrees between codefendants. The leading case on the subject is the case of Chamly v. Lord Dunsany, 2 Sch. & Lef. 689, decided in the house of lords. The case, according to Lord Chancellor Erskine, was more entangled than any other he ever had to consider; but the general doctrine in regard to such decrees was laid down by Lord Eldon and Lord Redesdale. "Wherever (said Lord Eldon) a case is made out between defendants by evidence arising from pleadings and proofs between plaintiffs and defendants, a court of equity is entitled to make a decree between the defendants, and is bound to do so. The defendant chargeable has a right to insist that he shall not be liable to be made a defendant in another suit for the same matter which may be then decided between him and his codefendant. And the codefendant may insist that he shall not be obliged to institute another suit, for a matter which may be then adjusted between the defendants." Conry v. Caulfield, 2 Ball & between codefendants upon evidence arising from pleadings and proofs between plaintiffs and defendants.

The case of Taliaferro v. Minor, 2 Call 190, presents the first instance in which the practice was adverted to in this court. That was a suit by distributees against two administrators for an account and distribution. The report ascertained a balance to be due by one administrator to the estate of the other administrator; and a decree was rendered for such balance by the chancellor. But upon appeal it was reversed, because no contest appeared between the administrators, in the record, nor any account of their separate transactions, except in the statement of the accounts by the commissioner. The principle of the case is that the pleadings raised no issue between the codefendants as to the state of accounts between themselves.

Roberts v. Jordans, 3 Munf. 488, was an injunction to a judgment obtained by the assignee of a bond against the obligor, upon the allegation of payments to the obligee and assignor. This court directed the injunction to be made perpetual as to such sum only as had been paid to the assignor before notice of the assignment; but gave the plaintiff a decree over against the obligee and assignor for any sums received by the latter after notice of the assignment, as soon as the plaintiff should have paid the judgment. This was not a decree between codefendants, but in favor of the plaintiff against one of the defendants for money improperly received by him on a note he had assigned to a third person.

The case of Dade v. Madison, 5 Leigh 401, is similar in principle to the case last cited; a decree over in favor of the plaintiff against a defendant ultimately liable to pay back to the plaintiff money he had been compelled to pay under the order of such defendant in favor of a third person.

448 Ruffners v. Barrett*, 6 Munf. 207, is to the same effect; an injunction by the obligor to a judgment in favor of the assignee, upon the allegation of payment to the obligee before notice of the assignment. Upon proof of payment after notice of assignment the injunction was dissolved as to the assignee; but leave was given to proceed against the assignor.

These cases, though referred to sometimes as instances of decrees between codefendants, are in fact cases in which decrees were rendered in favor of the plaintiff against one defendant upon a proper case made against him.

Morris v. Terrell, 2 Rand. 6, was a case of a decree between codefendants. The principal in that case filed a bill against his agent and a purchaser of land from the agent, to set aside a sale for which the agent admitted he had received the purchase money, upon the ground that the agent had no authority to sell. The sale was set aside; the principal restored to his property; and the agent decreed to repay the purchase money received from the purchaser. In that case the authority of the agent to sell constituted the gravamen of the bill. His liability to refund to the purchaser resulted from the establishment of the fact that he had sold without authority; and the question was directly presented and arose from the allegations of the bill and the proofs to sustain them.

The case of Mundy v. Vawter, 3 Gratt. 518, agrees in principle with Morris v. Terrell. The bill of Vawter the substituted trustee, made the purchasers of the land and the previous trustees and others who had united in a deed to Dillard, defendants, alleging that the sale was without authority. The court so held as to one-fourth of the subject, and gave the plaintiff a decree therefor; and then decreed over in favor of the purchaser against his grantors, in the order of their liability, upon the ground set forth in the decree, that 449 *the claim of the purchaser to relief upon the recovery from him, arose out of the decree against him upon the pleadings and proofs between the plaintiff and his grantors. There as in the former case, the authority to sell constituted the stress of the case; and upon that depended the liability to refund. Upon that question the issue was fully made up by the allegations of the bill to which the defendants ultimately made responsible to their vendee and codefendant, had an opportunity of responding by their answers. In another branch of the case of Mundy v. Vawter, the court refused a decree in favor of Norvell against his codefendants, because the pleadings did not make a proper case for such decree.

In the case of Templeman v. Fauntleroy, 3 Rand. 434, the plaintiff charged that Fauntleroy an absentee, was indebted to him, and that the home defendant was indebted to Fauntleroy; and being a foreign attachment, he sought satisfaction of his debt out of the debt alleged to be due by the home defendant to the absentee. The fact of indebtedness was directly alleged in the bill and established by the report of the commissioner; and though the plaintiff took his decree against the absentee alone, and waived a decree against the home defendant, it could make no difference to the latter whether he should be decreed to pay to the plaintiff or to his codefendant and creditor, the absentee. A payment to either would have discharged his debt. The existence of the debt being alleged, the case between the defendants was fully made out by evidence arising from the pleadings and proofs between the plaintiff and defendants.

In Toole v. Stephen, 4 Leigh 581, a judgment in favor of the assignee against the maker of the note was enjoined on the ground of usury. It was insisted in this court, upon the authority of Chamly v. Ld.

450 Dunsany, that the court below erred in not giving the *assignee a decree against the assignor a codefendant, when the judgment of the assignee was enjoined; but this court affirmed the decree. In McNeil v. Baird, 6 Munf. 316, the plaintiff sought to enjoin the endorsee of negotiable notes from proceeding to enforce them, on the ground of the failure of consideration and fraudulent concealment by the payee. The endorsee claimed to be an endorsee for value without notice; but as against the payee the equity in the bill was fully supported by the testimony. The court held that as both maker and endorsee were before the court, the endorser and payee should be first subjected to the payment of the notes; he being the principal debtor. In this case the liability of the payee arose out of the failure of the consideration and his own fraud; and this constituted the gravamen of the charge contained in the bill. And it appearing by his own answer, according to the report, that he had endorsed the notes for value, the case as between himself and his codefendant, was fully made out by evidence arising from the pleadings and proofs between the plaintiff and defendants; it being a case in which the plaintiff, in the event of his being compelled to pay the debt, would have been entitled to a decree upon the pleadings and proofs against the said defendant; and in fact the decree contained a provision for such decree in favor of the plaintiff.

In Allen & Ervine v. Morgan's adm'r & als., 8 Gratt. 60, the plaintiff, a judgment creditor of the intestate, filed a bill against the administrator of the debtor and his official sureties, charging a devastavit by the payment of debts of inferior dignity. Some of the sureties in their answers insisted that the devastavit had been committed by the fraudulent application of the assets by the administrator to the payment of a debt due to another of the sureties; and as the administrator was insolvent, they contended that this surety should be primarily liable, or that the other sureties 451 *should have a decree over against him. This court held that although the plaintiff was entitled to a decree against all the defendants, there was nothing in the allegations of the bill and pleadings, which raised an issue between the codefendants, so as to let in evidence as to their liabilities as amongst themselves; and that it was not therefore a proper case for a decree between them.

The case of Morris v. Terrell, 2 Rand. 6, and Mundy v. Vawter, 3 Gratt. 518, are the only cases in which the plaintiff was not entitled to a decree in any event against the defendant, as against whom a decree was made in favor of a codefendant. In Templeman v. Fauntleroy, and McNeil v. Baird, the plaintiff was entitled to a decree against the defendant charged in favor of the codefendant. In each case the liability of the party and the extent of it, arose from the facts which entitled the plaintiff to any relief. They were, therefore, necessarily charged in the bill; the defendant had an opportunity of responding in his answer; and the evidence applied directly to the issue thus made up by the pleadings.

Nothing of that kind appears in the present case. The widow was entitled to her dower in the lands to be assigned by metes and bounds, and to an account of rents and profits. The court had no authority to decree a sum in gross in lieu of dower except by the assent of all parties interested. She had therefore no right to a decree against the defendant Matthew Blair and his associates who conveyed to the purchaser Michael. And her right to a decree against him as the owner of the land could not be affected by the contracts and dealings between him and his vendors. Whether they were legally liable upon their warranty and the extent of that liability, and how far that legal liability might be affected by the matters set out in the answer of Matthew Blair, were questions not arising upon any of the allegations of the bill; and 452 proof *in relation thereto could not have applied to any issue made by the pleadings.

In Hubbard v. Goodwin, 3 Leigh, 492, 522, Tucker, president, observed, "That the practice of decreeing between codefendants should not be extended further than it had already gone. A defendant who answers the plaintiff's bill does not always go on to state his own case as between him and his codefendant. There is no issue made up nor any provision for taking their testimony in reference to the peculiar matters in difference between them. And hence in many cases the contest between them cannot come fairly before the court." And he further remarked, that a decree between codefendants was proper in no case where the plaintiff was not entitled to a decree against both or either. The cases of Morris v. Terrell, and Mundy v. Vawter, ubi supra, were cases in which the plaintiffs did not seek decrees against the defendant who was charged in favor of the codefendant; but they were different in all their circumstances from the case under consideration.

I think the decree here between the codefendants extends the practice further than any of the cases justify, and was unwarranted under the pleadings and proofs as applicable to them.

I also think the court erred in decreeing a gross sum against the purchaser in lieu of dower. As has been remarked, such a decree could be authorized only by the assent of all the parties interested. Herbert v. Wren, 7 Cranch's R. 370; Wilson v. Davisson, 2 Rob. R. 384. The appellee Jane Thompson did not pray for such a decree in her bill. The defendant Michael asked that it should be ascertained in money, and a decree over be rendered in her favor against his vendors. It was ascertained in money, and a decree was rendered against him for the amount in her favor; and there was a decree over in his favor against the appellant. From this decree neither the widow nor Michael 453 *have appealed; and if they were the only parties, their assent to the conversion into a gross sum might be presumed. Michael no doubt acquiesced because it was substantially a decree against his warrantor for the amount of the widow's claim. But as the appellants never assented to such a conversion of her claim into a gross sum, the decree would not bind them or furnish the measure of their liability in an action upon the warranty. I think therefore a reversal of the decree as to them draws with it a reversal of the entire decree, so as to leave the purchaser at liberty to proceed against his vendors upon their warranty for such damages as he may show himself entitled to. I think the decree should be reversed with costs against the appellee Michael; and the cause remanded with instructions to enter a decree in favor of the appellant Jane Thompson, for her dower as laid off and assigned to her by the commissioners under the interlocutory decree of the 1st of November 1848; to whose report there has been no exception; and also for the arrearage of rent ascertained by the report of the commissioner to which there has been no exception; and for a decree for an account of rents and profits accrued since the 1st of June 1849, up to the period of entering the decree aforesaid.

MONCURE, J., concurred in the opinion of Judge Allen as to the dower. He doubted whether it was a proper case for a decree between codefendants; but under the circumstances of the case he thought it was too late to object to it, and that the decree should be affirmed.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Allen, P.

Decree reversed.

Wills—Property to Wife to Distribute among Children—Case at Bar.—Testator says, "Having implicit confidence in my beloved wife F. and knowing that she will distribute to each of my children in as full and fair a manner as I could, I hereby invest my said beloved wife F with the right and title of all my property, both real and personal, to dispose of to each of my children in any way she may think proper and right." At the June term of the County court of Augusta in 1835, the will of Samuel Steele, junior, was admitted to probat, and Frances Steele his widow, who was named executrix therein, qualified as such. The second, third and fourth clauses of the will are as follows:

"2d. Having implicit confidence in my beloved wife Frances Steele, and knowing that she will distribute to each of my children in as full and fair a manner as I could, I hereby invest my said beloved wife Frances with the right and title of all my property, both real and personal, to 455 dispose of to each of *my children, in any way she may think proper and right.

"3d. If my wife Frances should depart this life without making and publishing her last will and testament, then my son James Henry shall account to my estate for the sum of one thousand dollars, which has been expended upon his education, &c., over and above any other children.

"4th. If my said wife Frances should depart this life without making her will as aforesaid, it is my desire that all my young children shall have a good English education, and that each one shall have an equal distribution of of my estate, except my son James Henry, who shall account as aforesaid out of his share."

The testator left six children. In 1841 Mrs. Steele entered into a contract in writing with Jesse J. Levisay, by which she contracted to sell to him a tract of land in the county of Greenbrier, a part of Samuel Steele's estate; and she bound herself to convey the same to him with general warranty upon the payment of the purchase money. Levisay paid all but the last installment of the purchase money; and a question being started as to the power of Mrs. Steele to sell and to make a good title, he filed his bill in the Circuit court of Augusta county, in which he stated the will of Samuel Steele, the sale to himself by Mrs. Steele, and his payment of nearly all the purchase money. That the money he had paid had been divided among all the children but John H. Steele; and that he was therefore unwilling to unite with the other heirs and the executrix in making a sufficient deed to the plaintiff: And that the other heirs were only willing to convey with special warranty. And making Mrs. Steele and the children of Samuel Steele defendants, he called upon her to state by what title she held the land, and what interest she claimed in it; what disposition she had made of the purchase money *paid to her; and how she had disposed of the rest of the estate of her husband. And he prayed that the court would ascertain and settle the rights of the parties in the land purchased by him, and decree to him a good and sufficient title according to the contract; and for general relief.

Mrs. Steele answered, admitting the contract, and that the plaintiff had paid nearly all the purchase money. She insisted that she had a perfect right to sell and convey the land; and she says that she had always been ready to make the conveyance so soon as the plaintiff paid the balance of the purchase money. She admitted that the will of her late husband did not constitute her the absolute owner of the whole estate; but she insisted that it conferred upon her the legal control and title, subject to a fair distribution among her children; a trust for which she was responsible to her children, but to no other person. She therefore declined to account to the plaintiff for the manner in which she had disposed of the purchase money received of him, or the application she intended to make of that yet to be paid, further than to say that in what she believed to have been the sound exercise of the discretion vested in her by the will, she had thought it proper to sell the land purchased by the plaintiff, and to use the proceeds in the advancement of her children in a full and fair manner, such as she believed to have been contemplated by her husband, and to be just and expedient under the circumstances of the family.

John H. Steele and two others of the children answered, insisting upon an equal distribution of the estate; but not objecting to the sale, if the purchase money was thus distributed.

The cause came on to be heard in November 1851, when the court held that Frances Steele took under the will of her husband a life estate for her own use *in the estate, with a power of distributing it equally by will at her death among the children of the testator: that her power of sale was confined to the personal estate; and was only such as she might lawfully exercise as executrix: That as devisee she had a power of distribution or appointment only among certain persons, the children of the testator, but not of sale to strangers; and that if she could not conveniently distribute or appoint without selling, she must apply to a court of equity for power to sell. And even if she had the power of sale, the purchaser was bound to look to the application of the purchase money.

And the sale not being objected to by any of the children of the testator, if the proceeds were to be distributed equally, and the court seeing no objection to it, the sale was confirmed, and Frances Steele was decreed to convey the land to the plaintiff with general warranty; and that the other defendants should release in writing endorsed on her deed all their claim in and to the land so conveyed. That upon the filing said deed among the papers duly authenticated for record, the plaintiff should pay to Frances Steele the balance of the purchase money, after deducting his costs in this cause; and that she should distribute the proceeds of said sale equally among all the children of her testator, so as to place each child on an equal footing with the rest. From this decree Mrs. Steele applied for and obtained an appeal to this court.

Baldwin, for the appellant, insisted:

1. That by the second clause of the will of Samuel Steele, Mrs. Steele was placed in loco parentis to his children; and that she had full power and authority to sell and convey the property and distribute the proceeds of sale among the children, when and in such proportions as she deemed just and reasonable under *the circumstances. He cited on this question Kenworthy v. Bate, 6 Ves. R. 793; Long v. Long, 5 Id. 445; Bullock v. Fladgate, 1 Ves. & Bea. 471; 1 Sugd. on Powers 508—510; 2 Lomax Dig. 169, 170; 4 Kent's Com. 345.

2. That there being in this case a discretion in the trustee as to the application of the purchase money, the purchaser was not bound to see to its application. 2 Story's Equ. Jur. § 1134; 1 Lomax Dig. 245.

3. That the will does not require an equal distribution among the children by Mrs. Steele: And that the fact of conferring the power to distribute implies the power to appoint unequally. At law the giving a penny is sufficient; but it is held in equity that the appointment must not be illusory. 2 Lomax Dig. 170—172; 1 Sugd. on Powers 568; Maddison v. Andrew, 1 Ves. sen. 57; Kemp v. Kemp, 5 Ves. R. 855.

H. W. Sheffey and Michie, for the appellees, insisted:

1. That Mrs. Steele had no power to sell the estate; but that her power was confined to a disposition by will. That it was certain the will gave no express power to sell; and there was nothing in the will from which such a power might be inferred; but on the contrary, the third and fourth clauses showed that the testator contemplated the disposition of the property by her will. They cite Carrington v. Belt, 6 Munf. 374; Knight v. Yarbrough, Gilm. 27.

2. That equality of benefit to the children was plainly intended. The testator, by the provisions of the third and fourth clauses, showed what he considered a full and fair disposition of his property: And the phrase "in any way she may think proper," referred to the mode in which the property was to be distributed, and not to the proportion which was to be given. They cited Harrison v. Harrison, 2 Gratt. 1; Briggs v. Penny, 8 Eng. Law 459 & Equ. R. 231; 2 White & Tudor's Cases in Equ.* part 2, p. 349-352, 72 Law Libr.

3. That there being no discretion vested in Mrs. Steele, but she being bound to distribute the estate equally among the children, the purchaser was bound to see to the application of the purchase money. 3 Sugd. on Vend. 96-112.

DANIEL, J. The main questions to be considered are: First, whether the will of the testator confers upon his wife Frances the power to sell the real estate? And if so, secondly, whether the purchaser is bound to see to the application of the purchase money?

The second clause of the will, taken apart from the other provisions, seems to me to indicate a design on the part of the testator, to leave his wife, after his death, clothed with all the control over his estate which he had himself enjoyed in his life time, subject only to the restriction that his children, as a class, should become ultimately the beneficiaries of the whole, and that each of his children should receive a portion of the estate.

The expressions of confidence in respect to his wife's distribution and disposition of the estate, whilst they raise a trust in favor of the children, impose no limitation on the discretion of the donee of the power, as to the time or mode of executing it. Under this clause, the appointment might be made by Mrs. Steele, in her life time, by the performance of any act or the execution of any instrument by her, which would be sufficient to pass property of the like kind belonging to her absolutely; or she might defer the appointment till her death, and make it by last will and testament. I think it equally clear that she is left free to select the species of property belonging to the estate, to be appointed to the several children; that 460 she might give *land to one, slaves to another, and money or bonds to a third. The power to sell the estate, or any portion of it, is not given expressly, but is, I think, fairly to be inferred from the obvious scheme of the testator and the broad terms used in relation to the distribution and disposition of the property. A power to convert land into money or money into land or other species of property, and thus to shape and adapt the intended bounties to the wants and conveniences of the several beneficiaries, falls so manifestly within the scope of the broad and parental control with which it was the design of the testator to leave his wife invested after his death, that it seems to me, to deny it, would be to run counter to the rule which makes the intention of the testator the main guide in the construction of his will.

The courts have been liberal not only in sustaining a substantial execution of the power in cases where the appointment has been perfected, but also in inferring the power to sell when essential to the full execution of the trust, in cases where efforts have been made to arrest the donee of the power in the course of his proceeding to execute it. Thus in the case of Roberts v. Dixall, 2 Equ. Cas. Abr. 668, where a father had a power to appoint and divide an estate among his children in such proportions as he should think proper, and bequeathed a legacy of three thousand pounds to one of them as a charge upon the estate, Lord Hardwicke held that the power was in substance well executed. "It is true (he said) the direct terms of the power are not pursued, but the intent and design of it are. It is admitted that the father might have appointed part of the estate to be sold and the money raised by such sale; and what is done is exactly the same thing; this court may order a sale."

So in Long v. Long, Ves. R. 445, where a father was clothed with a power to 461 charge an estate with the *payment of such sum or sums of money for the benefit of such child or children, payable in such proportions and at such time or times as he should by deed or by will direct, limit and appoint, the power was held well executed by a will directing a sale and appointing the money.

And again, in the case of Kenworthy v. Bate, 6 Ves. R. 793, where an estate was devised to the use of such a child or children as the father should, by his will, give, direct, limit and appoint, the power was held to be substantially executed by a devise by the father to trustees to sell, and an appointment of the money produced by the sale. The master of the rolls said, it having been decided that a power to charge included a power to sell, it would be difficult to maintain that a power to give did not include a power to sell for the purpose of giving the money instead of the land.

In the case of Winston v. Jones, &c., 6 Alab. R. 550, the will was in many of its features like the one here, and the question whether a power of sale was given, was considered in immediate reference to its bearing on the rights and responsibilities of the purchaser. The decision in that case is, therefore, more directly applicable to the state of things in this. The will in that case, after providing for the payment of the testator's debts, and giving one-third of the real estate to his wife for life, proceeds: "Now it is my will and desire that after the payment of all my just debts and allotting to my wife her portion, to add to the residue of my estate of every description, the sum of one dollar value of property conveyed in trust for the use of my daughter Sarah W. Washington, and to divide the sum total, after making such addition, into seven parts; and I do hereby direct my executors to distribute and pay over the residue of my estate, both real and personal, in the following manner, to wit: After *deducting from one of said seven parts the said sum of one dollar conveyed for the use of my daughter Sarah W. Washington, to pay over to said trustees the residue of said portion to be held by them in like trust for her use, &c., and to pay to my other children (naming them) each one-seventh part of the residue of my estate as aforesaid," &c.

The executors sold a tract of land belonging to the estate of the testator, and received the purchase money; but having delayed to make the conveyance, the purchaser filed his bill seeking to rescind the contract, and for general relief, mainly on the ground that the will did not confer on the executors the power of making sale of the real estate of their testator. The bill was dismissed by the chancellor on demurrer; and the court of appeals affirmed his decree.

The court held that no precise form of words was necessary to the creation of a power of sale: If the intention to confer the power was apparent, to enable the executor to execute the trusts of the will, it would be inferred. They said that the use of the terms adds to the residue of his estate of every description the sum of one dollar, &c.; and after making such addition, to divide the sum total into seven parts, and to distribute and pay over the residue of the estate, both real and personal, &c., was persuasive that the prevailing idea in the testator's mind was, that of a sum of money which might be added to, divided and paid over. It ought not to be overlooked (they further said) in construing the will, that an entire plantation is more valuable as a whole, than the aggregate of all its parts would be if divided; and that the process of selling land so circumstanced, for the purpose of more equal distribution, is common in the country; the power being lodged with the County court, and with which all persons were familiar. The probability, therefore, *was, that the testator was merely providing by his will for doing that which he knew would be done on application to the County court.

Much of the reasoning on which the decision in that case was rested, is, I think, applicable to this. And whilst there are no terms employed in the clause of the will under consideration, which, in their ordinary sense, negative the idea of a distribution of the estate in kind, the terms "to dispose of to each of my children in any way she may think proper and right," are, I think, sufficiently broad to confer a discretionary power not only in respect to the shares and proportions in which the estate is to be distributed, and the act or instrument by which it is to pass, but also to the kind, form or nature of the property which may be given; as whether real estate or personal chattels, or the proceeds of both or either, in the shape of bonds or money. That these terms were designed to confer such a power is, I think, rendered more probable when they are read in connection with the terms "knowing that she will distribute to each of my children in as full and fair a manner as I could."

It has been held, that when the intention is clear, a power may enable the disposition of a fee, although no words of inheritance are used; as where a testator gives a power to sell lands, the donee may sell the inheritance, because the testator gives the same power he himself had. 1 Sugd. on Powers 501. This was decided in the case of Lief v. Saltingstone, 1 Mod. R. 189. The devise was to the testator's wife for life, "and by her to be disposed of to such of my children as she shall think fit." It was held by one of the judges, that the wife had power to dispose of an estate for life only, because if the testator had said, I dispose of it to my son, it would have been but an estate for life: But a majority of the court held otherwise, as there was a difference (they said) between the devise *of an interest and a power; and they granted that if the testator had said, I dispose of it to my son, it would have been but for life; but here the testator gives a power to dispose, which seems to imply such a power as he himself had, which was to dispose of the fee. Ibid. 503.

It is true, there is no question here as to the quantity of estate, or whether for fee or for life, which may be given under the power; yet the reasoning upon which the decision in the foregoing case is founded, seems to me to be not without force as applied to this. When the testator, in clothing his wife with such broad powers, as must be conceded under any reasonable construction of the clause in question, employs language susceptible of a construction which (without violence to the ordinary import of the words) would carry the power of sale, and this too, in close connection and association with the idea of his own power and control over the estate, it would seem to be in accordance with the spirit and reasoning of the foregoing case to hold, that he designed to make his own power and control the measure or standard of that which he was conferring on the wife, subject only to the restriction already mentioned; that in conferring such a broad discretion, he did not mean to withhold a power which might be so essential to its proper exercise, to wit, a power to bestow the gifts in such shape as would, in the judgment of his wife, probably be most advantageous to the several objects of his bounty.

Whether the third and fourth clauses of the will are to be taken as restrictions on the powers of the wife in respect to the shares or proportions in which the estate is to be distributed, and as requiring that ultimate equality is to be the rule of such distribution, is a question which, in the view I take of the case, it is not necessary for us to decide. I think it clear, that in making provision for the manner in which the estate *should be apportioned in the event his wife should die without making or publishing her last will and testament," the testator did not mean to point to such last will or testament as the only instrument or means by which his wife might dispose of his intended bounty. It is true, that the express grant of a power as to the disposition of the estate which the donee would have had, without such express grant, has in many cases been taken as indicative of an intention to confine the donee to that power, on the ground that such express grant would otherwise be supererogatory. But to give the will such a construction here, would be to destroy that scheme of placing the wife in his stead; of conferring on her a parental control, and clothing her with the power and means of advancing the interests of the children, as and when they might in her judgment require aid and assistance, which is so obvious on reading the whole will.

It is to be observed too, that the power to make the appointment by last will and testament is not given in express and direct terms; and if that was the only mode of appointment in the mind of the testator, it is difficult to suppose that he would not have given more prominence to a provision so directly in conflict with the otherwise apparent general intention of the will.

In the case of Grace v. Wilson, the inference in favor of restricting the appointment to a devise was far stronger than here; and yet it was held that the power was general. In that case Thomas Grace by his will gave to his wife Mary Grace four thousand pounds, or whatever surplus might arise after the moiety left to his two minor children, subject to a proviso therein contained (that is to say) that she should enjoy the interest thereof for her natural life, and dispose of the same to such of her children as she should devise and think proper. It was insisted that the power was confined to a will. In favor of the Dighton, 1 P. Wms. 149, and other cases were relied on, and the case was distinguished from Doe v. Thornley, 10 East's R. 438; and the case was decided accordingly. Sir William Grant was clearly of opinion that the power was not confined to a will. If the devise had been to her for life, and then to devise as she might think proper (he said), then the word devise would have admitted but of one sense; but here it is, as she shall dispose, which admits of two constructions, and thus means as she should think right. Suppose you translate devise, as she shall bequeath by will; how then would it read? To dispose thereof as she shall bequeath by will and think proper; therefore she has a general power.

I have taken the statement of the case from Sugden on Powers, vol. 1, p. 271. Take the language of the will here providing for the event of the wife's dying without a will in connection with the preceding clause, and the inference of a general power from the whole, is much more obvious than in the case just cited.

If the views I have already presented be correct, little remains to be considered in order to dispose of the only other question in the case necessary to be decided, viz: Whether the purchaser is bound to see to the application of the purchase money. For even upon the supposition that the testator designed ultimate equality in the gifts to his children (as to which I express no opinion), the wife is left free to sell the estate if she thinks proper, and to make advancements to the children in money or property, from time to time, as she in her discretion may deem best. I know of no rule which would involve the purchaser in the performance of a trust so broad and complicated, and requiring such a time for its final consummation. The general rule is, I think, clearly the other way; for when the trusts are defined, and yet the money is not merely to be paid over to third persons, but is 467 to be *applied by the trustees to certain purposes, which require, on their part, time, deliberation and discretion, it seems that the purchaser is not bound to see to the due application of the purchase money. As where it is to pay all debts which shall be ascertained within eighteen months after the sale; or where the trustees are to lay out the money in the funds, or in the purchase of other lands on certain trusts. 2 Story Equ. Jur. § 1134.

Upon the whole, it seems to me not only that a sale of the real estate, followed by an appointment of the proceeds thereof to the children, should be sustained by a court of equity as a substantial execution of the powers under the will, in accordance with the principles declared in the cases of Roberts v. Dixall, Long v. Long, and Kenworthy v. Bate, but that upon the payment of the purchase money by Levisay to Mrs. Steele, he would stand discharged of all other duty; and on receiving the conveyance which she has stipulated to make, he would be invested with a title to the land he has purchased, which would be available to him as well at law as in equity.

I think, therefore, that Levisay has shown no case for the interposition or aid of a court of equity; and that the decree rendered should be reversed, and the bill dismissed: But as the questions raised by the bill are not free from doubt, it should be dismissed, on the terms of the plaintiff's paying only his own costs.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Daniel, J.

This was an appeal from a decree of the Circuit court of Wood county, rendered in September 1851 in a cause in which John James was plaintiff and Charles P. Bailey was defendant.

In the year 1797 or 1798 John James the elder purchased from Joseph Spencer a tract of between seven hundred and eight hundred acres of land in Wood county, and received a title bond for the title. He died, as the bill alleges, in or about 1800, leaving three children and heirs, of whom each was entitled to one-seventh of the land. On the 8th of July 1803, John Gillispie and Esther his wife, who was one of the heirs, entered into an agreement to sell to John James, another of the heirs, their interest in the estate *of John James the elder, in consideration of eighty dollars. And on the 19th of January 1804, James purchased of Seth Bailey and Mary his wife, another of the heirs, their interest, for the price of one hundred and sixty dollars. The wives of Gillispie and Seth Bailey signed the instruments evidencing the contracts; but there seems to have been no regular conveyance or privy examination, and the contracts could only be effectual in transferring the life interests of the husbands. John James the younger resided in Ohio, and was there visited by the appellant his nephew, who, on the 31st of July 1832, entered into a contract with him for the purchase of his interest as heir, and the interests he had acquired under the executory contracts aforesaid with Gillispie and wife and Seth Bailey and wife. The agreement executed by James to Bailey recites, amongst other things, that for and in consideration of three hundred dollars in hand paid he sells all his right, title, claim and demand in said land, being the land sold to John James by Joseph Spencer, and descended to and acquired by John James, one undivided seventh as a child and heir of John James the elder, and two other undivided sevenths, by purchase from Gillispie and wife and Bailey and wife; and he further covenanted to give the appellant immediate possession of the land; and authorized him to acquire the legal title to the land, by virtue of Spencer's bond, from his heirs.

On the same day, the appellant executed his bond to James for three hundred dollars, with a condition reciting the purchase in nearly the same terms as the agreement; and with a further provision, that if the appellant should not succeed in setting aside a decree obtained in the County court of Wood in the name of Joseph Spencer against John James' heirs, and should not succeed in acquiring the legal title from the heirs of Spencer, then the obligation to be void; but if he *should succeed, then to be valid. The agreements with Gillispie and wife and Seth Bailey and wife seem to have been delivered to the appellant, as he filed them as part of his exhibits with his answer in another suit brought against him by Gillispie and wife, heard together with the present case.

In some short time after the sale and transfer as aforesaid to the appellant, Gillispie and wife brought suit against the appellant and the heirs of John James, asserting their right to their one-seventh of the land; and alleging that the contract between them and John James was executed when they were both under age. The appellant answered, insisting on the right, acquired by his purchase from John James; and furthermore contending that if the con-

On the 8th of July 1803, John Gillispie and Esther his wife, who was one of the heirs, entered into an agreement to sell to John James, another of the heirs, their interest in the estate *of John James the elder, in consideration of eighty dollars. The agreement executed by James to Bailey recites, amongst other things, that for and in consideration of three hundred dollars in hand paid he sells all his right, title, claim and demand in said land, being the land sold to John James by Joseph Spencer, and descended to and acquired by John James, one undivided seventh as a child and heir of John James the elder, and two other undivided sevenths, by purchase from Gillispie and wife and Bailey and wife; and he further covenanted to give the appellant immediate possession of the land; and authorized him to acquire the legal title to the land, by virtue of Spencer's bond, from his heirs.

On the same day, the appellant executed his bond to James for three hundred dollars, with a condition reciting the purchase in nearly the same terms as the agreement; and with a further provision, that if the appellant should not succeed in setting aside a decree obtained in the County court of Wood in the name of Joseph Spencer against John James' heirs, and should not succeed in acquiring the legal title from the heirs of Spencer, then the obligation to be void; but if he *should succeed, then to be valid. The agreements with Gillispie and wife and Seth Bailey and wife seem to have been delivered to the appellant, as he filed them as part of his exhibits with his answer in another suit brought against him by Gillispie and wife, heard together with the present case.

In some short time after the sale and transfer as aforesaid to the appellant, Gillispie and wife brought suit against the appellant and the heirs of John James, asserting their right to their one-seventh of the land; and alleging that the contract between them and John James was executed when they were both under age. The appellant answered, insisting on the right, acquired by his purchase from John James; and furthermore contending that if the contract should be annulled, the complainants asking equity should be compelled to refund the eighty dollars paid by James, which he, being substituted to the place of his vendor, would be entitled to receive.

About the same time or shortly after Gillispie and wife instituted their suit, the bill in this case was filed by the appellee against the appellant, in which, after setting out the contract between himself and the appellant, and averring that the decree referred to in the bond and agreement had been rendered inoperative, and though no deed had been made by Spencer's heirs, yet possession had been held under the title bond for thirty-five years, which was supposed to be a good title; he charges that the appellant does not intend to attempt to get a deed, but held and enjoyed the land and refused to pay the three hundred dollars or cancel the contract. The bill asked that the contract be rescinded on the ground of fraud, or because of the failure of the appellant to comply with it; or if it could not be rescinded, that the land should be subjected to the payment of the purchase money.

The appellant in his answer admits 471 that he was in *possession of the land, but resisted payment for it, because as he alleged, Spencer's heirs were seeking to subject the land to the payment of purchase money said to be due by John James the elder; and also upon the ground that Gillispie and wife and Seth Bailey and wife refused to confirm the sales of their undivided interests aforesaid: And he denied the right of the court to rescind the contract.

The cause, together with the cause of Gillispie and wife, came on to be heard together on the 17th of February 1847; and it appearing that the suit instituted by Spencer's representatives had been dismissed on the 25th of March 1846, a copy of the decree dismissing the said suit being filed as an exhibit, whereby the decree in favor of Spencer's representatives could not be enforced; but it further appearing that the appellee could make no title to the share of Gillispie and wife, because in that suit, heard at the same time, the court had annulled their sale, upon the ground of infancy, the court gave the appellant his election to rescind the contract, or pay the entire purchase money. Upon his failure to elect to rescind, the court directed the sale of the one-seventh, the share of said John James, for the payment of the entire purchase money. The land was sold; and upon the report of the sale, a decree was rendered against the appellant for three hundred dollars, with interest from the date of the contract, to be credited by the net proceeds of sale. From this decree the appellant has appealed.

Price, for the appellant.

Fry, for the appellee.

ALLEN, P., after stating the case, proceeded:

It is objected by the appellant's counsel that the court erred in not decreeing a deed from the vendor to the vendee. The vendor had not the legal title. This 472 *was known to the vendee, and the vendor merely sold his equitable interest under the title bond, and authorized and empowered the vendee to acquire the legal title from Spencer's heirs. The obligation devolved on the appellant to institute proper proceedings to get in the legal title if he had deemed it of any importance to him. He was no doubt content to rest on the title bond executed more than fifty years prior to the final decree in this cause, and the possession held under it by himself and those under whom he claimed. His default in not getting in the legal title furnishes him with no protection against the payment of the purchase money.

As to the decree referred to in the condition of the bond, it appears from the decrees in this case and the case of Gillispie and wife against the appellant and others, that the said decree has been rendered inoperative by the decree of the same court of the 25th of March 1846, in the case of Spencer's administrators and heirs against John James, &c.

It is further insisted, that the appellant purchased three-sevenths of the land, and gets but one-seventh. That Seth Bailey and wife have not conveyed; and that Gillispie and wife have, by the decree rendered in their favor, annulled their contract of sale to the appellee, on the ground of infancy. The appellee agreed to sell all his right, title and interest in and to three undivided seventh parts of said land, one being his own undivided equitable interest as an heir. The other two undivided interests he claimed by purchase as aforesaid; and the contracts of purchase were delivered over to the appellant, and are filed by him as evidence of the interests he acquired in the land, with his answer to the bill of Gillispie and wife. He saw, therefore, when he contracted, the extent of his vendor's interest. He required and received no covenant of warranty. He knew, or is 473 presumed to have known, *that the contracts of the husbands would not pass the equitable estates of their wives, and that they were effectual only to pass the life estates of the husbands. He agreed to pay for the absolute interest of James, as heir, to one-seventh, and these interests acquired by the contracts with Gillispie and S. Bailey, a specific sum.

The contract was entire, and there is nothing on the face thereof from which it can be ascertained at what price the different interests were valued. In relation to the one-seventh, the interest of John James, there is no dispute or controversy. Nor is it shown that the appellant has not obtained all that he was entitled to under the contract with S. Bailey and wife. It does not appear that the validity of this contract has been impeached, or that the appellant has been disturbed in the enjoyment of what the contract vested in John James, and which the latter sold to him. Seth Bailey and wife, by the contract of January 1804, merely sold and relinquished their equitable interest to the appellee; nor did the latter, by his agreement, covenant with the appellant that they should make any further conveyance. But in regard to Gillispie, though there was no covenant or warranty as to the title of the thing contracted to be sold, there was an implied undertaking on the part of the appellee that the contract of Gillispie was what it purported to be, a contract by a party who was competent to enter into and bind himself by such contract. In this it appears he was mistaken. Gillispie has succeeded, by the decree of the court, in vacating and annulling the contract, upon the ground of infancy; and the appellant thereby loses the life interest of said Gillispie in the subject for which he contracted to pay the appellee the sum of three hundred dollars. For this cause he would have been entitled to call for a rescission of the contract. But instead 474 of resorting to this course, he resisted *all efforts of the appellee to procure a rescission; and he did this, with full knowledge of the pretensions of Gillispie. He purchased from the appellee on the 31st of July 1832. The bill of Gillispie was filed on the 3d of June 1833. He was then apprised of the difficulty as to this interest. He had then paid no part of the purchase money. Instead of abandoning his claim, he insisted in his answer upon the validity of the transfer in the first instance, or that, from long acquiescence, it could not be then impeached; but in the event of his being mistaken in these views, he claimed the right to recover from Gillispie the consideration paid to him for the sale of his interest by the said John James.

In a short time after the institution of the said suit by Gillispie, the appellee filed his bill, mainly for the purpose of rescinding the contract; but this was resisted by the appellant; and when, in February 1847, the cause was heard, the court, by its interlocutory decree, gave the appellant the election to rescind the contract, or to pay the purchase money. In this case no fraud is imputed to the appellee. It is nowhere pretended that he knew Gillispie was an infant in 1803, when he sold to the appellee, or when the latter transferred his interest to the appellant in 1832. On the contrary, he had a right, from the long silence of Gillispie, to presume that the transfer was valid. But the mutual error of the parties, in the substance of the thing contracted for, was a good ground for rescinding the contract; and if the appellant had sought such rescission when the knowledge of the mistake was first acquired, or consented to it when the appellee filed his bill for that purpose so soon after the sale, the parties could have been placed in statu quo, without injury to either, so far as the record discloses. But he resisted a rescission, and even so late as 1847; and when the election was tendered to him, he still 475 *declined it: He cannot now be permitted to claim a partial rescission.

The contract was entire; an agreement to pay a gross sum for the interests transferred; and he has no right to rescind one-third of the contract, and enforce the residue. Glassel v. Thomas, 3 Leigh 113. There is no middle ground here between a rescission in toto and an execution in toto. But the record shows a sufficient motive for his not desiring a rescission. In the suit of Gillispie, he claimed to be substituted to the rights of the appellee, and as such, entitled to a decree against Gillispie for the price paid to him by the appellee for his interest in the land; and the court, upon vacating Gillispie's release, decreed he should refund the consideration with interest, subject to a deduction for rents and profits. The consideration, with interest from 1803, would, in all probability, have much exceeded the value of Gillispie's life estate in the subject. The appellant may have rested satisfied that the existence of this claim would either induce Gillispie to forego the assertion of his right to the subject, or would more than indemnify him for the price he agreed to pay to the appellee for this particular interest. In truth, it would seem from the record that the appellant was rather disposed to raise up objections to his own title, so long as they would avail him to resist the claim of his vendor for payment. It does not appear that he instituted any proceedings to set aside Spencer's decree; and it was not until the dismissal of the bill filed by Spencer's administrators that said decree was ascertained to be inoperative. He took no steps to procure a legal title from Spencer's heirs. He refused to rescind, though apprised at an early day, of the mistake as to Gillispie's interest. He has availed himself of his right, as representing his vendor, to repel the claim of Gillispie until he shall refund the price he received from John James, 476 *with the long arrears of interest. In the mean time, he has held all he contracted for, and enjoyed the profits. I think the court properly required him to pay the purchase money when he declined to rescind the contract.

It is further argued, that the court erred in giving interest on the three hundred dollars from the date of the contract; that it was not payable but upon a contingency which has never happened. The contract recites that it was in consideration of three hundred dollars in hand paid; and the bond was payable presently, though a condition was attached, in the nature of a defeasance, upon a certain contingency. The appellee bound himself, by the contract of sale, to give immediate possession; and the appellant, by his answer, admits that he was in possession. He has enjoyed the profits, and in equity should pay interest on the price contracted to be paid: and that, it seems to me, is the effect of the bond and agreement. The latter shows a cash sale, and the bond admits an existing debt due presently, but liable to be defeated in the event of his failure to set aside the decree or get a title. It seems to me that interest was properly allowed from the date of the contract.

I am for affirming the decree.

MONCURE and LEE, Js., concurred in the opinion of Allen, J.

SAMUELS, J., dissented.

Decree affirmed.

5. Same—Fraud in Procurement—Effect on Holder.—

If the evidence raises a suspicion of fraud in the procurement of the note, then the holder is bound to show that he gave value for it.

6. Same—Failure of Consideration—Liability of Maker.

—Bill by maker of a negotiable note against payee, endorser and holder for value to enjoin its payment on the ground of failure of consideration. As between the maker, payee and endorser, it appears the consideration of the note had wholly failed, and that the payee had endorsed it, without consideration, as a gift to the endorser. Though the maker is bound to pay the note to the holder, he is entitled to recover the amount so paid from the payee; or upon his inability to pay, to recover of the endorser the amount received by him for the note.

In June 1848 Noah L. Wilson filed his bill in the Circuit court of Wood county, in which he alleged that on the 26th of September 1837 Enoch Rector of that county sold and conveyed, with general warranty, to the plaintiff and John Mills one undivided fourth of certain lands and lots in the county of Washington in the state of Ohio; and that for one moiety of the 478 purchase *money, amounting to two thousand one hundred and eighty-seven dollars and fifty cents, the plaintiff executed to Rector his note, bearing date the 1st day of January 1838, payable ten years thereafter, and bearing three per centum per annum interest. That shortly afterwards, Rector, without any consideration, but intending it as a gift, assigned the said note to certain persons, trustees of Rector college, an institution located in Taylor county in Virginia, all the parties to this assignment then living in this state, and the same having been made here; and that ¶Same—Fraud in Procurement—Effect on Holder.—Although the general rule is that the holder of the negotiable note, regular upon its face, is presumed to have acquired it before maturity for value and without notice of any infirmity in the paper, yet if the maker or party primarily liable for its payment, or any party bound by the original consideration, proves that it was obtained by fraud or illegality in its inception, or if the circumstances raise a strong suspicion of fraud or illegality, the burden of proof is shifted, and the holder of the note must show that he acquired it bona fide for value in the usual course of business while current, and under circumstances which create no presumption that he knew of the facts which impeach its validity. Piedmont Bk. v. Hatcher, 94 Va. 231, 26 S. E. Rep. 505, citing the principal case; Vathir v. Zane, 6 Gratt. 246; Duerson v. Alsop, 27 Gratt. 248. See also, the principal case cited in Fant v. Miller, 17 Gratt. 58; foot-note to Duerson v. Alsop, 27 Gratt. 280.

Same—Rights of Bona Fide Holder.—The well-established rule of law is, that a bona fide holder of negotiable paper, who purchased it for value in the ordinary course of business before maturity and without notice of facts, which impeach its validity between antecedent parties, has title thereto unaffected by such facts and may recover on such note, although as between such antecedent parties it is without legal validity. Bk. v. Johns, 22 W. Va. 534, citing among others the principal case; Vathir v. Zane, 6 Gratt. 246; Davis v. Miller, 14 Gratt. 1.

these trustees had since assigned the note to William Lazier.

The bill further charged, that previous to the conveyance to the plaintiff and Mills, Rector had mortgaged the property to the Ohio life and trust company; and in a suit by that company in the state of Ohio to foreclose the mortgage, all the property had been decreed to be sold, and part of it had been sold under the decree, and the whole of it would be required to be sold to satisfy the mortgage debt; so that the consideration of the note had wholly failed. And it was further alleged that Rector was insolvent.

The bill made Rector, Lazier and the trustees of Rector college defendants; called upon them to state the consideration Rector had received for the assignment of the note, and what was the consideration which the plaintiff had received for it. And the prayer of the bill was that the contract for the sale of the land might be rescinded; that the note might be delivered up to be canceled; and for general relief.

Lazier answered the bill. He stated that he purchased the note of Wright and Baldwin for a full, valuable consideration: That they were house carpenters, and had built Rector college, and received the note, in part payment of their bill, from the trustees. That he had afterwards endorsed it, and passed it off; but when it became due, he had been sued upon it, 479 *and had paid it with the interest and costs. That he had no knowledge whatever of the transactions between Wilson and Rector and Rector and the trustees of the college. That he was a purchaser for value, without notice of any equity, want of consideration, or any other fact or circumstance connected with said note, until some time after he had purchased it. And he alleged that the note was made and delivered to Rector in Ohio; and that by the laws of Ohio it was a negotiable instrument, and to be governed by the law merchant.

Rector also answered, and alleged that the note was given upon a compromise between himself and the plaintiff and Mills, with a full knowledge, on their part, of the existence of the mortgage on the property. He states that he never received any value for the note. The bill was taken for confessed as to the trustees of Rector college.

There was no evidence but the answer of Rector, that the consideration of the note was the land in Ohio. If that was the consideration it had wholly failed. The note was dated at Marietta in Ohio, and was payable generally to the order of Rector; and Wilson the maker lived at the time, and continued to live, in Marietta. It did not appear, except from the answer of Rector, upon what terms he assigned it to the trustees of Rector college.

It was also shown that Wright and Baldwin built the college, and the note was assigned to them by the trustees, by endorsement on the back thereof. It was proved that they stated they had sold the note to Lazier; and there was in the record a deed by which the trustees conveyed the college property in trust, that if Lazier failed, upon the use of due diligence, to recover the amount of the note from Wilson or Rector, the property should be sold, and Lazier should be paid the sum of one thousand three hundred dollars, 480 with six *per centum interest thereon from the 30th of September 1839 until paid; that being the amount they had received for the note. These statements of Wright and Baldwin, and the deed from the trustees, were excepted to by the plaintiff as incompetent evidence.

There was also in the record the copy of an act of the legislature of the state of Ohio, by which all notes for a sum certain, and payable to order, were made negotiable. The first section will be found in the opinion of Judge Daniel. The copy of the act was certified by the secretary of state of Ohio, under the great seal of the state, as being correctly copied from the original rolls then on file in his office.

When the cause came on to be heard, the court dismissed the bill as to all the parties but Rector, and gave the plaintiff a decree against him for the amount of the note, with three per cent. per annum interest. And thereupon Wilson applied to this court for an appeal, which was allowed.

Price, for the appellant.

Grattan, for the appellee Lazier.

DANIEL, J. I do not perceive any ground for the objection made to the authentication of the copies of the statutes of the state of Ohio, filed by the appellee Lazier. The act of congress, approved March 27, 1804, declares that all records and exemplifications of office books, which may be kept in any public office of any state, not appertaining to a court, shall be proved or admitted in any other court or office in any other state, by the attestation of the keeper of said records or books, and the seal of his office thereto annexed, if there be a seal, together with a certificate of the presiding justice of the county or district in which such office may be kept; or of the governor, the secretary of state, the chancellor, or the keeper of 481 *the great seal of the state, that the said attestation is in due form, and by the proper officer. And if the said certificate be given by the governor, the secretary of state, the chancellor or keeper of the great seal, it shall be under the great seal of the state in which the said certificate is made. Story's Laws of the U. S. vol. 2, 947-8. And we have the certificate of the secretary of state of the state of Ohio, under the great seal of the state, stating that the said acts "are correctly copied from the original rolls now on file in this (his) office."

From this certificate it appears that the secretary of state is himself also the keeper of the rolls. If the offices had been separate, his certificate of the attestation of the keeper of the rolls would, plainly, under the provisions of the law, have been sufficient, without any additional certificate by the governor. I do not see how the fact that he happens to hold both offices, detracts at all from the efficacy of his certificate as secretary of state.

By the first section of the first of the above mentioned acts, all bonds, promissory notes, bills of exchange, foreign or inland, drawn for any sum or sums of money certain, and made payable to any person, or order, &c., are placed on the footing of negotiable paper. The note for two thousand one hundred and eighty-seven dollars and fifty cents is dated "Marietta." In the deed from Rector to Mills and Wilson, of the 29th of September 1837, the two latter are described as of Marietta, Washington county, Ohio. And the witness Murdock in his deposition states that he has been acquainted with Wilson for some ten years, and during that time, had always understood, that his residence was in the town of Marietta in the state of Ohio. The evidence is, therefore, I think, ample to show that the note was executed

482 in Ohio; *and by the laws of that state, as we have seen, it stands on the footing of a negotiable instrument.

Such being the lex loci contractus, the note must be treated as negotiable paper here: For it seems to be well settled that a negotiable note, made in a particular country, is to be deemed a note governed by the law of that country, whether it is expressly made payable there or is payable generally, without naming any particular place; since at most, under the latter circumstances, it is as much payable in that country as elsewhere. Hence such a note makes the maker liable only according to the law of the country where the note is executed, although endorsed in another country; and his liabilities, and so also his rights; as for example, the right to set up equitable defences against the note, if allowed by the country where the note is executed, are regulated by the law of the same country. Story on Promissory Notes, § 172.

Lazier must be presumed to be prima facie a holder for value. Story on Promissory Notes, § 196. "The owner of a bill is entitled to recover upon it, if he came to it honestly; that fact is implied, prima facie, by possession; and to meet the inference so raised, fraud, felony or some such matter, must be proved." Extract from the Opinion of Lord Denman in Arbouin v. Anderson, 1 Ad. & Ellis N. R. 498, 504, 41 Eng. C. L. R. 642, cited in note to foregoing section. Vathir v. Zane, 6 Gratt. 266, opinion of Allen, J. Upon the supposition, however, that the establishment of want or failure of the consideration would make it incumbent upon the holder to show that he had given value for the note, no such matter is established here as against Lazier. In his answer, he denies all knowledge whatever of the transactions between Wilson and Rector. He avers that he is an innocent purchaser for a full, fair and valuable consideration, without any notice whatever of any 483 equity, want of consideration, *or any other fact or circumstance connected with the note, until some time after he had purchased. The statements in the bill, and the admissions in the answer of Rector as to the contract on which the note was founded, furnish no proof against Lazier. As to him there seems to be the entire absence of any competent evidence to show what was the origin of the note.

Even, however, if there were evidence competent and plenary, as against Lazier, to show a failure of the consideration of the note, I should still hold that he was not bound to prove that he paid value for it. There is no evidence of fraud in the origin or negotiation of the note; and the mere failure of consideration does not impose on the innocent holder the onus of showing the consideration he gave for the note. In a note to Chitty on Bills, 10th American edition, p. 648, we have a report of the case of Whitaker v. Edmonds, 1 Mood. & Rob. 366. In that case, Patterson, judge, said, "Since the decision of Heath v. Sansom, 2 Bar. & Adol. 291, 22 Eng. C. L. R. 78, the consideration of the judges has been a good deal called to the subject; and the prevalent opinion among them is, that the courts have of late gone too far in restricting the negotiability of bills and notes. If indeed the defendant can show that there has been something of fraud in the previous steps of the transfer of the instrument, that throws upon the plaintiff the necessity of showing under what circumstances he became possessed of it. So far, I accede to the case of Heath v. Sansom; for there were in that case circumstances raising a suspicion of fraud: but if I added on that occasion, that even independently of those circumstances of suspicion, the holder would have been bound to show the consideration which he gave for the bill, merely because there was 484 an absence of consideration as between the *previous parties to the bill, I am now decidedly of opinion that such doctrine was incorrect."

And in Knight v. Pugh, 4 Watts & Sergeant 445, the authorities are fully examined and reviewed, and the rule stated to be, that in a suit against the maker, by an endorsee, the plaintiff cannot be called upon to prove that he paid value for the note, until the defendant has shown it was obtained or put in circulation by fraud or undue means. In the opinion of Sergeant, judge, it is conceded that the rule at one time obtained of allowing the defendant on proving that he received no consideration, to call upon the plaintiff to show the consideration he gave for the note; but he proceeds to show that the latest authorities exclude want of consideration in the note or subsequent failure, from the class of cases in which the defendant may call on the plaintiff to prove the consideration he paid. See Low v. Chifney, 27 Eng. C. L. R. 383.

There is nothing in Vathir v. Zane, 6 Gratt. 246, decided by the court, or intimated by any of the judges in conflict with these authorities. The proposition there decided, is, that when fraud in the procurement of the note is averred and proved, the maker has brought himself within the exception to the general rule; that the onus probandi is then shifted, and thrown on the holder to show he has paid value.

In this view of the law the exclusion of the declarations of Wright and Baldwin, in reference to the transfer of the note, could not affect the case, so far as Lazier is concerned, no ground being laid for requiring him to prove what consideration he paid for the note. The court below has therefore, I think, very properly refused any relief against the note in the hands of Lazier.

As between the maker and the payee of the note, however, the want of consideration or subsequent *failure is a proper defense, and the equities between them are not lost or destroyed by the transfer of the note: As between Wilson and Rector, the testimony is ample to show that there has been an entire failure of the consideration for which the note was given, the whole of the land in payment of the purchase money of which it was executed, having been absorbed by a paramount incumbrance.

In this state of things the principles decided in the cases of Dade's adm'r v. Madison, 5 Leigh 401, and Pettit v. Jennings, 2 Rob. R. 676, would seem fully to sanction such a decree as has been rendered by the Circuit court in favor of Wilson against Rector. In the first mentioned case, an order was drawn by Dade on Madison in favor of Tankersly, and accepted by Madison. Tankersly having obtained a judgment at law on the order against Madison, the latter enjoined the judgment, on the ground that the order and acceptance were founded on a gaming consideration. Dade, in his answer, admitted that the order was drawn by him for money which he had won of Madison at cards; and he said that Tankersly was apprised of the consideration and took the order at his own risk. Tankersly denied all knowledge of the transactions between Dade and Madison, in consideration of which the order was drawn; averred that he had given Dade an adequate valuable consideration for it; and that Madison accepted it without hesitation or objection, and had obtained indulgence from time to time, on promise of payment. There was no evidence as between Madison and Tankersly to establish that the order was founded on a gaming consideration, unless the answer of Dade could be used against Tankersly.

This court held that the answer of Dade was no evidence against Tankersly; and there being a failure to show, by any testimony competent, as against him, 486 *that there was any vice in the consideration of the order, Tankersly was permitted to execute his judgment against Madison. But the court also held that the Circuit court had properly rendered a decree over in favor of Madison against Dade, of which Madison should be permitted to avail himself as soon as he satisfied the judgment in favor of Tankersly.

In the second case (Pettit v. Jennings), the same principles were reaffirmed. In an injunction suit by the obligor in a gaming security against the obligee and an assignee, the gaming consideration was admitted by the obligee in his answer, but there was no competent proof against the assignee. The assignee was permitted to recover, but the obligor was indemnified by a decree over against the obligee. The grounds for such relief are forcibly stated by Judge Baldwin in his opinion. "When a failure of proof (he says) as to the assignee on a supervening equity between him and the obligor, induces a court of equity to enforce the security in behalf of the assignee, or, what is in effect the same, to suffer it to be enforced; then the court ought to proceed, if the subject and parties be properly before it, to administer the justice of the case as between the obligor and the obligee. The latter having by his contract of assignment appropriated to himself the avails of the security, and being enabled to retain them, by the act of the court, which relieves him incidentally from all responsibility to his assignee, the result is, when the security shall have been enforced against the obligor, that the obligee has obtained from him in substance, though not in form, by means of a compulsory proceeding, satisfaction of a debt destitute of consideration, and denounced by the law: but the subject and the parties are still before the court, and I am at a loss to conceive upon what principle the 487 court can refuse *redress to the obligor against the obligee." So here, the whole foundation on which the note rested, having been swept away by an entire failure of the consideration, it was a worthless paper, and liable to be canceled so long as it remained in the hands of Rector. By means of his transfer, and of the transfers of others claiming under him, the note has reached the hands of one who, from considerations of commercial policy favoring the negotiability and circulation of such instruments, is allowed, under the circumstances, to enforce it against the maker as a valid security. But Rector has thereby acquired no advantage which can avail him in a court of equity. Having voluntarily placed it out of his power to cancel the note, he is bound, in equity and good conscience, to place Wilson, as nearly as may be, in the position he occupied before the note was endorsed away. The measure of the indemnity is the amount that Wilson is bound to pay to Lazier, viz: the principal and interest of the note.

The decree in favor of Wilson against Rector is, therefore, I think, clearly right; but the court has, it seems to me, stopped short of giving to Wilson the whole relief to which he is entitled. It is alleged in the bill that Rector assigned or endorsed the note to the trustees of Rector college, without consideration; that he made a donation of said note to the college; and that the said trustees had transferred the note to Lazier. They have not answered, and the bill as to them has been taken as confessed; and from the deed executed by the trustees on the 11th November 1839, styling themselves Trustees of the Western Virginia Education Society, it is recited that Rector transferred the note to the said trustees; and that they, for the purpose of raising funds to erect the necessary buildings of said society, sold and transferred the said note *to James D. Wright and David Baldwin, and that Wright and Baldwin subsequently sold and transferred it to Lazier: And the said deed conveys property for the purpose of indemnifying and securing Lazier, in the event that he should fail, after using due diligence, to recover the debt from Wilson and Rector.

The want or failure of consideration in the note may be insisted upon as a defense, not only between the original parties to the contract, but also between the maker and one who claims under the payee without having given value for the note. Story on Promissory Notes, § 190. If the note were now in the possession of the society, they would have nothing to plead against its cancellation. The presumption which has stood to Lazier in the place of proof, and protected him as a bona fide holder for value, cannot be invoked by the society. They have not denied the positive allegation of the bill, that they acquired the note by donation. They have, by their own admission, sold and transferred the note, and have placed their endorsee in a position to enforce it. If permitted to retain the purchase money of the note to the prejudice of Wilson, they will in substance and effect have coerced him to pay to them the amount of a note against which, as between him and them, he had a valid defense. They may have parted with the note, and most probably did part with it, without any knowledge of the defect or failure in the consideration. But they gave nothing for the note, and to the extent that they have received value for it, they are in the receipt of money which they had no right, in equity, to collect. They are holding funds to which another in foro conscientiae has a better right. Rector is alleged and proved to be insolvent. The decree over against him will, therefore, in all probability, prove unavailing. In such an event, I do not perceive upon what grounds of equity his voluntary donee can claim to hold the funds which have been realized, in effect, by the collection of an instrument wholly void of consideration.

It seems to me that the society, in such a state of things, is bound to hand over to Wilson whatever they may have received as the price of the transfer of the note.

Upon the whole, I think the decree is right in all things except in dismissing the bill as to the Western Virginia education society. I am, therefore, for affirming the decree, so far as it refuses to relieve Wilson against the note in the hands of Lazier, and gives him a decree over against Rector; but for reversing, so far as it dismisses the bill against the society, and for remanding the cause for further proceedings with liberty to Wilson, on paying the amount of the note and interest to Lazier and on showing that the decree against Rector has proved unavailing, to apply for and have a decree against the society for the amount that they received as the price of the note, with its interest.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Daniel, J.

The decree was as follows:

The court is of the opinion that the appellee Lazier ought to be regarded as the bona fide endorsee for value of the note for two thousand one hundred and eighty-seven dollars and fifty cents, in the bill and proceedings mentioned, without notice of the failure of the consideration for which it was given, and that the said note, as between the said Lazier and the maker, the appellant Wilson, is a valid instrument, liable to be enforced against the said Wilson.

The court is further of opinion, that the testimony in the cause is competent and plenary to show, as between the said Wilson and the appellee Rector, that the consideration of the said note has entirely failed; and that if Rector still held it, it would be liable to be canceled at the suit of the said Wilson.

The court is further of opinion, that as the said Rector has endorsed the note and placed it in the power of his remote endorsee, the said Lazier, to enforce it as a valid instrument against the said Wilson, he is bound in equity to indemnify the latter by paying to him the principal and interest of the said note, whenever he the said Wilson shall have paid the same to the said Lazier.

The court is further of opinion, that as the trustees of Rector college obtained the said note from the said Rector, without having paid value therefor, and by way of donation from the said Rector, and have endorsed the same for a valuable consideration; and have by means of the said endorsement and of the subsequent endorsement of their endorsees, Wright and Baldwin, enabled Lazier to enforce the note against the said Wilson, the said Wilson has a right in equity, on showing that he has paid the same, and that he is unable to obtain the indemnity against the said Rector to which he is entitled, by reason of the insolvency of the latter, to recover of the said trustees of Rector college the price of their transfer of said note, with its interest.

The court is, therefore, of opinion to affirm the whole of the decree, except so much thereof as dismisses the bill against the said college, with costs to the said Lazier; and to reverse so much as dismisses the bill against the said college, with costs to the plaintiff in error against said college; and to remand the cause for further proceedings, with liberty to the said Wilson, on showing that he has paid the principal *and interest of the said note to the said Lazier, and that the decree in his favor against Rector has proved unavailing, to ask for and have a decree against the said trustees of Rector college for so much as they received from their endorsees Wright and Baldwin, as the price of their endorsement of said note to the latter.

Upon the application of the said Wilson to have the decree aforesaid, the trustees of the college may, if they can, show that they received less for their transfer than the nominal value of the said note; and in such event, the decree will be for such smaller sum, with its interest. But in case they fail to furnish such proof, the decree must be for such nominal value, and its interest.

July Term, 1854, Lewisburg.

1. Deeds of Trust—Outstanding Title—Duty of Trustee.

—Real estate is conveyed in trust to secure debts. The grantor in the deed has at the time but an equitable title, but is entitled to have the legal title. It is an abuse of his power by the trustee to sell the property before getting the legal title.

Rossett, by deed of trust dated the 12th of April 1844, conveyed certain real estate, consisting of a lot of ground with a brick house thereon, in the town of Ripley, in the county of Jackson, to Joseph Smith, in trust to secure the payment of two single bills, one to Andrew Wilson & Co. for forty-three dollars and seventy cents, dated the same day with the deed, and payable one year thereafter, with interest from the date, and the other to Henry J. Fisher, for one hundred and fifty-two dollars, dated the 2d of January 1844, and to indemnify Fisher as security for costs in the case of Hassler's lessee, &c. v. King. The deed provided that in case of default in the payment of the said debts and exoneration of said security in one year from the date of the deed, the trustee should sell the property for ready money, at public auction, before the front door of the court-house of Jackson county, and apply the proceeds to the satisfaction of the purposes of the trust. Rossett having made default, 493 the *trustee, at the request of Fisher, after giving thirty days' notice of the time, place and terms of sale, by causing an advertisement thereof to be posted at the door of the said court-house, did, on the 23d of June 1845, (that being the first day of a quarterly term of said county,) at the door of the said court-house, expose the said property to public sale for ready money, when the said Fisher, being the highest bidder, became the purchaser, at the price of two hundred dollars. And the property was accordingly conveyed to him by the trustee, who received the purchase money, and applied it to the purposes of the trust, and made a report of the sale according to law.

In July 1847 Rossett filed his bill in the Circuit court of said county, for the purpose of setting aside the said sale; stating in the said bill that for a short time previous to the expiration of the trust he had been in Pennsylvania for the purpose of raising money to discharge the debts secured by the deed, having left D. G. Morrill of Ripley as agent to attend to his business; that shortly before the expiration of the trust he forwarded, or caused to be forwarded, to his said agent, through the medium of the mail, a draft from the treasury department at Washington, on the 494 *then present; that late in the afternoon, near sundown, of the same day, when there were no bidders present, as complainant was advised, but the said Fisher, the sale was resumed, and no further bid being made, the property was cried out to Fisher at his said bid of two hundred dollars; the complainant's said agent being present and forbidding the sale. That the sum of two hundred dollars was a greatly inadequate price for the property, which was worth one thousand two hundred dollars; and complainant believed would have sold for the same, if it had not been represented to some who were anxious to purchase, that the sale would be postponed; and that Fisher had frequently, after the execution of the deed of trust and before the sale, made different offers for the property, greatly exceeding the price at which he purchased it, but complainant rejected them as inadequate. Other statements are contained in the bill, but it is unnecessary to notice them. Fisher, Smith the trustee, and Wilson & Co. were made defendants.

Commercial Bank of New York, for the sum of two hundred and twenty dollars, with directions to be applied towards the liquidation of the said debts; that the draft arrived at the post-office in Ripley two days before the day advertised for the sale of the property; but from some cause, either accidental or designed, the post-master neglected to hand the letter containing the draft to the said agent, although repeated applications were made therefor, until two days after the sale, when the agent received the draft and tendered it to Fisher, who refused to receive it. That when the property was exposed to sale Fisher bid two hundred dollars for it, and directed the sale to be suspended for the time

In August 1847 Fisher filed his answer, denying many, if not most, of the material allegations of the bill. He denies that the property, (the imperfect and dilapidated condition of which he minutely describes), could under any circumstances have been sold for as much as one thousand two hundred dollars; and attributes the sacrifice, if any, at which it was sold, to the fact that the sale was forbid by Rossett's agent, and also to the condition of the title at the time of the sale. In regard to the latter, he states, that Rossett had no deed for the property, and only incumbered his equitable right thereto, the legal title being in A. N. Kinnaird of Wood county, whose wife had and still has a claim of dower therein; "that it was very uncertain whether Kinnaird would make the deed or not; for if there is not now, there formerly was, a suit depending on the equity side of Jackson county Superior *court, brought by respondent 495 for Rossett against Kinnaird, to compel him to make this very deed; which suit or another similiar one had to be brought at the sale under the trust; all of which was well known to respondent, and it is believed also to most, if not all of the capitalists present at the sale; and it is believed most of the capitalists of Jackson county were present." He further states that after getting the trustee's deed, he turned his attention to getting in the legal title outstanding in Kinnaird; and on the 1st day of August 1845 drew a deed which was by him executed and acknowledged on the 4th day of September 1845, and came to respondent's hands some months thereafter, when it was placed on record. A copy of this deed is filed with the answer.

In October and November 1847 Wilson & Co. and the trustee Smith filed their respective answers. That of the former it is unnecessary to notice. The latter states in his answer that there was a large crowd at the sale; that at its commencement between 10 and 11 o'clock, D. G. Morrill, representing himself to be Rossett's agent, forbade the sale, which was disregarded, and the sale went on; that after getting two or three, or perhaps more bids, respondent suspended the sale until after dinner, when he recommenced it, and there being no other bid, was about to close the sale, when Morrill requested him to leave it open as long as he could; representing that a few, perhaps two or three days before, Rossett had gone to Point Pleasant, and would very likely be back before sundown, and perhaps be able to effect an arrangement and obviate the sale; that with Fisher's consent the sale was suspended until near sundown; that shortly before the sale was closed respondent went to several who had during the day bid, or talked of bidding, and let them know that the sale would shortly be closed at the court-house door, and at 496 more than one place *gave public notice that the property would there be cried for the last time; and after crying it thirty or forty minutes at the court-house door, without receiving another bid, he cried it out to Fisher, who requested respondent not to make a deed for the property until he should see respondent again. That in fact the deed was not made until the date of the acknowledgment, (which is the 30th of July 1845,) though it bears date on the day of sale. That it was not true that any person was prevented from bidding at the sale in consequence of the time it was closed. That he knows of no representation having been made to any person anxious to purchase, that the sale would be postponed; and if he had known of any such representation, he would at once have undeceived the person to whom it was made; and that he would not, acting as trustee, (and knowing his duty to be to act as the agent of both parties,) have sold property under such circumstances as are alleged in the bill.

Sundry depositions were taken in the case; and among them the depositions of Smith the trustee, Morrill the agent of Rossett, Wetzel the deputy post-master at Ripley, and Hassler. Smith proved substantially the same facts stated in his answer. Morrill proved that he was Rossett's agent in Jackson, at and before the time of the sale, informed Rossett, who was absent, that the property would probably be sold under the deed of trust, and furnished him with a statement of the probable amount necessary to discharge the deed. Rossett replied that he would make arrangement with Hassler to have the requisite amount forwarded for that purpose. Previous to the sale deponent had frequently called at the post-office at Ripley and enquired for a letter in which he expected a draft to discharge the deed of trust, and was as often informed by the post-master that there was no such letter. When the trustee was about to proceed to 497 *make the sale, deponent, as the agent of Rossett, forbade it, stating that he had received the most positive assurance that an arrangement would be made to pay the money, and that he expected Rossett (who had been a few days before in Ripley, and had gone to Point Pleasant to see if the draft had not been sent to that place) to arrive every hour. Deponent's statement of what followed the sale substantially agrees, as far as it goes, with that of the trustee. On the 27th of June, four days after the sale, deponent received the draft which he had no doubt was in the office at the time of the sale. He afterwards called on Fisher and asked him if he would receive the draft in discharge of the deed, which he refused to do. Deponent's impression was that in the letter conveying the draft, Hassler required that Fisher, on receiving the draft, should have the trust deed assigned to him. Wetzel's deposition confirms that of Morrill in regard to his repeated enquiries for letters, and his belief that the letter enclosing the draft was in the post-office at the time of the sale and when the enquiries were made; but it was overlooked, being, as deponent thought, in a wrong box. Hassler proved that early in the spring of 1845 Rossett applied to him for two hundred and twenty dollars to pay to Fisher for the redemption of his property in Ripley. Deponent would have advanced the money immediately to Rossett, but he preferred a check for the amount to be forwarded to Morrill; and deponent accordingly enclosed a government check on the Commercial Bank of New York for the amount, and mailed the letter on the 12th of June 1845. Such checks he was in the habit of disposing of for a premium in gold. A letter from Rossett to Fisher, dated the 9th of June 1845, and directed to Point Pleasant, stating the arrangement made with Hassler, was received by Fisher on the 18th of June 1845, and was filed as an exhibit by 498 him. *From that letter it appears that Rossett expected the check to be sent to Fisher at Point Pleasant, the place of his residence, about thirty miles distant from Ripley: But it was sent to Morrill at Ripley.

The evidence of the value of the property at the time of the sale is somewhat complicated and conflicting. A great deal of evidence was taken by Fisher to show the bad construction and dilapidated condition of the building; but none of it I believe fixes the value in numero at that time. A letter from Fisher to Rossett, dated May 29th, 1844, between one and two months after the date of the deed of trust, is exhibited with the bill. In that letter the writer manifested a strong desire to purchase the property, and complained that Rossett had asked him one thousand dollars for it, while, as the writer had been informed, Rossett had offered to sell it for six hundred dollars. The fair inference to be drawn from this letter is, that when it was written Fisher would have given at least six hundred dollars for the property. But I think the best evidence of the value of the property at the time of the sale is to be found in the deposition of William Shepard, high sheriff of Jackson, who proved that in his opinion the property was then worth at least eight hundred and fifty or nine hundred dollars.

On the 19th of September 1848, the cause came on for final hearing, and the bill was dismissed. From that decree Rossett has appealed.

Price, for the appellant, and Patton, for the appellees, submitted the case.

MONCURE, J., after stating the case, proceeded:

A trustee in a deed of trust is the agent of both parties, and bound to act impartially between them; nor ought he to permit the urgency of the creditors to force the sale under circumstances injurious to the 499 *debtor at an inadequate price. 1 Lom. Dig. 323; Quarles v. Lacy, 4 Munf. 251. He is "bound to bring the estate to the hammer," as has been said by Lord Eldon, "under every possible advantage to his cestui que trusts;" and he should use all reasonable diligence to obtain the best price. Hill on Trustees 479, marg. and the cases cited. He may and ought, of his own motion, to apply to a court of equity to remove impediments to a fair execution of his trust; to remove any cloud hanging over the title; and to adjust accounts if necessary, in order to ascertain the actual debt which ought to be raised by the sale, or the amount of prior incumbrances. And he will be justified in delaying for these preliminary purposes, the sale of the property, until such resort may be had to a court of equity. If he should fail, however, to do this, the party injured by his default has an unquestionable right to do it; whether such party be the creditor secured by the deed, or a subsequent incumbrancer, or the debtor himself or his assigns. And this may be done notwithstanding the impediments in the way of a fair sale, may have been known to the debtor at the time of the execution of the deed, and the removal of them before the time prescribed in the deed for the sale was impracticable, and could not therefore have been contemplated by him.

For these principles I refer to 1 Lom. Dig. 322-326; 1 Tuck. Com. book 2, p.

101-106; Quarles v. Lacy, 4 Munf. 251; Gray v. Hancock, 1 Rand. 72; Chowning v. Cox, Id. 306; Gibson's heirs v. Jones, 5 Leigh 370; Miller v. Argyle's ex'or, Id. 460; Wilkins v. Gordon, 11 Leigh 547.

Let us apply these principles to this case. The property was sold for less than a fourth of its value. The sale was made under circumstances and in a manner well calculated to produce such a result. Even if the title had been unexceptionable, 500 I think the trustee *ought to have postponed the sale to another day; which would have subjected the creditors to no other inconvenience than a little delay, while it would have avoided a sacrifice, and might have obviated the necessity of a sale. It may be said that Rossett's agent ought not to have forbid the sale. Whether he ought or not, he did what he thought was his duty, and I do not think that this act of the agent justified the sacrifice of the principal's property. See Ord v. Noel, 6 Madd. R. 126; Wilkins v. Gordon, 11 Leigh 547.

But in my view of this case it is unnecessary to consider whether the sacrifice of the property, and the circumstances under which it was sold, independently of the state of the title, would, severally or together, be sufficient ground for setting aside the sale. I am of opinion that the cloud over the title at the time of the sale is of itself a sufficient ground for that purpose. The deed conveyed, and the trustee sold only the equitable title to the property. The legal title was outstanding in A. N. Kinnaird. It should have been gotten in before the sale; and the trustee would have been justified in delaying the sale, and in bringing a suit, if necessary, for that purpose. No efforts were used to get it in. It probably might have been gotten in without a suit, and merely by calling on Kinnaird and presenting him a deed for execution. The deed of trust recited that Rossett had paid Kinnaird for the property. Fisher obtained a deed from Kinnaird shortly after the sale, and seems to have had no difficulty in obtaining it. That this defect was a cloud over the title, which it was the duty of the trustee to have had removed before the sale, and that on his failing to do so the debtor had a right to have the sale enjoined until the cloud was removed, are propositions which are fully established by the authorities before referred to. The existence of the defect appeared upon the face of the 501 deed of trust, and was *well calculated to affect the sale. Indeed, Fisher states in his answer that it was well known to him and most if not all the capitalists present at the sale, that the legal title was in Kinnaird; that it was very uncertain whether he would make a deed for it or not; and that a suit would probably be necessary to compel him to do so: And this is stated in the answer as one of the causes of the sacrifice in the sale of the property. But the trustee having made the sale without having the cloud over the title removed, and the principal creditor secured by the deed having become the purchaser, the question is, whether the debtor is entitled to have the sale set aside? He had provided funds for the payment of the trust debts, and expected in that way to prevent a sale; but was disappointed by an unforeseen and unaccountable accident. But for having made such provision he might have resorted to an injunction. He was not present at the sale, forbade it by his agent, and has never acquiesced in it. The purchaser was the principal creditor, was well acquainted with all the facts which rendered the sale improper, and yet insisted on its being made. A few days after the sale and before a deed was made to him by the trustee, the draft for two hundred and twenty dollars, which exceeded the amount of the trust debts, was offered him by the debtor's agent, but he refused to receive it, or give up the benefit of his purchase, and required the trustee to execute the deed; assigning as a reason therefor that the debtor had used abusive language to him. He says in his answer, that he believes when Rossett's agent first offered him the draft, he required an assignment of the deed of trust; though after the draft was refused on these terms, he perhaps offered it as a payment. All that Hassler could have expected was, to be substituted to the place of the creditors whose claims he was willing to pay; and not that they should incur any personal liability *as assignors to him; 502 or that the operation of the deed as an indemnity to Fisher as security for costs in Hassler's lessee, &c. v. King, should be impaired. It is obvious that Fisher did not refuse to give up the benefit of his purchase on account of the terms on which the draft was offered to him; though I do not consider that question material.

Whatever might have been the rights of a bona fide purchaser without notice at such a sale, as to which I express no opinion, I think that the creditor being the purchaser under the circumstances before stated, the debtor has lost none of his rights by the sale, but is entitled to have it set aside and the property resold, if necessary, for the purposes of the trust. See Gibson's heirs v. Jones, 5 Leigh, 370; Breckenridge v. Auld, 1 Rob. R. 148; Dabney, &c., v. Green, 4 Hen. & Munf. 10; Lord Cranstown v. Johnston, 3 Ves. jr. R. 170.

But it may be said that the cloud over the title is not mentioned in the bill as one of the causes of the sacrifice of the property; and therefore the sale should not be set aside on that ground. It is true that nothing is said about it in the bill; but it is fully stated in the answer, and is thus made a part of the case. A defect in a bill may be cured by a statement in the answer, where such statement, as in this case, is not inconsistent with the case made by the bill. An instance of this kind occurred in Wood v. Dummer, 3 Mason's R. 308. There the bill charged fraud as the ground for relief; whereas trust was the only ground on which it could be given; and to maintain that ground it was necessary to show that a certain corporation was insolvent. That fact was not charged in the bill, but was admitted in the answer; and thereupon relief was given. After the answer was filed in this case the appellant might have amended his bill and stated the fact in regard to the title. He actually did move at the hearing for leave to make such amendment, *but it was denied by the court. If an amendment of the bill had been necessary, I think the court ought to have granted the leave, even at the late period at which it was asked. Bellows v. Stone, 14 New Hamp. R. 175. But I do not think it was necessary. It could have answered no good purpose, and would have been attended with expense and delay. There was much less reason for an amendment of the bill in this case than in Shugart's adm'r v. Thompson's adm'r, 10 Leigh 434, which was a suit to set aside a settled account. The answer denied the grounds on which the settlement was impeached in the bill. There was an order of account, and proofs were adduced, which, though they did not sustain the specific objections taken in the bill, yet ascertained that the settlement might be justly surcharged in other respects. It was held, that although according to the strictest and most formal practice, the plaintiff may be required to amend his bill, and urge therein the objections to the settlement shown by the evidence, yet it is competent to the court to dispense with this proceeding and permit the plaintiff to proceed in respect to the objections shown by the evidence, in like manner as if they had been noticed by the bill. Judge Stanard said, "Such a practice seems to me recommended by many considerations. It is more expeditious and less expensive, and tends to prevent or shorten those delays in the administration of justice which are grievances admitted by all, and by many urged as a reproach to its ministers."

Upon the whole, I think the decree should be reversed, the sale set aside, the property reconveyed by Fisher, with covenants against his own acts only, to the appellee Smith, on the trusts declared by said deed of trust, and the said Fisher should account for the rents and profits of the property since the sale, after deducting the value of any permanent improvements made thereon by him, and also deducting any reasonable *expense he may have incurred in getting in the legal title which was outstanding in Kinnaird at the time of the sale. And the cause should be remanded to the Circuit court for further proceedings to be had therein, as follows, to wit: An account should be taken of the said rents and profits, and of any such improvements and expense, for the purpose of ascertaining the balance due thereon by said Fisher; which balance should be applied to the purposes of said deed of trust, to wit, to the payment of the debts secured thereby, (both of which are now due to said Fisher, he having paid the debt to Wilson & Co. out of the price at which the land was sold to him at the trust sale,) with the interest which may be due thereon, and to the indemnity of the said Fisher as security for costs in the case of Hassler's lessee, &c., v. King. If the said balance should be sufficient to satisfy the said purposes, the surplus, if any, should be paid, and the property released, forthwith to the appellant. If there should be no such balance, or it should be insufficient to satisfy the said purposes; and the appellant, in a reasonable time to be prescribed by the court, should satisfy the same, or so much thereof as might remain unsatisfied by the application of any such balance as aforesaid, then the property should be released to the appellant. But if he should fail to make such satisfaction, then the said property should be sold in the manner and on the terms prescribed by the said deed of trust; and the proceeds applied to the satisfaction of the purposes of the trust, or so much thereof as might remain unsatisfied as aforesaid. The costs of the appellant in the Circuit court should be paid by the appellee Fisher.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Moncure, J.

Coparceners—Adverse Possession of One—Case at Bar.†

—J T died in 1823, leaving seven children, and seized in fee of a tract of land. S T, one of his sons, took possession of the land soon after his death, claiming that J. T. had made a will giving it to him for life, with remainder to his two sons; and he filed a bill against the other heirs to set up the will, which could not be found. This suit was pending until 1837, when it was dismissed for a failure to give security for costs. S T held the exclusive possession of the land during his life, and his two sons and those claiming under them, continued to hold it until 1844, when the other heirs filed a bill for partition of the land; and in that suit the court directed that the plaintiffs should first establish their title at law. At the death of J T four of his heirs were married women, and three of them so continued; one of them died in 1832, leaving infant children and her husband surviving her; and he died in 1833: This suit was brought in 1848. †Coparceners—Adverse Possession—What Constitutes—When Statute of Limitations Begins to Run.—In Cooey v. Porter, 22 W. Va. 124, 125, it is said: "It is undoubtedly true that the possession of one parcener is ordinarily regarded as the possession of all the others, and such possession, being subordinate and not adverse, cannot, however long continued, 1823, claiming title to it, and his sons having taken possession on his death, and they and those claiming under them having continued to hold the land claiming title, such taking and holding possession was adverse to the other heirs, and the statute of limitations commenced to run from the time of such taking possession by S T.

operate as a bar to his coparceners. But it is equally true that such parcener in possession may disseise his coparceners and from the time of such disseisin his possession will be adverse. That one coparcener, joint tenant or tenant in common may disseise his cotenants there can be no legal doubt. The law on that question is fully settled. McClung v. Ross, 5 Wheat. 116; Purcell v. Wilson, 4 Gratt. 16; Clarke v. McClure, 10 Id. 305; Caperton v. Gregory, 11 Id. 505. * * * The authorities it seems to me fully sustain the doctrine that it is the quo animo, the intention of the tenant or parcener in possession to hold the common property in severalty and exclusively as his own, with notice or knowledge to his cotenants of such intention, that constitutes the ouster: therefore, any open, notorious act evincing such intention, or any explicit disclaimer or denial of the claims of his cotenants, or the assertion of a several and individual estate or title in himself to the entirety of the common property, will operate as a disseisin or ouster of his cotenants, and from the time they have notice or knowledge of such act, disclaimer or assertion of title his possession will be adverse and the statute of limitations will commence to run. Clymer v. Dawkins, 3 How. 674; Jackson v. Smith, 13 Johns. 406; Caperton v. Gregory, 11 Gratt. 505; Terrill v. Murray, 4 Yerg. 104; Peeler v. Guilkey, 27 Tex. 855; Lodge v. Patterson, 3 Watts 74. * * * The nature or character of the title or claim under which the occupying tenant asserts his ownership is entirely immaterial. It is the fact that he claims the property as his own and not the goodness of his title which makes his possession adverse. His claim may be founded on a defective or even a void deed or paper as well as upon a valid instrument, or it may be simply in pais without any paper or color of title and resting wholly upon a naked assertion of title or claim in himself accompanied by exclusive possession. Caperton v. Gregory, supra; Jackson v. Brink, 5 Cow. 483; Jackson v. Ellis, 13 Johns. 118; Jackson v. Long, 7 Wend. 170; Leonard v. Leonard, 10 Mass. 231; *Jackson v. Also, in Stonestreet v. Doyle, 75 Va. 379, it is said, as between tenants in common and others claiming in privity, the entry and possession of one are ordinarily the entry and possession of all; this presumption will prevail in favor of all until some notorious act of ouster or adversary possession is brought home to the others, and until there is notice, actual or constructive, that the possession is hostile, it will be considered amicable, even though the tenants' possession may have been adversary, citing Caperton v. Gregory, 11 Gratt. 505. The principal case is cited for the same proposition in Hannon v. Hounihan, 85 Va. 438, 12 S. E. Rep. 157.

In Taylor v. Philippi, 35 W. Va. 554, 14 S. E. Rep. 182, it is said: "We have many cases which discuss the doctrine of adversary possession. Among them: Taylor's Devisees v. Burnsides, 1 Gratt. 165; Overton's Heirs v. Davisson, Id. 211; Shanks v. Lancaster, 5 Gratt. 110; Pasley v. English, Id. 141; Evans v.

2. Same—Same—Pendency of Suit to Set Up Will—Effect upon Running of Statute.—That the pendency of the suit brought by S T to set up the will of J T, did not prevent the running of the statute; that, having commenced to run, could not be stopped by anything occurring subsequently: And moreover, the will as a will of lands, being valid without probat, and the suit being not to acquire title, but to establish evidence of title.

3. Same—Same—Suit for Partition—Effect on Statute.—If in the suit for partition the heirs of J T had alleged and proved any equitable grounds to repel the statute, the chancery court might have given it effect by an order, when directing the suit to be brought for trial of title: but no such ground having been shown, and no such order made, the statute must have the operation which a common law court ascribes to it.

4. Same—Same—Running of Statute against Females Covert.—The statute runs against the femore covert and their husbands, so as to bar a recovery during the coverture.

‡Statute of Limitations—No Subsequent Event Stops Running of.—In Jones v. Lemon, 26 W. Va. 635, it is said, that if the statute of limitations has once begun to run no subsequent event will interrupt it, citing 1 *Barton's Ch. §Adverse Possession—Statute of Limitations—Effect as against Husband and Wife.—In Merritt v. Hughes, 36 W. Va. 366, 15 S. E. Rep. 60, the court says: "The case of Caperton v. Gregory is authority to show that the statute does run against a wife owning lands and against her husband during coverture, and, as the law then stood (Acts 1836-37, ch. 8), barring them after the lapse of the common period of bar, however long the coverture exist, with a revival of the wife's right upon the cessation of the coverture for the period fixed by the saving clause in favor of persons under disability, during which period she or her heirs might sue, notwithstanding she and her husband had already been barred during coverture. But Caperton v. Gregory does not touch the case where the husband alone, or he and she together, make a deed, void as to her, passing the husband's right, so that they could not, nor could either, sue the grantee. *Caperton v. Price and Caperton, for the appellants.

N. Harrison and Stanard, for the appellees.

SAMUELS, J. This cause is brought here by supersedeas to a judgment of the Circuit court of Monroe county, rendered upon a special verdict in an action of ejectment, wherein the defendant was here plaintiff, and the plaintiffs here were defendants.

The finding of the jury shows this case: John Thompson was seized in fee of the land in controversy, and departed this life authority to show that husband and wife have right of entry and action, notwithstanding coverture, against one claiming the wife's land, not under their conveyance, but adversely, and that, as they have right of entry and action, they must sue before the proper limit for the particular case expires, as the statute is operating against them."

¶Sess. Acts of 1880-7, p. 11, § 10. Be it further enacted, that all writs of formedon in decender, remainder or reverter, of any lands in that part of this commonwealth which lies west of the Alleghany mountains, hereafter to be brought upon any title or cause heretofore accrued, or which may hereafter fall or accrue, in that part of this commonwealth, of lands situated there, shall be sued within seven years next after such title or cause of action accrued, and not afterwards; and that no person or persons who now hath or have, or hereafter may have any right or title of entry into any lands, shall make an entry but within seven years next after such right or title accrued; and such person or persons shall be barred from any entry afterwards: provided nevertheless, if any person or persons entitled to such writ or writs, to such right or title of entry as aforesaid, shall be or were under the age of twenty-one years, feme covert, non compos mentis or imprisoned, at the time such right or title accrued or came to them, every such person, and his or her heirs, shall and may, notwithstanding the said seven years are or may be expired, bring and maintain his or her action, or make his or her entry within three years next after such disabilities removed, or the death of the person so disabled, and not afterwards.

in June 1823. He left seven children, and several grand children the issue of two sons who had died in the life time of their father; the lessors of the plaintiff are some of the children and grand children of the deceased claiming as heirs, *and others claiming by purchase from others of the heirs.

The defendants below also claim title as derived from John Thompson deceased. It appears that after the death of the ancestor in June 1823, and before August 29th of that year, Samuel Thompson, one of his sons and heirs at law, entered upon the land in controversy, claiming that his father had left a will wherein he devised the land in controversy to said Samuel for life, remainder to said Samuel's wife for life, remainder in fee to John Thompson and William Thompson, the sons of said Samuel. This alleged will was not found after John Thompson's death. Samuel Thompson, however, having taken possession of the land at some time after his father's death in June 1823, and before the 29th of August of that year, on the day last named instituted a suit in chancery in the District court of chancery holden at Lewisburg, alleging the due making of the will devising the land to the complainant, his wife and sons as above stated; that the will was in force at testator's death; that it could not be found; and praying that the whole will, or so much of it as devised the land to complainant, his wife and sons, might be established. To this bill the heirs at law of John Thompson were made defendants, and served with process to answer. Under this color or claim of title Samuel Thompson took and held the exclusive possession of the land during his life. After his death the parties claiming under the will, successively took and held the land for their own use, to the exclusion of John Thompson's other heirs at law. The title thus claimed has been transmitted by intermediate alienations, until equal moieties of the land vested in the parties Caperton and Tiffany respectively, who are the plaintiffs here, and who were in possession at the time of bringing this suit, using and enjoying the property as their own.

508 *The entry and possession of Samuel Thompson must, under the circumstances, be held to have been adverse to the other heirs at law of his father John Thompson. A will, although not admitted to probat, is a valid will of land. Bagwell v. Elliott, 2 Rand. 190: And the record shows that Samuel Thompson had reason to insist on his claim under the alleged will. The exclusive use and enjoyment of the property in the hands of the several and successive holders, accompanied with a denial of all right in the parties now claiming as coparceners, from 1823 to 1848, when this suit was brought, is such an adverse possession as is protected by the statute of limitations. See Shanks v. Lancaster, 5 Gratt. 110; Purcell v. Wilson, 4 Gratt. 16.

The defendant must be barred by the statute, unless it can be shown that his lessors or some of them are exempt from its operation. The counsel for the defendants here seek to withdraw all the lessors of the plaintiff from the bar of the statute, for several reasons: As that the entry and possession by Samuel Thompson, one of the coparceners, must be regarded as the entry and possession of all the coparceners; and, therefore, the statute did not run. Conceding that the entry and possession by one coparcener enures to the benefit of all in the absence of proof to the contrary, yet when it appears that the coparcener entering and taking possession, claimed the property as his own under color of title; that he took the profits to his own exclusive use, and denied the title of the other coparceners, of all which they had notice; the party so taking and holding is regarded as having disseized his coparceners. See Clymor's lessee v. Dawkins, 3 How. S. C. R. 674; Ricard v. Williams, 7 Wheat. R. 59; McClung v. Ross, 5 Wheat. R. 11; Purcell v. Wilson, 4 Gratt. 16.

Another reason for which the counsel sought to withdraw all the plaintiff's lessors from the operation of the statute, is the fact, that Samuel Thompson, after his entry, filed a bill in chancery against the other heirs at law seeking to establish the alleged will of their common ancestor; that this bill was pending until the year 1837, when it was dismissed for a failure to give security for costs, which complainants had been required to give. The answer is obvious, that the statute commenced running the day Samuel Thompson disseized the other heirs; and the course of the statute would not be arrested by anything occurring subsequently. The further answer is equally obvious, that this cause was decided in a court of common law jurisdiction, which court necessarily decided it upon its own rules and principles, without reference to the principles governing chancery courts. Without doubt, in the absence of any injunction restraining the lessors of the plaintiff from making an entry or from bringing suit, the law court must allow full force to the statute. The chancery suit was not brought for the purpose of acquiring title; that, as was alleged, had been acquired by the will and the death of the testator: It was brought to establish the evidence of the title. It would be strange if a party in possession of property, claiming it under color of title, should lose the protection of the statute, by making an ineffectual effort to procure evidence to sustain his title.

The defendant here further sought to obviate the effect of the statute by the suit for partition brought in 1844, in which suit an order was made requiring complainants to establish their title by suit at law, under which order this suit was brought. In the view I take of the subject, this suit for partition is wholly without the effect ascribed to it, as, if the statute applied at all, it had run its course before the suit was brought: The adverse entry was made before the 29th of August 1823; the suit for partition was commenced 21st of March 1844. If the complainants in the suit for partition had alleged and proved any equitable reason to repel the statute, the chancery court might have given effect to such reason by an appropriate order when directing the suit to be brought for trial of title. No reason of this nature is shown, no such order of the court was made; and the statute is thus left to have the operation which a common law court ascribes to it.

The counsel for the defendants here, if they may not exempt all the lessors from the bar of the statute, yet seek to exempt some of them by bringing them within the proviso in favor of femes covert and infants.

At the time of John Thompson's death, some of his heirs, that is to say, Margaret the wife of Isaac Cole, Elizabeth the wife of Joseph Canterbury, Isabella the wife of Willis Ballard, and Jane the wife of Samuel Gregory, were femes covert. The first named three of these femes still survive, and have continually remained covert since the death of John Thompson; and they unite with their husbands in this suit: Jane Gregory lived until 1832, when she died, leaving issue and leaving her husband Samuel Gregory surviving; he died in 1833. The issue of Jane Gregory are lessors of the plaintiff in this suit. The title of Canterbury and wife, who unite as lessors of the plaintiff, was divested by the decree of a court of competent jurisdiction, and vested in Nancy Thompson for life; remainder in fee to her sons John and William, under whom the plaintiffs here claim; no recovery, therefore, can be had under this title.

The titles of Cole and wife and Ballard and wife stand upon a different footing from that of Jane Gregory's heirs; and must be separately considered. That title descended from John Thompson to the femes when they were covert-baron, in which condition they have hitherto continually remained. Samuel Thompson made his adverse entry upon the land alleged to have descended, whereof the husbands and wives were jointly seized in right of the wives, thereby putting these parties to their right of entry, and giving them cause of action to recover possession.

The question whether the statute is a bar under such circumstances, has never before occurred in this court; it must, therefore, be decided upon the terms of the statute itself, applied to estates of the nature of this, and claimed by parties in their condition. We must look to the decisions of other courts upon the question.

The statute giving the rule is found in Sess. Acts 1837, p. 11, § 10. The body of the enactment excludes all rights of entry, by whomsoever held; and creates a bar in seven years. The proviso declares, "that if any person or persons entitled to such writ or writs, to such right or title of entry, as aforesaid, shall be or were under the age of twenty-one years, feme covert, non compos mentis or imprisoned, at the time such right or title accrued or came to them, every such person, and his or her heirs, shall and may, notwithstanding the said seven years are or shall be expired, bring and maintain his or her action, or make his or her entry, within three years after such disabilities removed, or the death of the person so disabled, and not afterwards."

The body of the statute gives seven years to every party having a right of entry in which to assert the right, and interposes a bar after that time; the proviso gives a further time of three years to parties under disability: this three years to be computed from the removal of the disability. The period, if any, between the end of the seven years and the beginning of the three years, is not, in terms, withdrawn from the operation of the statute.

In regard to an infant, and a person non compos mentis, it has been decided 512 that the right of action exists *continually from its accrual until the end of the time allowed after the disability removed: that suit may be brought by such parties after the end of the time prescribed as a bar, and before the beginning of the time secured by the proviso. However this may be in regard to such persons, a feme covert stands on a different ground. She and her husband are jointly seized in her right; but the husband has also certain interests in the property, and capacity to dispose of such interests, without the concurrence of the wife, and against her consent. He may invest another with seizin by conveying a freehold estate for the joint lives of himself and wife; and if issue be born (Cole and wife had issue), the husband may convey the property for his own life; his estate by the curtesy intervening before that of the heirs of the wife. The husband may moreover subject the freehold estate for the joint lives of himself and wife, or for his own life in case issue be born, to the payment of his debts. See Clancy on the Rights of Married Women 161; Bac. Abr. Baron & Feme C. 1; Watson v. Watson, 10 Conn. R. 75, 91, Judge Church's opinion. If the husband may do all this by direct conveyance; if he may thereby deprive himself and wife of a right of entry for their joint lives, I perceive no reason why he may not allow his and her right of entry to pass away by operation of law. This construction of the statute is sustained by Littleton, § 403, and the commentary thereon, 3 Thos. Coke Litt. p. 47; Moore v. Jackson, 4 Wend. R. 58.

I am of opinion that no recovery can be had in this action under the title of Cole and wife, or that of Ballard and wife.

The sixth count in the declaration is upon the demise of Jane Gregory's heirs; and upon his count only judgment was rendered for the plaintiff by the Circuit court. As already said, Jane Gregory's title descended to her heirs, and is 513 somewhat different from *those of Cole and wife and Ballard and wife. Mrs. Gregory was a feme covert at the time her right of entry accrued in 1823; and so continued until her death in 1832. She left her husband surviving, who died in 1833. She also left children her heirs at law, who were infants under the age of twenty-one years at the time of her death, to whom descended her right of entry with capacity to make the entry after the death of the husband. This entry was not made nor suit brought by the heirs within three years after their capacity to do either had accrued to them, nor within the further time allowed by the act of 1837. The question is thus presented, Whether their right is protected by the proviso?

It is insisted by the counsel for the defendant in error, that the possession of Samuel Thompson and of those holding in succession after him was not adverse to Jane Gregory at any time during her life; and as a consequence, she was not under the necessity of relying on the proviso to preserve her rights: that the possession became adverse after her death, and that her heirs are the parties to whom the rights of entry on the adverse possession for the first time accrued. This position of the counsel, to be of any avail, must be true in all its parts; for if the right of entry accrued to Jane Gregory in her life time, her coverture must be relied on to save the right of entry in her person: her heirs in that case can claim only the benefit secured to them as her heirs. That the possession of Samuel Thompson and others holding after him, was adverse to John Thompson's other heirs, has, I conceive, been fully shown. Jane Gregory's right of entry would then be preserved only by her coverture; and her heirs can recover only by showing an entry, or suit brought within the time allowed to them for these purposes. Is this the full period allowed to parties who are infants "at the time such 514 right or title *accrued or came to them," or is it only the three years allowed to the heirs of one whose right of entry has once already been protected? I think the latter. Jane Gregory's right of entry, whatever it was, descended at her death to her heirs; her right up to that time was protected by the proviso: her heirs, however, in express terms, are bound, unless they enter within three years, no disability of theirs being protracted. Yet this plain language is to be set at naught, if the counsel be right; the heirs are not to be regarded as heirs succeeding to a limited right of entry, but as infants "at the time such right or title accrued or came to them." We must take a new departure in the computation of time; we must hold that the heirs do not take the right of entry held by the ancestor, but a renewed and prolonged right, to be transmitted, perchance, to other infant heirs, with a renewed right en-grafted thereon and still further prolonged: and thus onwards indefinitely. Such a construction I regard as at war alike with the letter and purpose of a statute of limitations. Our act of assembly is substantially copied from the statute 21 James 1, ch. 16. The English courts hold that an heir under disability, acquiring a right of entry by descent from an ancestor also under disability, cannot claim the whole time allowed by the statute to a party in whom the right originally vested to make the entry, but that the heir may only claim the time secured by the proviso to a party taking derivatively by descent.

An English court acting on established principles, in applying a statute like ours in the case of Jane Gregory's heirs, would hold that the heirs, notwithstanding their disability of infancy, could enter only within three years after their right of entry accrued. See Doe v. Jesson, 6 East's R. 80.

Justice McLean, in delivering the opinion of the Supreme court of the United States in Mercer's lessee v. Selden, 1 How. S. C. R. at page 55, in regard to the right of Mrs. Swaim's infant heirs who were alleged to have acquired a right of entry from their mother, a feme covert, says, "They were bound, without regard to their infancy or other disabilities, to bring their action in ten years from the decease of their ancestor." This was the construction placed upon the statute of limitations of Virginia existing prior to the act of 1837, and applying at that time throughout the whole state. The act of 1837 prescribes different times of limitation for lands lying west of the Alleghany mountains. The old and the new statutes, however, are identical in all particulars except time, and the territory to which they apply. Thus the decision of the case is directly upon the question in which Jane Gregory's heirs are concerned; and is adverse to their pretensions. See also Floyd's heirs v. Johnson et al., 2 Litt. R. 109, in which the same question is decided in the same way; Moore v. Jackson, 4 Wend. R. 58.

Following these decisions as giving the true meaning of the statute, as well according to its letter, as to its obvious spirit and policy, I am of opinion no recovery can be had under the title asserted by Jane Gregory's heirs.

Having thus passed upon the title of each one of John Thompson's heirs, in whose behalf an attempt could be made to exempt them from the statute of limitations, on the facts found in the verdict, and finding the attempt in regard to each without foundation in law, I am of opinion to reverse the judgment of the Circuit court, and to render a judgment for the plaintiffs in error.

I. LIABILITY IN CONTRACT.

Generally.—The only contract binding on an infant is the implied contract for necessities; the only act which he is under a legal incapacity to perform is the appointment of an attorney; all other acts and contracts, executed or executory are voidable or confirmable by him at his election. Dictum by MONCURE, J., in Mustard v. Wohlford, 15 Gratt. 329; Gillespie v. Bailey, 12 W. Va. 70.

What Are Not Necessaries.—When an infant has acquired a fair education and lives with his mother and step-father, and his only estate consists of a remainder in a 535-acre tract worth $977.55, his step-father was not allowed a claim of $799.83 for further education and support on the ground of necessities. Gayle v. Hayes, 79 Va. 542.

Particular Contracts.

Contract of Partnership.—An infant is capable of being a partner and his contract of partnership is not void but voidable. If he affirm it after he arrives at age, he will be bound by it. Penn v. Whitehead, 17 Gratt. 503, 94 Am. Dec. 478.

Release of Right to Damages.—A release executed by an infant for a valuable consideration, of his right to damages against a railroad, may be disaffirmed by him, on coming of age, without restoring the consideration, when it does not appear that he has it at that time. Young v. W. Va., etc., Ry. Co. 42 W. Va. 112, 24 S. E. Rep. 615.

Release of Dower Right by Infant Feme Covert.—An infant married woman, though she join her husband in a deed, executed with all the formalities required by the statute, 1 Old Rev. Code Va., ch. 90, § 6 Code 1887, § 2562, may disaffirm the contract, after her husband's death and her arrival at full age, and may recover her dower in the land. Thomas v. Gammel, 6 Leigh 9.

Contracts Binding on Infants.

Contract of Enlistment.—An infant, if he enlist by his own free choice, though without the knowledge or consent of his parent, will be bound by his contract of enlistment. U. S. v. Lipscomb, 4 Gratt. 41; U. S. v. Blakeney, 3 Gratt. 405.

Contracts of Marriage Settlement.—Infants' contracts of marriage settlement are binding on them though made during infancy, a fortiori if there be issue of the marriage, and cannot be avoided by them on coming of age. A settlement made by them through a father or guardian is likewise binding. Tabb v. Archer, 3 H. & M. 399, 3 Am. Dec. 657.

BALDWIN, J., in a dictum in Healy v. Rowan, 5 Gratt. 414, 52 Am. Dec. 94, approved the doctrine of Tabb v. Archer, 3 H. & M. 399, 3 Am. Dec. 607, saying, "Marriage articles, made between an infant feme and her intended husband, beneficial to her and her contemplated issue, will be enforced in equity, by a settlement in conformity therewith, on the application of the issue."

Though it was held in Healy v. Rowan, 5 Gratt. 414, 52 Am. Dec. 94, that marriage articles, to which an infant feme is not a party, but which are made between her guardian and her intended husband are not binding on the infant, yet, BALDWIN, J., said, obiter: "She may, after full age, adopt or ratify such marriage agreement."

Liability as Administrator.—An infant is not liable as administrator for a devastavit of his intestate's goods, either on his express contract (his bond) or on an implied contract as a constructive trustee, where no fraud or tort is charged. Saum v. Coffelt, 79 Va. 510.

Infants' Contracts Voidable.—The contract of an infant is voidable by the infant, after she arrives at the age of twenty-one years. Bedinger v. Wharton, 27 Gratt. 857; Birch v. Linton, 78 Va. 584; Wilson v. Branch, 77 Va. 65.

Not Void.—An infant's contract is voidable, not void, and subject to be affirmed or disaffirmed by the infant after his arrival at age, though the fact of infancy were known to the other party. Mustard v. Wohlford, 15 Gratt. 329; Gillespie v. Bailey, 12 W. Va. 70; Wamsley v. Lindenberger, 2 Rand. 478. In this respect differing from the contract of a feme covert which is void. Ogle v. Adams, 12 W. Va. 213, 241.

Hence Infant Must Be Sued with Adult on a Joint Contract.—A promissory note is executed by one of two partners, in the name of the firm. One of the partners was an infant at the time of the execution of the note. An action is brought against the adult partner only. The action is badly brought; the act of the infant being voidable only, and not void. Wamsley v. Lindenberger, 2 Rand. 478.

Defence of Infancy Personal to Infant.—The defence of infancy is a personal privilege and cannot be interposed by a stranger. Fry v. Leslie, 87 Va. 269, 12 S. E. Rep. 671; Wamsley v. Lindenberger, 2 Rand. 478.

Disaffirmance of Infants' Contracts.

Mere Acquiescence Not Sufficient.—Mere acquiescence, though for an unreasonable time after age, in the case at bar twenty-seven years, will not amount to an affirmation of a contract made during infancy, when the purchaser has not been in possession, except for a year or two before the bringing of the action to set the sale aside. To make silent acquiescence for the period of the statute of limitations, an affirmation of such a contract, it must be under the same circumstances as required by that statute, that is, the purchaser must be in possession of the land during the whole of this period, and if he is not in possession, but the land is wild and unoccupied, the mere lapse of time, though it exceed the period required by the statute, will not amount to an affirmation, especially where the property is in litigation during that time. Gillespie v. Bailey, 12 W. Va. 70.

Mere silence for any length of time less than the statutory period which would bar an action of ejectment, when unaccompanied by some act of a confirmatory nature, will not amount to an affirm-ance of an infant's deed. Birch v. Linton, 78 Va. 584; Wilson v. Branch, 77 Va. 65.

In a dictum in Wilson v. Branch, 77 Va. 65, LACY, J., said that an infant must disaffirm his contract within a reasonable time after coming of age; but acknowledged that many cases held the contrary, as in the cases supra, that silent acquiescence was no bar, if for a shorter period than the statute of limitations. In this case, eighteen months was held a reasonable time.

Effect of Disaffirmance.—The disaffirmance of an infant's contract after age extinguishes any interest in law or equity which the other party may have acquired under it and entitles the quondam infant, or any party claiming under him, to recover possession of the subject of the contract and hold it free from any equity of the other party. Such a disaffirmance avoids the infant's contract ab initio, and the parties revert to the same situation, as if the contract had not been made. The right of the infant to avoid his contract is a paramount right and may be exercised even against a purchaser from the vendee. Mustard v. Wohlford, 15 Gratt. 329.

Rights of Third Persons on Disaffirmance.—Where a husband contracts to convey five-sevenths of his share of certain lands to his wife, but, by a prior contract, had conveyed to his co-tenant, his share in a certain tract of the land and had contracted to convey the other half of that particular tract, if it fell to his share, and, on its falling to his share, his wife, an infant, joins him in a conveyance to the co-tenant; if his wife, on coming of age, and after her marriage is annulled, seeks in equity a conveyance of the legal title to the said five-sevenths including that particular tract on the ground that her deed was voidable on account of infancy, the court, where the particular tract did not exceed in value the remaining two-sevenths, refused to take the particular tract out of the hands of third persons, who had bought, but decreed compensation out of the remaining two-sevenths. Kerr v. Kerr, 84 Va. 154, 5 S. E. Rep. 89.

Co-existent Disabilities.—But if the infant is also a feme covert at the time of making the contract, the time allowed for disaffirmance is extended to a reasonable time after coverture and no act of hers while either disability continues will amount to an affirmation of her contract. Bedinger v. Wharton, 27 Gratt. 857; Darraugh v. Blackford, 84 Va. 509, 5 S. E. Rep. 542.

What Amounts to Disaffirmances.

Resale of Subject-Matter of Contract.—A voidable act of an infant may be avoided by different means according to the nature of the act. It is not necessary, in order to produce that effect that the disaffirmance should be express. It is enough that the two acts are inconsistent with each other, in which case the former is disaffirmed by necessary implication. Thus, a sale of his lands by an infant, is disaffirmed by his selling them to a third party after age, even though the first vendee be in possession under the first contract of sale. Mustard v. Wohlford, 15 Gratt. 329.

Necessity for Re-entry by Grantor.—If there be an adverse possession, then, it is said, in those states where one out of possession cannot sell, there should be an entry of the grantor, in order to avoid the first deed by another. But no entry is necessary in those states where one out of possession of real estate, can sell his interest therein, as in Virginia. Nor is entry necessary where, though the vendee is in possession, his possession is not adverse but is subordinate to the title still remaining in the vendor. Mustard v. Wohlford, 15 Gratt. 329.

Bringing of Action Sufficient.—It is not necessary for the infant to do more than bring his suit within the proper time; that is all the disavowal of his deed that is required. Birch v. Linton, 78 Va. 584; Bedinger v. Wharton, 27 Gratt. 857.

May in Same Suit Ask for a Partition.—A party may in the same suit, sue to set aside a conveyance made during infancy, and also sue for a partition of the land. Gillespie v. Bailey, 12 W. Va. 70.

Infants Must Have an Existing Interest in the Subject-Matter of the Contract.—Where a father assigns absolutely a title bond to real estate purchased by him, to his sons, who are his sureties on another bond, and then the father and sons sell the land and assign the title bond to another party, and one of the sons, being a minor at the time of this contract, on coming of age attempts to avoid the contract and have one moiety of the real estate decreed to him, held, that the assignment of the title bond was in the nature of an equitable mortgage to secure the sons' sureties on the other bond, and when the other bond was paid by the purchaser in accordance with an agreement, their mortgage was discharged and the interest of the infant in the real estate ceased. Trader v. Jarvis, 23 W. Va. 100.

Return of Consideration.

Executory Contracts.—If an infant avoid his executory contract he must return the consideration, if he has it; but if he has wasted it during his infancy, he is not obliged to return what he has not. Mustard v. Wohlford, 15 Gratt. 329; Gillespie v. Bailey, 12 W. Va. 70, cited with approval in Ogle v. Adams, 12 W. Va. 213, 241.

Executed Contracts.—MONCURE, P., in a dictum in Bedinger v. Wharton, 27 Gratt. 857, said that if the contract were an executed one, it could not be avoided by the infant without restoring any part of the consideration which remained in his hands on coming of age; but that the question, whether in such a case the infant could avoid the contract if he had wasted the consideration during infancy, or if it was not in his hands on coming of age, had never been decided in Virginia, and though that case was one of an executed contract where the consideration was not in his hands when he came of age, yet that case went off on other grounds. Cited with approval in Ogle v. Adams, 12 W. Va. 213, 241.

In Gillespie v. Bailey, 12 W. Va. 70, GREEN, P., citing Bedinger v. Wharton, supra, inclined to the opinion that the infant need not return the consideration for an executed contract: if it is not in his hands on coming of age, but he expressly declined to decide the question and the case went off on the ground that the rents and profits for the period since the conveyance, for which the purchaser was responsible, exceeded the amount of the purchase money paid to the infant, and sought to be recovered back, and, as the purchaser did not insist on this account being taken and did not complain of the final decree being rendered without it, he cannot assign it as error in the appellate court that the consideration paid was not decreed to be returned to him. See Young v. W. Va., etc., Ry. Co., 42 W. Va. 112, 24 S. E. Rep. 610, and supra, "Particular Contracts."

No Consideration Received.—A fortiori if the infant has made no contract at all and has received no consideration, but a commissioner has conveyed away his property under a void decree, he can recover the property, without making restitution to the holders of it. Abernathy v. Phillips, 82 Va. 773, 1 S. E. Rep. 113.

In Any Case, He Must Return It, If He Has It.—Whether a contract of an infant be completely executed or be executory merely, it is very clear that it cannot be avoided by the infant, after attaining lawful age, without restoring anything which may have been received by him as consideration in the contract, and may remain in his hands on his arrival at such age. Bedinger v. Wharton, 27 Gratt. 871.

Infant Having Only a Life Interest in Property Not Accountable for Principal of Consideration.—Where an infant has only a life interest in property and joins her husband, the trustee, in a conveyance of the fee simple, while an infant, she is in no way accountable for the principal of the consideration received and no benefit which she may possibly have derived from that consideration can prevent her from avoiding the deed executed by her during her infancy, and having the property thereby conveyed, reconveyed and held under the original trusts. Bedinger v. Wharton, 27 Gratt. 857.

Ratification.—While an infant may avoid a bond given by him when under age, if he promises to pay it after age, he will be bound by his promise. Buckner v. Smith, 1 Wash. 296.

What Is Necessary under the Statute.—No particular form of words is required for a confirmation of a debt contracted by a person when an infant, after he attains his majority, but they must import an unequivocal recognition and confirmation of the previous engagement, though they need not amount to a direct promise to pay. Section 2840 of the Code provides that no action shall be maintained whereby to charge any person upon any promise, made after full age, to pay any debt contracted during infancy, or upon any ratification after full age of any promise or simple contract made during infancy, unless such promise or ratification shall be made by some writing, signed by the party to be charged therewith. This statute follows almost in exact terms 9 Geo. IV., ch. 14, sec. 5, and the decisions construing that statute have held that any written instrument, signed by the parties, which, in the case of adults, would have amounted to an adoption of the act of a party acting as an agent, will, in the case of an infant who has attained his majority, amount to a ratification. The memorandum or writing, to be sufficient, must recognize the debt as a debt binding upon the party who signs it. It must, either in terms, or on a fair construction of the instrument, refer to the contract which is to be ratified, and treat it as a subsisting contract. Ward v. Scherer, 96 Va. 318, 31 S. E. Rep. 518.

Must Identify the Contract Ratified.—A replication to a plea of infancy, in an action on a bond executed during infancy, that the obligor has ratified and acknowledged the bond, in writing, after coming of age, is bad, when the ratification relied on refers to an open account for a different amount from that of the bond sued on and there is nothing in it to show that the bond was given for the open account. Ward v. Scherer, 96 Va. 318, 31 S. E. Rep. 518.

By Consenting to a Decree of Compensation.—An infant feme covert after age may not only disaffirm her deed made under disabilities, but, being se iuris, may ratify it, among other ways, by consenting to a decree compensating her for her dower rights. Darraugh v. Blackford, 84 Va. 509, 5 S. E. Rep. 542.

Ratification after Age, Final.—If an infant has once confirmed his contract after arriving at full age, he can never afterwards elect to hold it void. Gillespie v. Bailey, 12 W. Va. 70.

Infant May Have an Injunction against the Enforcement of a Replevy Bond.—If an infant becomes security in a twelve months' replevy bond, a court of equity will grant a perpetual injunction against its enforcements even against an assignee without notice, for the infant has no day in court in such a case, since the plaintiff can sue out execution on his own affidavit without application to the court. Allen v. Minor, 2 Call 70.

Infancy No Defence to a Proceeding in Rem.—Infancy is no defence to a bill to proceed, in rem, against land to enforce a vendor's lien reserved upon the face of the deed, for the purchase money. Smith v. Henkel, 81 Va. 524.

Contract of Apprenticeship.

Infant Must Be a Party.—By the doctrines of the common law, long and well established, a father cannot bind his infant son apprentice without the assent of the son, and such assent proved by his signature to the indenture, but that in this manner he may bind him. State v. Reuff, 29 W. Va. 751, 2 S. E. Rep. 801.

A father cannot bind his infant child apprentice by indentures to which the child is not a party; and indentures of apprenticeship executed by the father, without the child's concurrence, are not voidable only, but void. Pierce v. Massenburg, 4 Leigh 493.

But by Statute Neither Infant Nor His Mother Necessary Parties to Covenants in Their Favor.—Under Acts April 6, 1839, where the indenture contains covenants by the master in favor of the mother of the apprentice, and also in favor of the apprentice, but they are not parties to it, it is nevertheless valid, and the remedies will be adapted to the case. Brewer v. Harris, 5 Gratt. 285.

Duration of Contract.—The statute directs that female apprentices shall be bound out until they are eighteen years old. A binding out until the age of seventeen years is valid. Brewer v. Harris, 5 Gratt. 285.

No Appeal from County or Corporation Court.—No appeal lies from an order of a county or corporation court for binding out an apprentice, or for rescinding his indentures. It seems that, in such case, a writ of certiorari lies from the general court, to bring up the record, and correct the proceedings. Cooper v. Hopkins, 1 H. & M. 412.

Liability of Master for Medical Attendance.—The master of an apprentice is bound to pay for medical attendance on the apprentice, from the very nature of the relation between master and apprentice. Easley v. Craddock, 4 Rand. 423.

Liability of Father.—The father of an apprentice is only bound when the services were rendered at his instance. Easley v. Craddock, 4 Rand. 423.

In Whose Name Action Should Be Brought.—An action in behalf of an apprentice, upon his indenture of apprenticeship, ought not to be brought in the name of the overseers of the poor, but in his own name. Poindexter v. Wilton, 3 Munf. 183.

But covenant will not lie in the name of an apprentice on an indenture of apprenticeship entered into by the overseers of the poor without any previous order of court for binding out the apprentice; such indenture is not a statutory deed; and, therefore, covenant can only be maintained on it in the name of the overseers who are the parties to it. Bullock v. Sebrell, 6 Leigh 560.

Present Provisions in West Virginia.—In West Virginia a minor child can only be bound as an apprentice "by his father, or, if none, by his guardian, or, if neither father nor guardian, by his mother, with the consent entered of record of the county court of the county in which the minor resides; or, without such consent, if the minor, being fourteen years of age, agree in writing to be so bound, or unless such minor be found begging in such county, or is likely to become chargeable thereto"; and, if not so bound, the indentures of apprenticeship are void. State v. Reuff, 29 W. Va. 751, 2 S. E. Rep. 801; Code W. Va. ch. 81, sec. 1.

II. LIABILITY IN TORT.

Tort Must Be Wholly Independent of Contract.—An infant can only be held liable for a fraud or a tort which is wholly independent and irrespective of contract, express or implied. Saum v. Coffelt, 79 Va. 510.

Seduction.—The plea of infancy is no defence to an action for seduction, since an infant is as liable for a tort, not arising out of a breach of contract, as an adult. Fry v. Leslie, 87 Va. 269, 12 S. E. Rep. 671.

Negligence.—If an infant is permitted to hold an office of pecuniary trust, he is not liable for negligence with respect to money placed in his hands, unless he is guilty of a tortious conversion. Saum v. Coffelt, 79 Va. 510.

Contributory Negligence.

Presumed Incapable between Seven and Fourteen.—The law presumes that an infant between the ages of seven and fourteen cannot be guilty of contributory negligence; such presumption must be rebutted by evidence and circumstances establishing her maturity and capacity. Roanoke v. Shull, 97 Va. 19, 34 S. E. Rep. 34.

Age and Discretion to Be Considered.—An instruction to the jury that the rule as to contributory negligence on the part of a child, is, that it is required to exercise only that care which a person of that age would naturally and ordinarily use in the same situation, and under the same circumstances, and that, in determining the relative degree of care or want of care manifested by the parties at the time of the injury, the age and discretion of the parties injured are proper subjects of inquiry for the jury, was approved in Blankenship v. C. & O. R. Co., 94 Va. 419, 27 S. E. Rep. 20.

Infant Acting under Orders of a Superior.—Where an infant of thirteen years of age is employed to perform certain services which he is competent to perform, and which are not hazardous, as carrying water, etc., but a person who has a right to his obedience orders him to perform a dangerous service, adjusting a belt amongst rapidly moving machinery, entirely outside the business he was employed to do, the master will be liable, where the boss was acting within the scope of his employment in giving the orders. Jones v. Old Dom. Cotton Mills, 82 Va. 140.

Age Not the Only Criterion.—The jury in their deliberation, should not be confined by instructions to the consideration of the plaintiff's age alone, but should also be instructed to take into consideration his intelligence, capacity and ability to know the danger and to avoid it, but these considerations need not all be submitted to the jury in the same instructions, but may be embodied in distinct instructions, if, when read together, they will convey to the minds of the jury the fact that both age and intelligence, etc., are factors to be considered. Wash., etc., R. Co. v. Quayle, 95 Va. 741, 30 S. E. Rep. 391.

Where Infant is a Trespasser.—Though an infant be a trespasser, no one has a right to inflict wanton or reckless injury on him; so, where a railroad company upon whose train he is riding, puts him in a position of peril by increasing the speed of its train to an unlawful and dangerous rate, and under such circumstances requires him to jump from the train, the railroad will be liable. Wash., etc., R. Co. v. Quayle, 95 Va. 741, 30 S. E. Rep. 391.

Under Three, an Infant Is Conclusively Presumed Incapable.—In Dicken v. Liverpool Salt & Coal Co., 41 W. Va. 511, 23 S. E. Rep. 582, HOLT, P., said that although it was not necessary to the decision of the case, he was of opinion that a child two years and ten months old could not be guilty of contributory negligence.

In Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Ormsby, 27 Gratt. 455, the court, in speaking of the liability of an infant, two years and ten months old, for contributory negligence, said: "It has not been contended, and cannot be, that he was old enough to be guilty of any, or at all events, that he was guilty of any in this case." In that case the railroad had been guilty of negligence in running its trains through a street on which many children lived.

III. LIABILITY FOR CRIMES.

Between Seven and Fourteen Prima Facie Presumed Doli Incapax.—An infant between the age of seven and fourteen is within the age of discretion but still presumed doli incapax. This, however, is a mere prima facie presumption which may be rebutted by evidence of capacity sufficient to understand the nature of the act and its consequences. Presumption of incapacity is very strong at seven years of age, but it decreases with the progress of years. The first point of inquiry is whether the accused was able to distinguish between right and wrong, to understand the nature of the crime he was committing, and that it was deserving of severe punishment, if so, malitia supplet aetatem. It is not intended to assert that the capacity of the offender must be proved by the direct testimony of witnesses. It may be inferred from the facts and circumstances of the particular case. The nature of the crime and the conduct of the perpetrator may, of themselves, present the most pregnant evidence that he knew the nature of the act and its consequences. Law v. Com., 75 Va. 885.

Proof Necessary to Rebut This Presumption.—But where the only direct proof of capacity is that the accused was a boy of "average capacity for his age," this is not sufficient; the commonwealth must go further and prove that the offender in the particular case understood the nature of his act and its consequences, and especially so where he is under twelve years of age. Law v. Com., 75 Va. 885.

May Be Principal in Second Degree in Rape.—A boy, under fourteen, who aids and assists another person, in the commission of the offence of rape, is not the less a principal in the second degree, because he is incapable of committing the offence himself, if it appear from all the circumstances that he had a "mischievous discretion." Law v. Com., 75 Va. 885.

Evidence of Discretion.—The fact that a boy under the age of fourteen, placed his hand over the mouth of the female with a view to prevent her crying out, while his elder brother committed a rape upon her, is not sufficient in itself for his conviction as principal in the second degree. Law v. Com., 75 Va. 885.

Under Seven, Conclusively Presumed Doli Incapax.—An infant under seven years of age is conclusively presumed to be incapable of crime and no evidence can be received to rebut the presumption. Law v. Com., 75 Va. 885.

IV. COMPETENCY AS A WITNESS.

Under Fourteen It Depends on the Individual Discretion of the Witness.—It is a well-settled rule of evidence that an infant under fourteen may be examined as a witness, provided he sufficiently appears to understand the nature and moral obligation of an oath; for competency depends not upon age but understanding. At the age of fourteen, every person is presumed to have common discretion and the necessary understanding of the obligation of an oath, until the contrary appears; but under that age it is not so presumed. Oliver v. Com., 77 Va. 590.

Five Years Usually the Lowest Limit.—Under the age of six presumption of incompetency arises, and at the age of five the utmost limit would be ordinarily reached, when extraordinary development of the mental and religious faculties should be shown, to take the case out of the ordinary course of nature. State v. Michael, 87 W. Va. 565, 16 S. E. Rep. 803.

Must Understand the Nature and Obligation of an Oath.—An infant of such tender years, five years in this case, and feeble intelligence as to have no conception of the religious or moral significance of an oath, is not competent to testify. State v. Michael, 87 W. Va. 565, 16 S. E. Rep. 803.

Where a child of the age of five made the following answers; to the question, "Is it bad to tell stories?" she answers, "Yes, Ma'am," to the question, "What becomes of little girls who tell stories?" she answers, "The bad man gets them," and as to what the court does with them, she answers, "Puts them in jail," and in answer to a question as to whether her mother had ever taught her anything about God, she replies, "No," and says further that she knows nothing about God except that he makes the babies and throws them down to the doctors, she was held incompetent, as these answers were so evidently merely mechanical and the result of previous coaching. State v. Michael, 87 W. Va. 565, 16 S. E. Rep. 803.

A Question for the Court and Not for the Jury.—The question of incompetency is a question for the court and not for the jury, and if on the examination of a witness, her incompetency appears, it is the duty of the court, on motion of the accused to exclude her evidence from the jury and it is error for the court to submit the question of competency to the jury, either by instruction or otherwise. Nor will the court review the decision of the trial judge unless the error is palpable and flagrant. State v. Michael, 87 W. Va. 565, 16 S. E. Rep. 803.

A witness, whose competency has been affirmed by the court, cannot be examined before the jury touching his understanding of the obligation of an oath, since this is a question of the competency of the witness, not of his credibility. Oliver v. Com., 77 Va. 590.

V. SUITS BY AND AGAINST INFANTS.

A. CRIMINAL CASES.

Infant Must Appear in Person or by Attorney.—Upon a presentment against an infant for a misdemeanor, the infant has a right to appear and defend himself in person or by attorney, and it is error to assign him a guardian and to try the case on a plea pleaded for him by the guardian. Word v. Com., 3 Leigh 744.

B. CIVIL CASES.

Infant Cannot Appear by Attorney.—An infant cannot appear by attorney in a civil suit. Ewing v. Ferguson, 33 Gratt. 548.

Actions by Infants.In West Virginia.

Summons Should Be in Name of Infant by Guardian Ad Litem.—A summons sued out in the name of J. W. B., guardian ad litem of W. B., a minor, before a justice, although not in the best form, yet, aided by the provision in section 26 of chapter 50 of the Code, in relation to proceedings before justices, that no summons shall be quashed or set aside for any defect therein, if it be sufficient on its face to show what is intended thereby, is held sufficient, the defendant not being misled by it and the defendant having appeared generally. Blankenship v. Kanawha & M. Ry. Co., 43 W. Va. 135, 27 S. E. Rep. 355.

How Taken Advantage of.—A summons in an action brought before a justice by an infant plaintiff by next friend is not void, but defective, which defect can only be taken advantage of by defendant by special appearance for that purpose only, i. e. to quash the summons, to be stated at time of making such appearance. A judgment rendered upon such summons after general appearance by defendant is not void. Blair v. Henderson (W. Va.), 38 S. E. Rep. 552.

Purpose of Appointment of Guardian Ad Litem for Infant Plaintiff.—The object of sec. 24, ch. 50, Code, requiring appointment of guardian ad litem for infant plaintiff before bringing suit, and taking consent in writing of such guardian to accept such appointment, and to be responsible for costs if the action fail, is to protect defendant in the matter of costs, that he may have some responsible person to look to in case he succeeds in his defence. Blair v. Henderson (W. Va.), 38 S. E. Rep. 552.

In Virginia.

Prochein Ami.—On this subject of prochein ami the doctrine is that the nearest relation is generally the next friend of an infant; but as that relation may, himself, have injured the infant, and be liable to a suit therefor, or may be otherwise an improper person, the court will permit any person to institute a suit on his behalf, and he is to be named as next friend in the bill. The person ought however, to be a person of substance, because he is liable to pay the costs of suit. Dissenting opinion in Burwell v. Corbin, 1 Rand. 131.

Presumption of Assignment of Prochein Ami.—Where, in a suit for partition, one of the parties plaintiff dies, leaving a widow and infant son in whose name and that of the administrator the suit is revived, it will be presumed that some one was allowed to prosecute the suit for the infant as his next friend where the contrary does not appear. Even if there was not a formal assignment of a next friend, it may be questioned whether such a mere informality will avoid the sale, or whether his mother and his father's administrator will not be regarded as his next friends in the absence of evidence to the contrary. In such a case it would have been out of place to have revived the suit in the name of a next friend of the infant. Wilson v. Smith, 22 Gratt. 493.

To Be Answerable for Costs, Prochein Ami Must Consent.—If a man's name is used as next friend for infants, without his knowledge or consent at any time given, he is not answerable for costs, and if not so answerable, and in no other way interested, he is a good witness. Burwell v. Corbin, 10 Am. Dec. 494, 1 Rand. 131.

The Relation Only Begins with the Institution of the Suit.—A declaration is fatally defective in averring the indebtedness of the defendant to the plaintiff as next friend for an infant, the court saying, "In a legal sense he could not have such a relation to the infant plaintiff until the institution of the suit, and it follows that there could be no such indebtedness to him, as next friend, prior to the institution of the suit, if indeed there could be afterwards." Shirley v. Bonham, 5 W. Va. 501.

When Infant Must Sue by Prochein Ami.

Where Infant Has No General Guardian.—An infant who has no guardian appointed by the court who has given bond, may sue by next friend for damage done to his real estate. McDodrill v. Pardee, etc., Co., 410 W. Va. 564, 21 S. E. Rep. 878.

Suits to Call Guardian to Account.—An infant may by his next friend call the acting guardian or any preceding guardian to account by a bill in chancery; but the bill must be in his own name by his next friend. Lemon v. Hansbarger, 6 Gratt. 301.

Suits to Recover the Distributive Shares of Infants.—A bill in equity to secure the payment of the distributive shares of infants in their ancestor's estate, should be filed in the name of the infants by their next friend, who may be their guardian. Burdett v. Cain, 8 W. Va. 282.

Affidavit by "Next Friend."—It is sufficient if the affidavit filed by the infant's next friend states that he believes the facts stated in the bill to be true, it is not necessary for him to swear that he knows them to be true. Lee v. Braxton, 5 Call 459.

Next Friend Cannot Waive Rights of Infants.—It is not competent to adult plaintiffs or the guardian ("next friends" as appears by the record) of infant plaintiffs to waive the rights of the latter, and it is error to decree on such waiver. Hite v. Hite, 2 Rand. 409.

Suits against Infants.

Parol Demurrer.—The parol does not demur now in Virginia. Tennent v. Pattons, 6 Leigh 196.

Infants Must Be before Court.—It is error to pass upon the rights of infants when they are not before the court. Clendenning v. Conrad, 91 Va. 410, 21 S. E. Rep. 818.

Infant Must Appear by Guardian Ad Litem.—An infant defendant must appear by guardian ad litem, and not by attorney. Fry v. Leslie, 87 Va. 269, 12 S. E. Rep. 671.

Guardian Ad Litem Must Be Appointed.—In a suit in chancery an infant can only appear and defend by guardian ad litem and one should be appointed by the court for that purpose. If the record does not show that they were before the court in the only way in which an infant can appear and defend, the court of appeals must regard the proceeding as fatally defective. Myers v. Myers, 6 W. Va. 369; Parker v. McCoy, 10 Gratt. 594; Hays v. Camden, 38 W. Va. 109, 18 S. E. Rep. 461; Hart v. Hart, 31 W. Va. 688, 8 S. E. Rep. 502; Piercy v. Piercy, 5 W. Va. 199; Pracht v. Lange, 81 Va. 711.

No Rule Can Be Entered until His Appointment.—No rule can be entered against an infant until a guardian ad litem is appointed to defend him, and if no one, on his behalf, applies to the court to appoint one, the plaintiff is bound, at his peril, to do so. Cole v. Pennell, 2 Rand. 174.

Office Judgment Set Aside.—Where an office judgment is obtained, in an action on a promissory note, against two defendants, one of whom is an infant at the time of confirming the judgment and defended by guardian ad litem; on a writ of error, coram vobis, being brought, the proceedings should be set aside, as far as the declaration, or other good pleading, even though the infant becomes adult before the term of court, at which that judgment might have been set aside and he failed to appear. So held by two judges out of three, the third judge holding that the office judgment should be annulled in toto. Cole v. Pennell, 2 Rand. 174.

In the above case, COALTER, J., said obiter, that the plaintiff should have taken the office judgment against the other defendant and suspended proceedings against the infant until he came of age.

Failure of General Guardian to Appear When Notified.—The guardian of the infant owner should be notified, but if he fails to appear and make defence, the court should appoint a guardian ad litem to defend their interest. Charleston, etc., Bridge Co. v. Comstock, 36 W. Va. 263, 15 S. E. Rep. 69.

Must Be Appointed if Infancy Appear at Any Time before Final Decree.—And although the infancy did not appear in the original proceedings, yet if it be alleged in a petition for a rehearing (the decree being interlocutory) a guardian ad litem ought to be appointed. Roberts v. Stanton, 2 Munf. 129.

Usual to Appoint the Husband of an Infant Feme Covert.—When the infant is a married woman, it is nevertheless necessary to appoint a guardian ad litem and it is customary to appoint her husband, if he is a defendant with her. Alexander v. Davis, 42 W. Va. 465, 26 S. E. Rep. 291; Ewing v. Ferguson, 33 Gratt. 548.

May Be Appointed at Rules.—In a suit in equity by the guardian of infants for the sale of their real estate, a guardian ad litem for the infants may be appointed at rules. Sess. Acts 1839-40, p. 47; Talley v. Starke, 6 Gratt. 339.

Guardian Ad Litem Must Be Notified.—In a creditors' bill to set aside a deed of settlement executed to a trustee by the debtor for the benefit of his wife, and her children, who are minors, it is error to proceed to take the accounts where a notice was served on such minors by publication; the guardian ad litem not being named therein, nor otherwise served with notice, the court saying, "It has often been held in this court that it is error to decree a sale of an infant's real estate without the appointment of a guardian ad litem, and the appointment to protect the interest of the infant would be a vain thing, if the subsequent proceedings should be had without notice to him." Strayer v. Long, 83 Va. 715, 8 S. E. Rep. 372.

Guardian Ad Litem Must Answer.—It is error, to correct which a bill of review may be filed, if no answer is filed by their guardian ad litem on behalf of infant defendants, where the bill is not taken for confessed by them. Braxton v. Lee, 4 H. & M. 376; Lee v. Braxton, 5 Call 459.

His Answer Must Be Filed.—The heirs being infants, though their guardian was a party and answered, they were entitled to be defended by a guardian ad litem, and although one was appointed for them, and there was a paper purporting to be an answer found among the papers of the cause, yet as it did not appear that it had been filed, it was error to decree the sale of the infant's land, without an answer filed by guardian ad litem. Ewing v. Ferguson, 33 Gratt. 548.

Presumption of Appointment.—It is error to decree against infants without a guardian ad litem having been appointed, and it cannot be presumed that any such guardian was appointed in the absence of proof that the records were lost or destroyed. McDonald v. McDonald, 8 W. Va. 676; Alexander v. Davis, 42 W. Va. 465, 26 S. E. Rep. 291.

Recital in Final Decree as to Answer of Guardian Ad Litem Not Conclusive.—Although the final decree recites, inter alia, that the cause came on to be heard upon the answer of the guardian ad litem of the infant defendants, this cannot be presumed to be true, when no such answer appears in the record as certified and there is no certificate by the clerk that it was lost or destroyed. Alexander v. Davis, 42 W. Va. 465, 26 S. E. Rep. 291.

Appointment Must Appear by the Record.—An office judgment against an infant, who in the writ is named as defendant "by J. K. his guardian," cannot be supported, but must be reversed in toto, if there be nothing in the record to show that J. K. was guardian by testament, or ex provisione legis, or guardian ad litem, appointed by the court. Brown v. McRea, 4 Munf. 439.

Where Guardian Ad Litem Fails to Act.—Where one of the defendants in a suit is an infant, but it is not stated in the record, that he appeared by his guardian in the suit, nor does it appear that the guardian ad litem, appointed by the court ever acted or even had notice of such appointment, it is error to enter a judgment by default against the infant, but a motion should be made to the court to proceed against that guardian ad litem or to appoint another. Fox v. Cosby, 2 Call 1.

When Not Necessary to Appoint a Guardian Ad Litem.

When His General Guardian Makes His Defence.—If a guardian has been appointed by the county court, and her answer has been received for the infants and full defence made under the sanction and authority of the chancery court, although she was not expressly appointed guardian to defend that suit, the infants must be equally bound by that defence as if she had been in form appointed by the court guardian ad litem. Ewing v. Ferguson, 33 Gratt. 548. But if the suit abate as to such guardian by her death before the decree, a guardian ad litem ought to be appointed, notwithstanding all the testimony and accounts were taken before his death. Beverleys v. Miller, 6 Munf. 99.

Where the Decree is in the Infant's Favor.—Although a decree be rendered without the appointment of a guardian ad litem for an infant, if it is in the infant's favor, she has no ground of complaint against it. Alexander v. Davis, 42 W. Va. 465, 26 S. E. Rep. 291.

Appointment of Guardian Ad Litem and Infancy Not Questions for the Jury, How Taken Advantage of.—In Campbell v. Hughes, 12 W. Va. 183, 206, 210, it was held that the court did not err in refusing to give the following instruction in an action of ejectment: "If the jury find that the defendants are infants under the age of twenty-one and that no guardian ad litem for them was appointed in the cause, then their verdict must be for the defendants," the court saying that infancy is not a good plea in bar of an action of ejectment, that it is right and proper for a guardian ad litem to be appointed at the proper time, but that whether the defendants were infants or not, or a guardian ad litem had been appointed are questions with which a jury has nothing to do. But where the proofs show that a part of the defendants were infants, and no guardian ad litem had been appointed for them, it might perhaps be cause for a new trial, and when judgment was rendered on the verdict, and a part of the defendants were infants and the facts properly appeared on the record, it will be cause for reversal upon writ of error coram nobis on motion under sec. 1, ch. 134, Code W. Va.

Bill Should Not Be Dismissed.—If anything appears in relation to the appointment of the guardian ad litem, or in other respects, which is not satisfactory to the chancellor, so that, in his opinion, further proceedings are necessary to enable him to pronounce a decree on the merits, the bill ought not to be dismissed, but such further proceedings directed. Garland v. Loving, 1 Rand. 396.

Not Obligated to Accept Appointment.—A guardian ad litem, appointed to prosecute an appeal on an infant's behalf, is not obliged to accept the appointment. A reasonable time ought, therefore, to be given him to consider whether he will accept, and to prepare for trial. Wells v. Winfree, 2 Munf. 342.

When Depositions May Be Read against Infants.

With Consent of Guardian Ad Litem.—It is not improper to read depositions in evidence against infant defendants with the consent of their guardian ad litem. Hardman v. Orr, 5 W. Va. 71.

Notice to Guardian Sufficient, Except in Suits to Sell Infants' Lands.—But if the guardian ad litem had notice of the taking of the depositions, the fact that the depositions were not taken in his presence will not render them inadmissible. Sections 2435 and 2619 of the Code Va. 1887, rendering depositions not taken in the presence of the guardian or upon interrogatories agreed to by him, inadmissible, refer only to suits for the sale of lands of persons under disability and contingent estates, there referred to, and do not apply to suits generally in which infants may be interested. Moore v. Triplett (Va.), 23 S. E. Rep. 69.

Section 4, ch. 83, Code W. Va., providing that no deposition shall be read in the suit except by leave of court, unless it be taken in the presence of the guardian ad litem or on interrogatories agreed to by him, applies only to bills, whose object is the leasing and selling of the lands of persons under disability as the caption of the chapter shows, and the mere fact that an infant is a stockholder in a corporation would not bring within the operation of the provisions of ch. 83, a bill to dissolve the corporation and sell the property under ch. 53, sec. 57. Any deposition can be taken in such a cause that could be taken in any other cause in which an infant is a party. Hurst v. Coe, 30 W. Va. 158, 3 S. E. Rep. 564.

But Guardian Ad Litem Must Be Notified.—It is error to allow a deposition to be read against infants, when it does not appear that their guardian ad litem had been served with notice. Walker v. Grayson, 86 Va. 337, 10 S. E. Rep. 51.

Powers of Guardian Ad Litem.

His Power Confined to the Case in Which He is Appointed.—The power of the guardian ad litem is confined to that particular case and his duty is to manage the case and see to the interest of that particular infant, who must in some way, by appointment and answer be specifically named or designated, for some defendant may appear to be an infant, who is not so named in the bill, as in the principal case. Alexander v. Davis, 42 W. Va. 465, 26 S. E. Rep. 291.

May Consent to Removal of Cause.—A guardian ad litem may consent, for his wards, to the removal of the suit from one circuit court to another. Lemmon v. Herbert, 92 Va. 653, 24 S. E. Rep. 249.

His Answer Cannot Be Read against Infant.—"No rule is better settled, than that an answer of an infant by guardian ad litem cannot be read against him at all, for any purpose." BALDWIN, J., in Bank of Alex. v. Patton, 1 Rob. 499.

Presumption That Infant Has Come of Age.—Though the defendant was an infant when the action was instituted, yet as she did not set up her infancy to defeat the action, and as it may be reasonably inferred from the evidence that she was of full age when the cause was heard upon a demurrer to evidence, and appeared and defended herself by counsel, she is bound by the judgment. Staton v. Pittman, 11 Gratt. 99.

Where an infant defendant answers a bill by her guardian ad litem and the case is heard on such answer, if she afterwards appeals in her own name and her right to appeal is not questioned in the record, it is assumed that she has arrived at majority and her appeal will be allowed, though other adult defendants will not be allowed to appeal, where the bill was taken as confessed as to them and they made no motion in the lower court to reverse the decree, under Code W. Va. ch. 134, § 5. Bock v. Bock, 24 W. Va. 586.

C. SALE OF INFANTS' LANDS.—See this subject in monographic note on "Guardian and Ward" appended to Barnum v. Frost, 17 Gratt. 398.

Jurisdiction of Equity.—Courts of equity have no inherent power to sell the lands of infants, and can do so only as statutes enable them to do so. Hoback v. Miller, 44 W. Va. 635, 29 S. E. Rep. 1014; Pierce v. Trigg, 10 Leigh 406; Faulkner v. Davis, 18 Gratt. 651.

Sales under Acts of Assembly.

When Valid.—An act of assembly for the sale of an infant's lands, not proved to have been obtained by fraud, is valid, when it enforces no new obligation, nor takes away any antecedent rights from the heir, whom it is intended to benefit by selling the lands upon credit and consequently more to his advantage. And the fact that a small excess is raised beyond the sum required, by the act, will not invalidate the sale, when it arises from unexpected amounts of land discovered upon the surveys, to be in the lots, in excess of the quantities called for in the leases. Spotswood v. Pendleton, 4 Call 514.

Conduct of Sale.—A sale under an act of assembly may be either public or private and sales to tenants, who, before the lands were put up, agreed to give the prices contained in a previous contract made by the trustees, were good, as nobody bid against them. In such case the trustees may sell by agents. Spotswood v. Pendleton, 4 Call 514.

In Pursuance of Ancestor's Contract.—Where there is a contract between the owners of realty that the survivor may sell it, a court of equity on the death of one may decree the specific performance of the contract, though the heirs of the deceased party are infants. It is not necessary in such a case, to proceed under the statute providing for the sale of infants' lands, and though the surviving party to the contract undertakes to make a sale of the property by his own authority without seeking the aid of a court of chancery, yet, on a bill by the executrix and heirs of the deceased party to affirm the sale, the court may affirm the sale already made, if it appear proper, instead of ordering a new one. Goddin v. Vaughn, 14 Gratt. 102.

On a Bill to Marshal the Assets.—In a proceeding by the plaintiffs as simple contract creditors, entitled to marshal the assets, the court has authority to decree, at a proper time, a sale of the real estate in the hands of the infant heirs, so far as necessary, but it is premature to do so before ascertaining the amount of indebtedness chargeable upon the lands of the decedent. Cralle v. Meem, 8 Gratt. 496.

A Sale Not Compulsory on the Court.—On a bill to marshal the assets, a court of chancery is not bound to decree a sale of the lands of infant heirs, and if it appears that the debts can be satisfied within a reasonable time out of the rents and profits, a sale should not be decreed; but if a sale is decreed, the marshal must follow the directions of the decree; if he has good reasons for thinking the sale injurious to an infant defendant, he should make a special report to the chancellor. Tennent v. Pattons, 6 Leigh 196.

Sale in Lieu of Partition.—Under the section of the Code Va. 1887, § 2564, providing for the sale of infants' lands if partition cannot conveniently be made, it must appear that partition cannot conveniently be made and also that the interests of the parties will be promoted by the sale. It is not necessary that these facts should appear from the report of the commissioners or by the depositions of witnesses. It is sufficient if the facts appearing in the record reasonably warrant the decree of sale. This is especially true when the proceeding is to defeat the title of an innocent purchaser. Zirkle v. McCue, 26 Gratt. 517.

Construction of Act for the Sale of Small Inheritances.—The statute providing for the sale of small inheritances was construed in Parker v. McCoy, 10 Gratt. 594, to apply to cases where the value of each heir's share after partition was less than $300, even though the proportion of each heir in the proceeds would exceed $300 if the property were disposed of in a lump.

No Sale Can Be Had under a Bill for the Assignment of Dower.—When the single object of a suit in the county court is the assignment of the widow's dower, but the court not only directs the dower to be assigned, but, apparently sua sponte, decrees a sale of the residue of the land, the heirs being infants at the time and the interest of each party by the record exceeds $300, Code Va. 1860, p. 581, § 8, such a decree is void for want of jurisdiction, and when the cause is afterwards removed to the circuit court and the petition of the infants denying the jurisdiction of the county court is dismissed, the rights of the infants are not rendered res judicata by such decree of the circuit court. Seamster v. Blackstock, 83 Va. 232, 2 S. E. Rep. 36.

GREEN, J., in Hull v. Hull, 26 W. Va. 1, said: "My conclusion therefore is, that the court in this case, all the heirs being infant defendants, and the suit having been brought by the widow for an assignment of her dower, had no power to decree a sale of any of the lands, when the legal title of the lands was in the husband in his lifetime. And it was not proper for the court to decree the sale of any of the lands, which the husband had purchased and paid for in part during his lifetime: first, because there were no peculiar circumstances stated in the bill, which would justify such a decree of sale; and, second, because there was not a particle of proof, that the interest of the infant heirs would be promoted by a sale; and lastly, because there was no answer filed in the cause by their guardian ad litem, without which answer the court had no power or authority to sell any of the lands of these infants, whether their title to them was legal or only equitable."

Except Where Dower Is in an Equity of Redemption.—A widow, who has dower in an equity of redemption may file a bill to have the land sold, though some of the heirs are infants. The fact that she prays for a certain investment of the proceeds, or asks for alternative relief, will not invalidate the proceedings as to the infant heirs. Daniel v. Leitch, 18 Gratt. 195.

The conclusion of GREEN, J., in Hull v. Hull, 26 W. Va. 1, was that in a suit by a widow for the assignment of her dower, the court might order a sale of the land even though the heirs were infants, where the husband had merely an equitable title, e. g., an equity of redemption, or a contract entitling him to a deed upon the payment of the purchase money if the interests of the infant heirs would be benefited thereby, since in these cases, the other party, mortgagee or vendor has a right to have the land sold. But where the husband had the legal title, e. g., if the land in the hands of the husband were subject to a vendor's lien, the land cannot be sold even if to the advantage of the infants.

Sale Cannot Be Had on a Bill to Surcharge and Falsify a Guardian's Account.—A sale or partition of infants' lands cannot be procured by a bill filed by the infants by their next friend against their guardian to surcharge and falsify his account and to have him removed. They must proceed under the statute, Va. Code 1873, ch. 124, §§ 2-8; Va. Code 1887, § 2616. Snively v. Harkrader, 29 Gratt. 112.

Proper Parties.

Infants May Be Parties Plaintiff Instead of Defendant.

—The fact that the infants are plaintiffs with their mother, instead of being made defendants, is no objection to the proceedings in a suit for the sale of their land. Quesenberry v. Barbour, 31 Gratt. 491.

"Those Who Would Be His Heirs If Infant Were Dead."—Where a bill is filed by a father and mother, who are trustees of certain lands for their infant children, to sell these lands, it is a sufficient compliance with § 2616, Code Va. 1887, providing that if there is an infant defendant, all those who would be his heirs, if he were dead, should be made parties, that the infants should be made parties defendant, their parents being already parties plaintiff, these being the persons who would be the heir of each infant if he were dead. Lancaster v. Barton, 92 Va. 615, 24 S. E. Rep. 251.

Service of Process on Infants Not Necessary.—The practice of serving infant defendants with process after they are 14 years of age answers merely as a useful safeguard; but such service is not necessary and is practised only because the infant may furnish some aid in the selection and appointment of his guardian ad litem, and formerly he could not be appointed until the infant had in some manner been brought before the court, but that is no longer necessary. The acceptance of the guardian ad litem is also necessary, to be shown by filing or adopting an answer. Alexander v. Davis, 42 W. Va. 405, 26 S. E. Rep. 291; Parker v. McCoy, 10 Gratt. 594.

In Condemnation Proceedings.—In condemnation proceedings under the statute, ch. 42, Code W. Va., it is not necessary for infant owners to be served with notice of the application; but the court may so order. Charleston, etc., Bridge Co. v. Comstock, 36 W. Va. 263, 15 S. E. Rep. 60.

In Proceedings under Statute for the Sale of Small Inheritances.—Under the statute providing for the sale of small inheritances it is not necessary to serve process on the infant defendants. Parker v. McCoy, 10 Gratt. 594.

Order of Publication.—Where infant defendants are proceeded against as nonresidents by order of publication, they can attack the validity of the decree by showing the falsity of the affidavit of their nonresidence in a direct proceeding for the purpose; but they cannot attack it collaterally in another forum when the record states that they were non-resident. Lawson v. Moorman, 85 Va. 880, 9 S. E. Rep. 150.

Verification of Bill.—Under section 2616 of the Code Va. 1887, which provides that the bill filed to sell infants' lands shall be verified by the oath of the plaintiff, it is not necessary for the affidavit to show on its face that it was sworn to by the plaintiff, if that fact is proved by the evidence, though the former is the better practice. Lancaster v. Barton, 92 Va. 615, 24 S. E. Rep. 251.

Infant over Fourteen Must File an Answer in Proper Person.—Where one of the infant defendants is over fourteen years of age, it is error for her not to file an answer in proper person. Code Va. 1887, § 2616; Cooper v. Hepburn, 15 Gratt. 551.

Signature and Verification.—Where the personal answer of an infant over fourteen years of age, required by the statute, though, in fact, neither signed nor sworn to by her, yet appears by the record to have been duly signed and sworn to by the infant; and it appears that the suit was brought at the solicitation of the infant, that she was twenty-one, six months after the suit was brought and sixteen months before the sale, and she made no objection to the confirmation of the sale, she is estopped from afterwards objecting to the sale on the ground that she had not signed or sworn to her answer. Lancaster v. Barton, 92 Va. 615, 24 S. E. Rep. 251.

Presumption That Answer of Guardian Ad Litem Was Sworn to.—Though it does not appear that the answer of the guardian ad litem was sworn to, it will be presumed to have been done in accordance with the maxim, omnia praesumuntur rite esse acta. Durrett v. Davis, 24 Gratt. 302.

Answer of Guardian Ad Litem Erroneously Purporting to Be That of Infant by Guardian Ad Litem.—Where the answer filed by the guardian ad litem purports to be the infant's by his guardian ad litem, but is signed by the guardian ad litem and is in fact his answer, it is to be considered his answer. Durrett v. Davis, 24 Gratt. 302.

Substantial Compliance Sufficient.—Where the proceedings for the sale of infants' lands are in substantial if not literal conformity with the requirements of the statute they are binding on the parties thereto and the sale made, under the decree rendered therein, is a valid sale and confers a good title on the purchaser. Quesenberry v. Barbour, 31 Gratt. 491.

Error Must Be Palpable and Substantial.—JUDGE STAPLES, in Zirkle v. McCue, 26 Gratt. 517, in summing up the result of the Virginia authorities on the subject, said: "These extracts, and others that might be given, show, that while this court has never gone as far as the courts of other states in favor of purchasers at judicial sales, it has, on all occasions, manifested a very strong disinclination to interfere with the rights of such purchasers, unless upon palpable and substantial errors in the proceedings and decrees under which such titles are acquired."

West Virginia Doctrine—Answer Must Be Filed by the Guardian Ad Litem.—In a suit to sell infants' lands there must be an answer filed by their guardian, and the court expressly disapproved of the extent to which the Virginia court had carried the presumption of regularity in the proceedings in Durrett v. Davis, 24 Gratt. 302, and other cases, and held a paper purporting to be an answer of the guardian ad litem in which neither the name of the guardian ad litem nor that of any of the infants appear and which is not signed by said guardian or any attorney in his behalf, no answer at all, and that the decree was void for want of jurisdiction. Hull v. Hull, 26 W. Va. 1.

Infants Cannot Consent to a Decree.—Infant defendants are incompetent to consent to a decree of sale of their lands, and no one can consent for them. They can select no attorney and a guardian ad litem to defend the infants cannot consent away their inheritance. Daingerfield v. Smith, 83 Va. 81, 1 S. E. Rep. 599; Cralle v. Meem, 8 Gratt. 496, 590.

Necessity for Construction of Will.—The statute does not require as a prerequisite that the will under which infants hold lands shall be construed before a sale is ordered. Lancaster v. Barton, 92 Va. 615, 24 S. E. Rep. 251.

Report of Commissioner.—The report of a commissioner upon an order of reference merely to take evidence as to the propriety of the sale of infants' lands, is not such a report as is required by the statute to lie ten days before being acted on, and the failure to do so will not affect the validity of the sale. Lancaster v. Barton, 92 Va. 615, 24 S. E. Rep. 251.

Conduct of Sale.—Where the decree directs that the sale be made upon the premises, the commissioner acts irregularly in making it at a different place: especially after advertising that it would be made on the premises. He should report to the court that it could not be made there for want of bidders, and obtain instructions for his future action. A sale having been thus irregularly made, as the purchasers could not enforce their contracts, if resisted by the parties in the cause, they ought not to be compelled to perfect them if they object. Talley v. Starke, 6 Gratt. 840.

Power of Commissioner of Sale.—Where a commissioner by one decree is authorized to sell the lands of infants and under a second decree is authorized to rent them out on such terms and for such time as he may deem most advantageous to the estate, upon the termination of the lease it is not necessary for him to apply again to the court for authority to sell. Dixon v. McCue, 21 Gratt. 373.

Sales for Confederate Currency.—In view of the fact that confederate currency was the only currency in circulation in March 1863, all decrees pronounced for the sale of infants' property at so late a period of the war, and all judicial sales made under such decrees must be taken to be rendered and made for the currency which then constituted the only circulating medium of the country, unless such decree in plain terms directed otherwise. Walker v. Page, 21 Gratt. 636; Dixon v. McCue, 21 Gratt. 373.

Liens Should Be Ascertained.—The real estate of an infant should not be decreed for sale until the liens thereon are ascertained and fixed. White v. Straus (W. Va.), 35 S. E. Rep. 843.

Presumption When Records Have Been Destroyed.—Where the records have been destroyed, it will be presumed that the evidence was sufficient to satisfy the court that the interest of the infants would be promoted by the sale. Walker v. Page, 21 Gratt. 636.

Rights and Duties of Purchaser.—LEE, J., in a dictum

In Parker v. McCoy, 10 Gratt. 594, said: "There are strong authorities to show that a fair purchaser under a decree will not be affected by any error or irregularities in the proceedings; he is not bound to go through all the proceedings and look into all the circumstances and see that the decree is right in all its parts. * * He cannot of course be protected against a title not in issue in the cause, nor against the claims of persons not parties to the cause, and therefore not bound by the decree; but it would seem that he has the right to presume the court has taken the necessary steps to investigate the rights of the parties, and upon such investigation has properly decreed the sale." As, e. g., the fact that a lot was omitted which would have raised the share of each heir above $800 and so takes the inheritance out of the statute allowing the sale of small inheritance.

It is the business of a purchaser at a judicial sale to see that all the persons who are necessary to convey the title are before the court, and that the sale is made according to the decree. But, "He will not be affected by error in the decree, such as not giving an infant a day to show cause, in cases in which a day ought to be given; or decreeing a sale of lands to satisfy judgment debts without an account of personal estate." A fortiori he will not be affected by any imperfection in the frame of the bill, if it contain sufficient matter to show the propriety of the decree. Daniel v. Leitch, 18 Gratt. 210.

Failure of Purchaser to Comply with the Terms of Sale.—When it does not appear that the purchasers were guilty of any fraud, imposition or other unfair conduct, and they purchased at a sale publicly and fairly made; and complied with all the terms by the prompt payment of the first three instalments of the purchase money and when the fourth and last instalment became due, one of them was in the army and the other a prisoner in the federal lines, and the appellants sustained no loss or damage by the failure of said purchasers to comply with this part of the contract, the purchase will not be set aside. Dixon v. McCue, 21 Gratt. 373.

Payment to Unbonded Commissioner Good, Where Proceeds Are Lost without His Default.—Although no bond was given by the commissioner, before he proceeded to collect the purchase money for the land, yet, inasmuch as he was authorized by the decree, to collect the money as it fell due, and to pay it to the receiver of the court, in the event of the refusal of the parties to receive it, the money having been paid by the purchasers, and deposited by said commissioner in a bank, acting as receiver, to the credit of the cause, in consequence of such refusal of the parties interested, and said fund having been lost without the default of said commissioner, the purchasers cannot be in any manner prejudiced by his failure to execute the bond required by law and the payment to him is good. Dixon v. McCue, 21 Gratt. 373.

Position of Bona Fide Purchaser from Purchaser at Sale.—Where infants, on coming of age, attempt to show cause against a sale of their lands by alleging that, though a receipt was given, no money was in fact paid, and, their guardian and his sureties being insolvent, attempt to charge a purchaser for value and without notice from the purchaser at the sale; held, that the bona fide purchaser is not responsible. Pierce v. Trigg, 10 Leigh 406.

Bill to Confirm Sale.—Where, in a bill to confirm a sale of infants' lands, there was an interlocutory decree, and the proceedings are irregular on their face, the bill not being sworn to, nor the purchaser made a party, nor it appearing that the testimony was taken in the presence of the guardian ad litem or on interrogatories agreed to by him, an appeal will not be allowed the infant on his coming of age, but plaintiff will be allowed to amend his bill in the above respects and if it shall appear that the sale was necessary under the facts existing at the time, and was fairly made and at full price it will not be set aside on account of such irregularities. Hughes v. Johnston, 12 Gratt. 479.

Infant Coming of Age or Marrying during Pendency of Suit.—Where an infant party to a suit comes of age or marries during the pendency of a suit for the sale of her lands, it is her duty to make the fact known to the court if she desires to become a party as an adult, and her husband must likewise communicate the fact of the marriage to the court if he wishes to become a party. If they fail to do so the validity of the subsequent proceedings cannot be impugned. Lancaster v. Barton, 92 Va. 615, 24 S. E. Rep. 251.

Presumption Is That They Continued under Disability.—When it is assigned as error that the decree ought to have been reheard because some of the parties had been proceeded against merely by the answer of a guardian ad litem, when, in point of fact they had come of age and hence were coram non judice, but it is not alleged when they came of age, the presumption is that they were still under disability when the decree of sale was entered, and it not being alleged that they attained their majority within six months next preceding the filing of the petition, the assignment is bad. Woodson v. Leyburn, 88 Va. 843, 3 S. E. Rep. 873.

Proceeds Remain Realty.—A judicial sale of land, as a general rule, converts it into personalty. But if land, belonging to an infant, be sold, under chapters 79 or 83 of the Code of West Virginia, 1891, the sale does not at once convert into personalty, but the proceeds remain realty until the infant comes of age, when they are to be regarded as personalty. Findley v. Findley, 42 W. Va. 372, 26 S. E. Rep. 433.

Until They Come into the Hands of Someone Sui Juris.—Where infants' lands are sold under a decree of court, the proceeds retain the character of realty and pass as real estate to her infant child and on its death during infancy, and the husband surviving, the property will go to the child's heirs on the part of his mother, subject to the life estate of the husband; the impress of realty never having been removed. Code Va. 1887, § 2626; Vaughan v. Jones, 23 Gratt. 444.

Rights of Creditors in Resulting Fund Must Be Protected by the Decree.—The fund resulting from the sale of the lands continues charged with the debts which were chargeable on the land before the sale. Garland v. Loving, 1 Rand. 396.

Application of Proceeds to Infants' Maintenance, etc.—Until the 19th day of March, 1873, there was no law in Virginia which permitted any part of an infant's real estate to be appropriated to his maintenance, education, or support. On that day the legislature passed an act (Acts 1872-73, page 178), giving the circuit courts the power to apply the proceeds of his real estate, beyond the income, to the infant's maintenance and education, and declaring that, to the extent such proceeds were so applied, and no further, they should be deemed personal estate. This court, in the case of Rinker & Wife v. Streit, 83 Gratt. 667-8, decided that this act is not retroactive and that the order of the court for the sale of infants' lands and application of the proceeds must be made anterior to the advancements or the court has no power to sanction it. Gayle v. Hayes, 79 Va. 542.

See note on "Guardian and Ward" appended to Barnum v. Frost, 17 Gratt. 398.

Obligation to See to the Application of the Purchase Money—Where the power of sale is to pay debts generally and not according to a schedule, purchaser will not be obliged to see to the application of the purchase money. Spotswood v. Pendleton, 3 Call 514.

Where property was conveyed to a trustee to sell for cash or on credit, whenever he could obtain a fair price and to pay over the proceeds to certain infants on their respectively coming of age, a purchaser is not bound to see to the application of the purchase money, whether the sale is made before or after any of the cestuis que trustent come of age. Woodwine v. Woodrum, 19 W. Va. 67.

Effect of Confirmation.

Purchaser Can Only Demand a Good Title.—When a sale of infants' lands has been confirmed, the purchaser has no right to demand an absolute discharge from his purchase even if the title be defective; the utmost such purchaser can demand is that he be discharged if the defect in the title cannot be remedied or be not remedied in a reasonable time. Daniel v. Leltch, 13 Gratt. 195.

Sale Beneficial to Infants Not Set Aside at Suit of Purchasers.—Though a sale of infants' lands is prematurely made, yet if the sale is made and confirmed, the court will not set the sale aside on the petition of the purchasers, if, upon the hearing, it appears that the sale is beneficial to the infants. Cralley v. Meem, 8 Gratt. 496; Daniel v. Leltch, 13 Gratt. 195.

Interlocutory Decree of Sale Should Be Set Aside by a Petition in the Cause.—Where the proceedings of sale and confirmation are interlocutory merely, an application by the purchasers to set them aside on the ground that they were disadvantageous to the infants, should be by petition in the cause, and if they proceed by a bill, the bill should be treated as such a petition and brought to a hearing with the original cause. Cralley v. Meem, 8 Gratt. 496.

Where Only Part of the Purchasers Object.—The appellate court having set aside the sale of certain parcels of the land at the instance of the purchasers, who were the appellants in the cause, and the grounds of the objection to the sale being such as the infant parties may make to all the sales, the court will set aside the whole decree confirming the sale of all the parcels, though the other purchasers are satisfied with their purchases, and are not parties to the appeal; and will send the cause back, for the court below to determine whether these last-mentioned sales ought to be set aside, or confirmed, with the consent of the purchasers, and for the benefit of the infant defendants. Talley v. Starke, 6 Gratt. 340.

Effect of Reversal of Decree on Purchaser's Title before the Statute.—In a dictum in Durrett v. Davis, 24 Gratt. 302, STAPLES, J., said, "While the question may be regarded as an open one in Virginia, to some extent, yet the tendency of opinion has been that the title falls with the reversal of the decree, except so far as the sale is within the influence of the statute."

But in Hull v. Hull, 26 W. Va. 1, GREEN, J., approved the doctrine that if the court has jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject-matter, and the sale has been confirmed, the title of the purchaser will be protected independently of statute, but he acknowledged that the Virginia authorities had not gone so far.

Since the Statute.—Where the sale was made more than six months after the date of the decree, and was duly confirmed, the purchasers are fully protected by the provisions of the 8th sec. of ch. 178, Code of 1860, Code of 1887, § 3425, which declare, that if a sale of property be made under a decree or order of a court, after six months from the date thereof, and such sale be confirmed, though such decree or order be afterwards reversed or set aside, the title of the purchaser at such sale shall not be affected thereby: but there may be a restitution of the proceeds of sale to those entitled. Dixon v. McCue, 21 Gratt. 373; Quesenberry v. Barbour, 31 Gratt. 491.

Where the sale was made less than three months after the date of the decree, the statute does not apply. Hull v. Hull, 26 W. Va. 1.

Statute Applies to Sales of Infants' Land.—§ 3425 of the Va. Code 1887, providing that the title of a purchaser at a judicial sale, made six months after a decree of court directing it, and duly confirmed, should not be affected by a subsequent setting aside of such decree, applies to the judicial sale of infants' lands had under proper proceedings for the purpose. Lancaster v. Barton, 93 Va. 615, 24 S. E. Rep. 251; Cooper v. Hepburn, 15 Gratt. 551.

The fact that the sale is made by means of written proposals, made by those desiring to purchase, to the commissioner and by him reported to the court for acceptance and confirmation, works no exception to the statute, on the ground that the purchaser could not know whether his bid was accepted, before it was confirmed. ROBERTSON, J., dissenting on the ground that where the acceptance and confirmation are simultaneous, an opportunity for objection should be given. Cooper v. Hepburn, 15 Gratt. 551.

Illustration.—Where one of the infants is over fourteen years of age it is error for her not to file a bill in proper person. Code 1887, § 2616. But a purchaser cannot ask that the sale be set aside on that account, after the confirmation of a sale made six months after a decree of court. 1 Rev. Code 1819, ch. 178, § 8; Code 1887, § 3425. The most that he could ask is that he should be protected against any future assertion of claim by the infant over fourteen years of age, which was effectually done by § 3425 of the Code. The court in its discretion might have ordered such answer to be filed, for the sake of regularity. Cooper v. Hepburn, 15 Gratt. 551.

But Court Must Have Jurisdiction.—It was held in a dictum by GREEN, J., in Hull v. Hull, 26 W. Va. 1, that where no answer was filed by the guardian ad litem of infant defendants, the statute, declaring that the title of a purchaser should not be affected by a reversal of the decree when the terms of the statute had been complied with, Va. Code 1860, ch. 178, § 8, then in force in West Virginia, W. Va. Code ch. 182, § 8, had no application, since the decree was void for want of jurisdiction in the court, the infants not being before the court, the court saying: "In order to protect a purchaser at a judicial sale of infants' lands, which has been confirmed, the court making the decree of sale must have competent jurisdiction over the parties whose lands are to be sold, if they have not, e. g., by reason of the failure of the guardian ad litem to file an answer, the decree will not protect a purchaser under it, and, if the decree is reversed, the title of the purchaser will fall with it. Hull v. Hull, 26 W. Va. 1.

Everyone Bound with Notice of Want of Jurisdiction.—A purchaser from a purchaser under a decree, void for want of jurisdiction, will not be regarded as a bona fide purchaser without notice. He is bound to know the want of jurisdiction in the case. Hoback v. Miller, 44 W. Va. 635, 29 S. E. Rep. 1014.

Rights of Purchaser under Void Decree, Who Has Paid Liens against the Land.—A purchaser of land under a void decree, whose money has been applied to the payment of liens on the land, valid against the owner of the land, will be entitled to charge such money upon such land, by substitution to the right of the creditor, upon disaffirmance of the sale. Such purchaser may maintain a bill to enforce such right, and, as incident to his relief, make his bill a creditor's bill. Hull v. Hull, 35 W. Va. 155, 13 S. E. Rep. 49.

Validity of Sale Cannot Be Questioned in a Collateral Proceeding, if Court Had Jurisdiction.—The court having had jurisdiction of the case, being the sale of a trust estate in which infants were interested, under the statute, the validity and propriety of the decree for the sale of the land cannot be questioned in a collateral proceeding. Quesenberry v. Barbour, 31 Gratt. 491; Lawson v. Moorman, 85 Va. 880, 9 S. E. Rep. 150.

Exchange of Infants' Lands.—An exchange of infants' lands in 1884 could only be valid if made in accordance with the provisions of the Va. Code 1873, ch. 124, § 2, Va. Code 1887, §§ 2616, 2625, providing for the sale of infants' lands; this statute must be strictly followed, and where, as in the principal case, the bill was filed by a person who was neither guardian, trustee nor anyone interested in the estate, and the trustee was not a party and the depositions were taken without a guardian ad litem for the infants, the sale is void, and is not validated by the subsequent act (Act 1887, p. 501) providing for exchange.

D. EFFECT OF DECREES ON INFANTS.

Infant Defendants.—It is well settled that an infant, as a general rule, is as much bound by a decree against him as a person of full age. He is not permitted to impeach such decree, except on the same grounds as a person of full age might have impeached it, such as fraud, collusion or error. Zirkle v. McCue, 26 Gratt. 517; Harrison v. Wallton, 95 Va. 725, 30 S. E. Rep. 372; Pennybacker v. Switzer, 75 Va. 671, 688; Lafferty v. Lafferty, 42 W. Va. 785, 26 S. E. Rep. 263.

Absolutely Binding if Beneficial to the Infants.—Although it is a general rule that an infant defendant is not bound by a decree, if, when he arrives at age, he can show error in it, yet, it seems that, where the decree is obviously for his benefit, his rights may be absolutely bound by it, as where the vendee is trying to set aside a sale, advantageous to the infant, on the ground that the infants are not bound. Harman v. Davis, 30 Gratt. 461; Brown v. Armistead, 6 Rand. 594.

Infant Plaintiffs.—An infant plaintiff is as much bound by a decree as an adult, if the decree is beneficial to him. Harman v. Davis, 30 Gratt. 461; Brown v. Armistead, 6 Rand. 594.

Consent Decrees against Infants Binding if Beneficial.—Although infants are incapable of consenting to a decree, it will be binding on them, if for their benefit, and if the infant plaintiffs are satisfied with the decree and seek to enforce it, the defendant cannot be released from it on the ground that it is not binding on the infants. Harman v. Davis, 30 Gratt. 461.

Otherwise if to Their Prejudice.—Where, in accordance with the provisions of sec. 58, ch. 167, Code Va. 1873, a cause, in which there are infant defendants, is submitted to the court by consent of all parties (the infants being represented by guardian ad litem) and a decree beneficial to the infants is rendered, on a bill of review filed by the infants on coming of age, such decree will not be set aside on the ground that infants cannot consent; alter if the decree were to the prejudice of the infant. Morriss v. Va. Ins. Co., 85 Va. 588, 8 S. E. Rep. 383.

A Fortiori if Infants Are Not Consulted.—Where land, subject to a deed of trust, descends on the heirs, some of them being infants, a court of equity has no authority to decree a conveyance of the interests of the infant heirs, in accordance with a compromise to which they are not parties, and as to which they were not consulted, to the grantees of the deed of trust in satisfaction of the debt, although the transaction enures to the benefit of the infants; but if the infants think proper to set aside the transaction, their interest will in the end be subjected to the payment of a proportional amount of the debt secured by the deed of trust. Tracey v. Shumate, 22 W. Va. 474.

Attorney of Opposing Interest Cannot Consent for Them.—The attorney for parties whose interests are adverse to those of infant parties, will not be allowed to consent to a decree in behalf of the infants. Walker v. Grayson, 86 Va. 337, 10 S. E. Rep. 51.

Submission by Infants to Arbitration Not Binding.—Although infants are bound by judgments had under the superintendence and protection of the court, yet, where the case is referred to arbitrators, whereby they are deprived of that protection, a submission by infants, even by rule of court, ought not to be sanctioned. For, as awards are in the nature of judgments, and are to be final and conclusive, which cannot be, where one party has a right to avoid them, it follows that a submission by infants, although with adults, cannot be obligatory on either party. Britton v. Williams, 6 Munf. 453.

Infant Must Formerly Have Been Given a Day to Show Cause.—It was error to decree against an infant without giving him a day, after he came of age, to show cause against it. The proper form was as follows: "And this decree is to be binding on the said infant, unless he shall, within the time of six months after he shall attain his age of twenty-one years (being served with process for that purpose), show unto this court good cause to the contrary." The process is by way of subpoena to be served on the defendant on his coming of age. If he shows no cause the decree is made absolute upon him. But if he comes forward to show cause, he may put in a new answer and make a new defence. Tennent v. Pattons, 6 Leigh 196.

Applied to Suits for Partition.—The right of an infant to a day in court applied as well to suits for partition as to other suits. Zirkle v. McCue, 26 Gratt. 517.

When Unnecessary.—Whenever an infant was decreed to do an act, he must have six months, after full age, allowed him to show cause against the decree, as where he was foreclosed. But, where lands were decreed to be sold for the payment of debts, there was no necessity to allow a day, unless he was decreed to join in the conveyance, as the commissioners of sale would execute the deed. Wilkinson v. Oliver, 4 H. & M. 450.

Interlocutory Decree Need Not Give the Infant a Day.—But where the decree was interlocutory it was not necessary to give the infant a day to show cause, as this omission might be cured later. Pickett v. Chilton, 5 Munf. 467.

Remedy, Where No Day Was Given.—For such error he might seek redress against the decree, without waiting till he came of age, and he might do this either by bill of review, rehearing, or by original bill, alleging specially the error of the former decree. Tennent v. Pattons, 6 Leigh 196; Jackson v. Turner, 5 Leigh 187; Braxton v. Lee, 4 H. & M. 376. And the leave of court was not necessary to file a bill of review in such a case, and if refused, an appeal would lie to the court of appeals. Lee v. Braxton, 5 Call 459.

Not Necessary in Any Case Since Revisal of 1850.—Since the revisal of 1849 and '50 it is unnecessary to insert in the decree a provision allowing the infant a day to show cause, but in any proper case he may, within six months after he arrives at maturity, show such cause in like manner as if the decree contained such provision. Zirkle v. McCue, 26 Gratt. 517; Code Va. 1887, § 3424; Code W. Va. ch. 132, sec. 7; Blackwell v. Bragg, 78 Va. 529; Lafferty v. Lafferty, 42 W. Va. 783, 26 S. E. Rep. 262; Alexander v. Davis, 42 W. Va. 465, 26 S. E. Rep. 291.

No "Tacking" of Disabilities Allowed.—One disability cannot be "mounted" upon another, so as to bar the running of the statute of limitations, so that if an infant feme marries before coming of age, she will have only six months after coming of age, in which to show cause against a decree against her. Blackwell v. Bragg, 78 Va. 529; Parsons v. McCracken, 9 Leigh 495.

Infant May Show Cause before He Comes of Age.—Section 3424 of the Code allowing an infant, within six months after he becomes of age, to show cause against a decree or order in certain cases, does not prevent him from asserting his rights, whilst an infant, by a next friend as soon as he sees fit to do so. Harrison v. Walton, 95 Va. 723, 30 S. E. Rep. 373; Lockhart v. Vandyke, 97 Va. 56, 33 S. E. Rep. 613.

Causes Which an Infant May Show.—CHRISTIAN, J., in Walker v. Page, 21 Gratt. 686, said: "Certainly the infant, upon arriving at age, can show no such cause as this, i. e., that the sale was made for confederate money, to entitle him to vacate a decree made against him while an infant. He may show error upon the face of the record; or he may show that the court had no jurisdiction to enter the decree; or if it had jurisdiction, that the proceedings were irregular and not binding upon the parties; or he may show that the case made by the record did not warrant the decree. But whatever cause he may properly show, he certainly cannot reopen the case, and introduce evidence to contradict that already given and acted upon by the court that entered the decree. If the court which pronounced the decree had jurisdiction of the subject and the parties; if its proceedings were regular and in accordance with the requirements of law; and the decree is sustained and justified by the evidence then introduced, the infant will not be allowed, as against a bona fide purchaser, to go out of the record to show that, upon facts and events arising subsequent to the rendition of the decree, his interests were not promoted by a sale of his real estate.

"To establish a contrary doctrine would in effect defeat the very object of the law, and effectually prevent the sale of any real estate belonging to infants." Lancaster v. Barton, 92 Va. 615, 24 S. E. Rep. 251; Durrett v. Davis, 24 Gratt. 302; Zirkle v.

McCue, 26 Gratt. 517; Hughes v. Johnston, 12 Gratt. 479; Frazier v. Frazier, 26 Gratt. 500.

Given as a Shield to Infants, Not as a Sword.—The privilege given to infants to show cause against a decree, is given to enable them to set aside that which is done to their prejudice and not to overthrow what has been justly done, because of some technical objection to the proceedings. But if relief can be given without disturbing a sale rightfully had under a decree, it will be given as where the land was sold for an inadequate price on account of supposed incumbrances; the difference between the price paid and a fair price will be decreed to be paid for the benefit of the infants. Pierce v. Trigg, 10 Leigh 406.

Proper Proceedings to Show Cause.—"The infant, if his cause against a decree be error of law in the case, may proceed by bill of review, or supplemental bill in the nature of a bill of review, showing error of law; and in such bill of review, I do not think the infant would be confined to merely such matters, to show error, as appear on the face of the decree, as in ordinary cases; and he need not have leave of court to file it, as in ordinary cases of bill of review. He may proceed by original bill, not only for fraud, but for error of law. He may proceed by petition, which is but another name for a bill. He may introduce new matter against it, so it existed at the date of decree. He is given the broad right to show cause against it, and under any of these pleadings he is given relief coextensive with the right." Lafferty v. Lafferty, 42 W. Va. 783, 26 S. E. Rep. 262; Ewing v. Winters, 39 W. Va. 489, 20 S. E. Rep. 572. On an application to show cause against a decree, for error of law, the court of appeals can look into the pleadings and evidence, just as on an appeal, in order to see whether there is error. Lafferty v. Lafferty, 42 W. Va. 783, 26 S. E. Rep. 262.

Court of Appeals Has No Jurisdiction.—But an infant cannot file his petition under sec. 7, ch. 132, Code W. Va. in the court of appeals, since that court has no original jurisdiction in such a case. Ewing v. Winters, 39 W. Va. 489, 20 S. E. Rep. 572.

Interlocutory Decrees.—Where an interlocutory decree has been rendered against an infant, he will be allowed upon coming of age, to amend his answer upon notice. Winston v. Campbell, 4 H. & M. 477.

Decrees Absolutely Binding on Infants.

Decree under Statute for the Sale of Small Inheritances.—In Parker v. McCoy, 10 Gratt. 594, it was held that the sale of the lands of infant heirs, where the dividend of each heir, in the opinion of the court should not exceed the value of $300 is one of those special cases in which, by statutory provisions, authority is given to the court, for special reasons, to order the immediate conveyance of an infant's estate and in which he is bound by the order, and entitled to no day, after he attains his age, to show cause against it. LEE, J., extends this doctrine, in a dictum, to the statutory provisions for the conveyance of estates vested in infants, in trust or by way of mortgage, also for making or taking on behalf of an infant, the surrender of a former lease, or the making or taking a new one. The fact that the decree gives the infant his day makes no difference; such order is void.

Judgment of the Board of Commissioners.—By the Act of Assembly, Chanc. Rev. 93 (May, 1779, ch. 12, 10 Stat. Larg. 35, 42-6), the judgment of the board of commissioners, is conclusive even on an infant when he sues by his next friend, and cannot be impeached. Stephens v. Cobun, 2 Call 440.

E. WAIVER BY INFANTS.

Attorney of Infants Cannot Bind Them by His Waiver.—Where infants sue in equity by a prochein ami to compel an administrator to settle his accounts as administrator of an estate in which they are interested as distributees, and such prochein ami employs an attorney to represent their interests, such attorney cannot bind the infants by an agreement signed by himself or by another attorney authorized by him, to waive proof of the vouchers and accounts presented by such administrator in the settlement of his administration accounts, or to allow commissions to such administrator which are not allowed by statute. Crotty v. Eagle, 35 W. Va. 143, 13 S. E. Rep. 59.

No Waiver by Adult Codefendant Binding on Infant.—Where the record does not show that the summons was ever served on an infant defendant, though this defect be waived by an adult defendant, it cannot be held to have been waived by the infant, when no guardian ad litem has been appointed for him. Hays v. Camden, 88 W. Va. 109, 18 S. E. Rep. 461.

Presumptive Admissions Do Not Apply to Infant Parties.—The rule, that, "where exceptions are taken to certain parts of a commissioner's report, the other parts, not excepted to, are admitted to be correct both as regards the legal principles and the evidence on which they are based," can only apply to adult parties, and not to infants. Kester v. Hill, 46 W. Va. 744, 84 S. E. Rep. 798.

Likewise the rule that the plaintiff having failed to file exceptions to the commissioner's report before the cause was taken to the supreme court, admits that the portions of the report to which they afterwards file their exceptions are correct, does not apply to infant plaintiffs, since, as infants, they can admit nothing and the court may receive exceptions to the report. Kester v. Hill, 46 W. Va. 744, 84 S. E. Rep. 798.

F. STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS.

Saving in Favor of Infants.

Rights to Personal Property.—Persons claiming rights of personal property, being under disability of infancy or coverture when their rights accrue, may prosecute any remedy in equity they are entitled to, by prochein ami, at any time while the disability continues, no matter how long; or, in their proper persons, within five years after the disability removed; the right to such remedy being within the saving of the statute of limitations, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, § 12; Code 1887, § 2931. Hansford v. Elliott, 9 Leigh 79; Hudsons v. Hudson, 6 Munf. 352; Mortimer v. Brumfield, 3 Munf. 122.

Where by a marriage settlement property is conveyed to the use of the wife, and, after her death, to the use of the husband, and on his death to the use of the children of the marriage, if the parents are deprived of the property in their lifetime, the statute of limitations does not begin to run against the children till they reach twenty-one, since their right does not vest till the death of their parents. Baird v. Bland, 3 Munf. 570.

Right to Make Entry on, or Bring Action for Realty.—The statute, allowing an infant to make entry or bring action within ten years after the removal of the disability of infancy, notwithstanding the fifteen years' limitation may have expired, Va. Code 1873, ch. 146, §§ 4 and 5, Va. Code 1887, § 2917, does not curtail the time allowed the infant for the assertion of his right from ten to fifteen years, but enlarges this time, giving him fifteen years in any event, and ten years after disability removed, in which to bring the action, and it is immaterial which period shall first expire. Birch v. Linton, 78 Va. 584.

When Not Applicable to Action of Ejectment.—The saving in favor of infants, married women or insane persons in the 36th section of ch. 135 of the Code 1873, Code 1887, § 2757, in relation to actions of ejectment does not apply to actions of ejectment brought by the lessee to recover possession of the leased premises, which had been recovered by the landlord under the 16th section of ch. 138 of the Code 1873, Code 1887, § 2796 that "any person having a right of re-entry by reason of rent being in arrear may serve a declaration in ejectment on the tenant, etc.," when the lessee was an infant when the premises were recovered. Leonard v. Henderson, 23 Gratt. 331.

Probate of Wills in Which Infants Are Interested.—Under the Rev. Code of 1819, vol. 1, ch. 104, § 12, one who was an infant when a will was probated had seven years after the removal of his disability to contest its validity, the Code 1849, ch. 122, § 35, allows him one year; this latter provision is held retroactive and applicable to a will probated in Code 1840, § 18, ch. 149, not applying, so that an infant who comes of age in 1856 cannot file a bill in 1859 to contest its validity. BROWN, J., dissenting. McClintic v. Ocheltree, 4 W. Va. 249.

Right of Redemption.—If real estate is sold for the nonpayment of taxes thereon, and the right of redemption, under the statute, belongs to, or accrues to an infant by reason of title vested, whether before or after the sale, such right may be exercised in behalf of such infant during infancy, and by himself personally within one year after he becomes twenty-one years of age. White v. Straus (W. Va.), 35 S. E. Rep. 843.

Where Land Was Improperly Listed.—The land of an infant being, by mistake, listed by the commissioner of revenue as the property of another person, and sold, as such, for taxes, in December, 1786; being bought by the deputy sheriff, who sold it; conveyed to him by the high sheriff in February, 1796; and afterwards sold by the deputy sheriff; the right of the infant was established against the last purchaser (who bought with full notice of all the circumstances); notwithstanding the suit was not brought until six years after plaintiff attained his full age, JUDGE TUCKER saying that he was of opinion that a court of equity was the proper place of resort to set aside the deed. Yancey v. Hopkins, 1 Munf. 419.

Running of Statute Not Stopped by Supervening Infancy.—If the possession of defendant began in the lifetime of the plaintiff's ancestor, the statute will run over all mesne acts, such as the supervening infancy of plaintiff. Hudsons v. Hudson, 6 Munf. 352; Fitzhugh v. Anderson, 2 H. & M. 289; Parsons v. McCracken, 9 Leigh 495.

If, after the right of action has accrued and the statute of limitations has begun to run, an ousted cotenant dies, leaving infant heirs, the statute continues to run, and their rights are barred, notwithstanding their disability, in the same number of years as would bar their ancestor. They do not inherit the land, but a mere limited right of action, with days already numbered; and, unless they or their friends take the necessary legal steps to save the same within the period fixed by statute, their right of action is forever lost. Talbott v. Woodford (W. Va.), 37 S. E. Rep. 580; Wilsons v. Harper, 25 W. Va. 179.

Construction of Statute.—Under the provisions of Sess. Acts 1836-7, p. 11, § 10, that entry on lands must be made within seven years after such right accrued, saving to such as are infants, etc., when such right accrued and his or her heirs, three years after the removal of such disability; if such a right accrued to a feme covert, on her death, her heirs, though infants, must assert their right within the three years allowed to the heirs of persons under disabilities and are not to be regarded as infants "at the time when such right accrued to them" so as to entitle them to three years after the removal of their disability. Caperton v. Gregory, 11 Gratt. 505. See Code 1887, § 2917, affirming this doctrine.

Application of Laches to Infants While Infancy Continues.—It is true that delay in the assertion of a right, unless satisfactorily explained, operates in equity as evidence of assent, acquiescence or waiver; and laches and neglect are always discountenanced by a court of equity. Yet an infant or lunatic ought not to be prejudiced because of the failure of a next friend to institute a suit, if such suit is brought promptly after there is some one, upon whom the law imposes the obligation to guard the interest of the infant or lunatic. Knight v. Watts, 26 W. Va. 175.

After Termination of Infancy.—Delay in the assertion of a right, unless satisfactorily explained, even when it does not constitute a positive statutory bar, operates in equity as an evidence of assent, acquiescence or waiver; and especially is such the rule in suits to set aside transactions on account of infancy. Trader v. Jarvis, 23 W. Va. 100.

G. POWERS OF A COURT OF CHANCERY, ELECTION.

Infant Cannot Elect.—An infant cannot make a binding election to take land instead of money to which she was entitled and which has been invested in the land. Shanks v. Edmondson, 28 Gratt. 804.

Neither Guardian nor Trustee Can Elect for Him.—An infant is incapable of making an election, nor can his guardian or trustee elect for him. Carr v. Branch, 85 Va. 597, 8 S. E. Rep. 476.

Court of Chancery May Elect for Him.—Where land is devised to be sold, and the proceeds paid to an infant, the infant has an election to take the land or money; and if his guardian sells the land and the vendee has notice of the trust, and the sale does not appear to be advantageous to the infant, a court of equity can elect for him, and bind him by such election. Turner v. Street, 14 Am. Dec. 792, 2 Rand. 404; Carr v. Branch, 85 Va. 597, 8 S. E. Rep. 476.

Court of Chancery May Appoint Another Trustee for Infant Cestui Que Trust.—The only trustee appointed by a will to manage the estate of infants having died, and there being no provision in the will for the appointment of a successor, a court of equity will appoint one. Dunscomb v. Dunscomb, 2 H. & M. 11.

Powers over Estate of Infant Cestuis.—In Markham v. Guerrant, 4 Leigh 279, CABELL, J., and TUCKER, P., concurred in the opinion of CARR, J., holding that the prospective profits of property conveyed to a trustee for the support of a family could only be charged for necessities, even by authority of a court of chancery, with the express proviso that such decision did not deny the power of a court of chancery to authorize the sale of personal property of infant cestuis que trustent in cases where such sale should be absolutely necessary for their support.

Power of County Courts.—In 1872 the county courts had power to authorize a trustee of infants' personality to execute a mortgage thereof to secure a loan, effected in order to free it from liens. Carr v. Branch, 85 Va. 597, 8 S. E. Rep. 476.

VI. SUCCESSION TO INFANT'S ESTATE.

Under the Act of 1792.—Under the 5th, 6th, and 7th sections of the Act of 1792, "to reduce into one the several acts directing the course of descents," where an infant, having title to real estate of inheritance derived by purchase or descent immediately from the father, dies without issue, and with no brother or sister, or descendant of either; the father being dead, but the mother living; the right of inheritance is not in abeyance, but goes in parcenary to the brothers and sisters of the father, or their lineal descendants; neither the mother nor any issue she may have had by any person other than his father can inherit any part thereof; and, vice versa, such estate being derived immediately from the mother; and she being dead, but the father living, it goes in parcenary to the brothers and sisters of the mother, or their lineal descendants. Templeman v. Steptoe, 1 Munf. 339; Tomlinson v. Dillard, 3 Call 105; Addison v. Core, 2 Munf. 279; Dillard v. Tomlinson, 1 Munf. 183.

The personal estate belonging to an infant will follow the same rules of distribution and go to the same persons as the realty. Tomlinson v. Dillard, 3 Call 105; Dillard v. Tomlinson, 1 Munf. 183.

The true construction of the 7th section of the act of 1792 "reducing into one the several acts directing the course of descents," as to the case of an infant, is, that if there be no mother, etc., and the estate was derived from the father or mother, the inheritance shall not be divided into moieties, but the whole shall go to the kindred of that parent from whom the estate was derived. Addison v. Core, 2 Munf. 279.

The Grandmother Excluded.—Under the 5th section of the Act of Descents of 1792, where an infant died without issue, having title to certain real estate derived by descent immediately from the father; leaving no relations in the paternal line, but a grandmother and uncle, the grandmother was not entitled to inherit any part of such estate, but the paternal uncle was entitled to the whole. But see Rev. Code of 1819, ch. 96, sec. 11, 12, vol. 1, p. 356; Ligon v. Fuqua, 6 Munf. 281.

Profits Follow the Corpus of the Estate.—The profits of the estate of an infant dying intestate (including the increase of slaves) accruing to such infant in his lifetime but not applied to his use or otherwise lawfully disposed of ought to go to the person inheriting such estate generally. Dillard v. Tomlinson, 1 Munf. 183.

Acts Do Not Apply Where Property Is Not Derived Immediately from Father to Mother.—But neither the mother nor her issue is excluded, where the property is derived, not immediately, but by intervening succession, from the father. Dillard v. Tomlinson, 1 Munf. 183.

Present Statute.—Under the present statute the real estate of an infant dying without issue under twenty-one passes to his heirs on the part of the parent from whom the estate was derived. Vaughan v. Jones, 23 Gratt. 444; Code Va. 1887, § 2556.

VII. ESTOPPEL.

Estoppel Binding on Infants but Mere Silence Not Sufficient.—BRANNON, J., said obiter in Williamson v. Jones, 43 W. Va. 562, 27 S. E. Rep. 411, that, by the weight of authority, an infant of years of discretion, by intentional fraudulent misconduct, sufficient to raise an estoppel, if unconnected with contract, will be barred, under the doctrine of estoppel in pais, from asserting his title to either real or personal property against one misled thereby. But it was held in that case that mere silence or acquiescence would not be sufficient.

VIII. COMMITMENT OF INFANT TO REFORMATORY.

Under the general provision of the statute (Acts 1895-96, p. 658), the hustings court has power, in its discretion, to commit the accused to the Prison Association before conviction, and the proviso only limits that power in the case of those minors who have a parent or legal guardian to consent; in such cases, their consent must be obtained in order to commit before conviction. Where it appears, however, as in the case at bar, that there is neither parent nor legal guardian to consent, the general provision of the act prevails, and the court has authority, in its discretion, to commit before conviction. Napier v. Prison Ass'n, 95 Va. 431, 28 S. E. Rep. 598.

1. Tax Titles—Deed from Deputy Sheriff—What Party Claiming under It Must Show.—A party claiming title under a deed from a deputy sheriff for land sold for nonpayment of taxes under the act of February 9th, 1814, must show that the person described as high sheriff was such, and the grantor in the deed was his deputy.

2. Same—Same—Recital of Insufficient Advertisement—Effect.—Though such deed recites an insufficient advertisement of the property conveyed, it is not thereby vitiated; but is valid to convey such title as by law the sheriff was authorized to convey.

deposition purporting in the caption to have been taken in the state and county designated in the commission and notice, and certified by a person who adds to his name the letters J. P., is duly authenticated.

This was a writ of right brought in the Circuit court of Giles county by Thomas J. Hobbs against Thompson and Wilson Shumate, for the recovery of a tract of land containing fifty acres. On the trial the demandant having first proved that Michael Erskine was deputy sheriff of Monroe county, Virginia, at the time he sold and conveyed to William Vawter under whom the demandant claims, the land which is alleged by the demandant to be the land in controversy, then proposed to offer in evidence the deed executed by Erskine to Vawter. This deed bore date the 30th day of August 1815, and purported to be by Michael Erskine, deputy for William Haynes, high sheriff of the county of Monroe, of the one part, and William Vawter of the other part; and recited that Erskine as deputy of Haynes, sheriff, "after having given notice by advertisement as well in the Virginia Argus, a public paper, as at the court-house door of the said county, agreeably to law, previous to the August court of said county, did expose to sale at 517 said court-house whilst the court was in session, at the August term *aforesaid, the lands heretofore returned delinquent for the nonpayment of taxes due thereon in the county aforesaid; whereupon William Vawter became the purchaser of a tract of land containing fifty thousand acres, which formerly belonged to and was returned delinquent in the name of, Andrew Beirs for the years," &c.: And it then proceeded to convey the land to Vawter. The tenants objected to the introduction of the evidence; and the court refused to permit the deed to go in evidence before the jury as anything or for any purpose, save that of color of title, until the demandant should first establish that all the requirements of the law as to the sale had been complied with: And the demandant excepted.

The demandants further offered in evidence the deposition of Erskine, who lived in Texas. The commission under which this deposition was taken, was directed to any commissioner appointed by the governor of Virginia, or to any justice or notary public of Guadalupe county, in the state of Texas. The deposition purported on its face to have been taken in that county; and the certificate was headed, "State of Texas, Guadalupe county, to wit:" and was signed, "S. B. Moore, J. P. (Seal.)" The court refused to admit the evidence: and the demandant again excepted.

There was a verdict and judgment for the tenants, whereupon the demandant applied to this court for a supersedeas, which was awarded.

N. Harrison, for the appellant.
Caperton, for the appellees.

ALLEN, P. This was a writ of right, in which there was a verdict and judgment for the tenant. On the trial the demandant filed two bills of exceptions to decisions of the court against him. By 518 the first bill *of exceptions it appears, that the demandant having first proved that Michael Erskine was deputy sheriff of Monroe county at the time he sold and conveyed to William Vawter under whom the demandant claimed the land alleged by him to be the land in controversy, proposed to offer a deed in evidence which is set forth in the bill of exceptions. It purports to be a deed executed by said Erskine, deputy for William Haynes, high sheriff of Monroe county, to said Vawter, and recites that pursuant to the act concerning taxes on land, passed on the 9th of February 1814, the said Erskine, as such deputy, after having given notice by advertisement in the Virginia Argus, a public paper, and at the court-house door of said county, according to law, previous to August court, exposed to sale at said court, the lands theretofore returned delinquent for the nonpayment of taxes in said county; and thereupon William Vawter became the purchaser of a tract of fifty thousand acres, which formerly belonged to, and was returned delinquent in the name of, Andrew Beirs, for the sum of five hundred and ninety-four dollars and twenty-four cents, &c. But the court refused to permit the deed to go in evidence as anything or for any purpose, save that of color of title, until the demandant should first establish that all the requirements of the law as to the sale had been complied with.

This court decided in the case of Flanagan v. Grimmer, 10 Gratt. 421, that a deed containing such recital of the circumstances of the sale, if shown to have been executed by a duly qualified officer authorized by the law to sell lands returned delinquent for nonpayment of taxes, and to execute a conveyance to the purchaser, furnished prima facie evidence of the transfer of such title to the purchaser as, at the time the land was returned delinquent, was vested in the 519 person in whose name it was returned, his heirs, &c. *But that said deed was liable to be impeached, after the time for redemption allowed by the law had elapsed, by proof of irregularity appearing on the face of the proceedings; or by the fact appearing on the face of the proceedings, that the arrearage of taxes, for the nonpayment of which the land was sold, did not exist, according to section 38 of the act of February 9th, 1814. The onus probandi is cast upon the contesting party, to show by the face of the proceedings, such irregularity as affected the validity of the deed.

A similar principle has been established in the state of Kentucky, although it does not appear that their law contained any provision similar to the 38th section of the act of February 1814. By the law of that state the register was directed to sell such lands at the state-house, after advertising the sale, &c.; and he was empowered to execute deeds for the lands sold. Under this law it has been held in numerous instances, that the deed of the register, purporting to have been made for the sale of land for taxes, implies prima facie, a compliance with the requisitions of the laws under which the land was sold and the deed executed, liable to be repelled by proof that the law was not regularly pursued in making the sale; and that it is not necessary to the validity of the register's deed that it should recite that the land had been advertised according to the statute. Allen v. Robinson, 3 Bibb's R. 326; Graves v. Hayden, 2 Litt. R. 62; Hickman v. Skinner, 3 Monr. 210; Terry v. Bleight, Id. 271; Currie v. Fowler, 5 J. J. Marsh. R. 145. The statute in Virginia gives the same effect to the sheriff's deed which the courts of Kentucky ascribed to the deed of the register, because he was an officer of government presumed to do his duty; and the 38th section of the act of February 9th, 1814, limits the proof to repel this prima facie presumption, to irregularities, &c., appearing on the face of the proceedings.

520 *The decision of the court excluding the deed, until the party offering it established that all the requirements of the law as to such sale, had been complied with, reversed this rule, and cast the onus probandi on the grantee, instead of the contesting party. In this case it is stated that the demandant having first proved that said Michael Erskine was deputy sheriff at the time of said sale and conveyance, offered the deed in evidence. The bill of exceptions does not state in so many words, that he had proved that William Haynes was high sheriff. In Rockbold v. Barnes, 3 Rand. 473, it was held that where land was sold and a deed made by the deputy sheriff, it was indispensably necessary that there should be proof that one was sheriff and the other was deputy. In Flanagan v. Grimmer it did not appear from the bill of exceptions taken to the decision of the court rejecting the deed, that any such proof had been offered. This court held under the authority referred to, that such proof was necessary. But as the bill of exceptions did not purport to set out all the evidence, and as it appeared that the court, when the deed was first offered, rejected it as evidence, for objections appearing on the face thereof, thereby precluding any further proof in relation thereto, if such proof had not been offered or waived; the court below deciding upon the invalidity of the deed alone, and the bill of exceptions intending to present for revision the single question so decided; this court considering that decision erroneous, reversed the judgment, and remanded the cause for a new trial, with instructions to admit the deed as prima facie evidence of such title as, according to the 37th section of the said act, it purported to vest in the purchaser, upon proof that the person therein named as sheriff, was sheriff, and the other was deputy sheriff. In this case, perhaps by a liberal construction of the bill of exceptions, it might be considered there was such proof, as it sets out that there was proof that Michael Erskine 521 *was deputy, from which it might be inferred there had been proof that William Haynes was high sheriff. But be that as it may, the bill of exceptions shows that no objection was made to the deed on that account. The proof may have been offered, or have been waived, or probably if required, could readily have been supplied, if the deed had not been rejected for the purpose for which it was offered, on other grounds. Those grounds are set forth, and the bill of exceptions was designed to present for revision in the appellate court the correctness of that decision. In the judgment of the court, upon the question thus raised there was error, according to the decision of this court in the case referred to: it not being incumbent on the purchaser holding under such a deed to do more to entitle himself to the benefit thereof, than prove its execution and the official characters of the sheriff and deputy sheriff.

I think the court erred also, in excluding the deposition set forth in the second bill of exceptions upon the ground that it was not properly authenticated. The case falls within the principle decided in Pollard's heirs v. Lively, 2 Gratt. 216, which held that a certificate such as is found in this case, headed with the state and county, and signed by the party taking the deposition with his name and the letters J. P. is sufficient evidence of the fact that the deposition was taken by a justice of the peace.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of ALLEN, J.

Judgment reversed.

*Hill v. Manser & al.

July Term, 1854, Lewisburg.

1. Forthcoming Bonds—Rights of Sureties—Subrogation.—A surety in a forfeited forthcoming bond is a surety for the debt; and when he pays it as such surety, he is entitled to all the rights of the creditor against the original debtor, subsisting at the time he became bound for the debt. And the judgment, for the benefit of the surety so paying, is not extinguished but transferred with all its obligatory force against the principal, and constitutes a legal lien upon his real estate owned at the date of the judgment or afterwards acquired.

Forthcoming Bonds—Right of Surety to Subrogation.

—A surety in a forthcoming bond is a surety for the debt, and, when he pays it, he is entitled to all the rights of the creditor against the original debtor subsisting at the time he became bound for the debt: thus he is subrogated to the benefit of the lien of the original judgment against the land of a judgment debtor. On this specific point the principal case is cited in Neal v. Buffington, 42 W. Va. 330, 26 S. E. Rep. 173; Cooper v. Daugherty, 85 Va. 350, 7 S. E. Rep. 387. The principal case cites Garland v. Lynch, 1 Rob.

2. Same—Same—Same—Evidence—Receipt from Creditor.—The surety in the forthcoming bond pays to the creditor a sum certain on the execution issued, on the bond, against the principal and himself, and takes a receipt as for money paid by him. The evidence of payment afforded by the receipt will not be repelled by proof of loose declarations that he had loaned the money to the principal debtor, who was his brother, so as to deprive him of the right to be substituted to the rights and remedies of the creditor.

3. Same—Same—Same—Case at Bar.—The creditor having taken a deed of trust from the principal debtor to secure his debt; and the debtor having subsequently given another deed of trust upon the same and other property to secure debts due to a third party, one of which was for money loaned to pay a balance due upon the judgment, of which this third party had notice, the surety in the forthcoming bond is entitled to have the property embraced in the first deed of trust applied to satisfy the amounts he has paid, with interest on so much thereof as went to discharge the principal of the debt; and if that property does not discharge it, to have the land embraced in the second deed subjected to discharge the balance.

In October 1840 Samuel McD. Moore recovered a judgment in the Circuit court of Fayette county against John Hill, for one thousand six hundred dollars, with interest. On this judgment an execution was issued, on which Hill executed a forthcoming bond with Hiram Hill and Pleasant Hawkins as his sureties. This forthcoming bond was forfeited, and execution was awarded against all the parties in August 1841: And the execution was returned levied, and the property sold for want of bidders.

523 *By deed bearing date the 12th of May 1842, John Hill conveyed to Hudson M. Dickenson two tracts of land, some slaves and other personal property, in trust, that if Hill did not pay the debt due to Moore by the 15th of the next August, the trustee should sell the property upon ten days' notice, for cash, and apply the proceeds to the payment of the debt.

545; Powell v. White, 11 Leigh 309; Robinson v. Sherman, 2 Gratt. 178, and Leake v. Ferguson, 2 Gratt. 419, as authorizing this proposition. For further information as to the rights of sureties in forthcoming bonds to subrogation, see monographic note on "Statutory Bonds" appended to Goolsby v. Strother, 21 Gratt. 107.

The rule above laid down grows out of the more general proposition—than which none seems better settled—that where a security pays a judgment (or other debt) for another he is entitled to be substituted to all the rights and remedies of the creditor against the principal debtor, subsisting at the time he became so bound for the debt. For this proposition, the principal case is cited as authority in Dent v. Wait, 9 W. Va. 44; Myers v. Miller, 45 W. Va. 613, 31 S. E. Rep. 983. See, in accord, Kendrick v. Forney, 22 Gratt. 748, and foot-note; Watts v. Kinney, 3 Leigh 273, 23 Am. Dec. 266; McClung v. Belrne, 10 Leigh 394; Enders v. Brune, 4 Rand. 488. See also, collection of cases, on the subject of subrogation in regard to sureties, in foot-note to Buchanan v. Clark, 10 Gratt. 164.

On the 2d of September Moore received from Hiram Hill in money, fee bills and bonds, the sum of five hundred dollars, and he gave to him a receipt of that date, for that sum received on account of Moore's execution against John Hill and others, issued from the Circuit court of Fayette county. On the same day John Hill and wife conveyed to Dickenson and William Tyree a number of tracts of land, including the two previously conveyed to Dickenson, and the slaves included in said deed, to secure a large amount of debt for which Miles Manser was bound, and also the sum of five hundred dollars, which Manser had agreed to pay to Moore in part satisfaction of his debt. And on the 16th of March 1844 John Hill and wife conveyed to the same trustee, other lands and some personal property to secure some of the same and other debts, which were due to Manser, or for which he was bound, one of which was the five hundred dollars which Manser had paid to Moore.

In June 1849 Hiram Hill filed his bill in the Circuit court of Fayette county, in which he stated the foregoing facts; and insisted that he was entitled to be substituted to the rights and remedies of Moore, to the extent of the sum of five hundred dollars, which he had paid upon the debt due from John Hill to Moore. And making John Hill, Manser and the trustees Dickenson and Tyree, parties defendants, he prayed that the court would enforce the judgment lien and other securities of Moore, by a sale of the incumbered property, or a sufficiency thereof, to pay off the 524 debt due *to Moore; and that he might be substituted to the benefit of the same to the full amount he had paid, with interest; and for general relief.

Manser answered the bill; and denied that the plaintiff had paid five hundred dollars, or any other sum, as the security of John Hill. He said that the money, fee bills and bonds mentioned in the receipt of Moore, were advanced by the plaintiff not as a payment, but to accommodate his brother, and to get some foreign fee bills settled; and hence he made the arrangement, not as a payment as surety, but as an advance to his brother by way of loan: And therefore, he insisted, the doctrine of substitution did not apply to the case. That at the time he took the securities from John Hill mentioned in the bill, he had no notice of any claim upon the property by lien of any kind held by the plaintiff. And that he had paid off the debt to Moore, and therefore on that account he would be entitled to substitution to all the securities of said Moore which he had at the time of payment.

Witnesses were examined, who spoke of conversations with Hiram Hill, in which they understood him to speak of the five hundred dollars he had paid to Moore, as a loan to his brother John Hill; but the money was in fact paid by Hiram Hill to Moore, and it seems to have been considered by both John Hill and Moore to have been a payment by Hiram Hill.

The cause came on to be heard in September 1851, when the court dismissed the bill with costs.

And thereupon Hiram Hill applied to this court for an appeal, which was allowed.

Caperton, for the appellant.

Price, for the appellee.

ALLEN, P., delivered the opinion of the court:

The court is of opinion that the 525 appellant as surety *for John Hill in a forthcoming bond which was forfeited, became thereby surety for the debt; and when he paid the same as such surety, he became entitled upon the principles of a court of equity, to all the rights of the creditor against the original debtor, subsisting at the time he became so bound for the debt; and that the judgment for the benefit of the surety so paying, is not regarded as extinguished, but transferred with all its obligatory force against the principal, and constituting a legal lien upon his real estate owned at the date of the judgment, and thereafter acquired. Garland v. Lynch, 1 Rob. R. 545; Powell's ex'ors v. White, 11 Leigh 309; Robinson v. Sherman, 2 Gratt. 178; Leake v. Ferguson, 2 Gratt. 419.

The court is further of opinion, that the receipt of the creditor dated the 2d of September 1842, shows that the appellant on that day paid the sum of five hundred dollars to the creditor on account of the execution issued on said forfeited bond, against his principal and himself; and the evidence in the record, of loose declarations that he loaned his principal that sum, or that the witnesses understood it was a loan, do not show any intention on the part of the appellant, to waive any legal right, or that in fact he knew at the time of such payment, that the law raised any such right of substitution for his benefit.

The court is further of opinion, that it fully appears that the appellee had full notice of said judgment when he took from the said John Hill the deed of trust of the 2d day of September 1842; as by the terms of said deed, provision was made thereby to indemnify the appellee for the sum of five hundred dollars, which he had bound himself to pay on said judgment, for said John Hill at a future day.

The court is further of opinion, that the appellee is not entitled to priority on account of the payment of said last mentioned sum: no such claim is set up in 526 *the answer; and the appellee not being surety, if he intended or contemplated relying on previous liens, should have taken a transfer thereof; his was a loan to John Hill, for the security of which, together with other claims against said John Hill, he took his deed of trust aforesaid, and upon which alone he must rely.

The court is further of opinion, that as it appears the said John Hill by a deed of trust duly executed, and acknowledged, and recorded on the 12th day of May 1842, conveyed sundry lands, together with personal property, to a certain Hudson M. Dickenson, in trust for the security and payment of said debt, the appellant is entitled to be substituted to the rights of the creditor under said deed of trust, and to require a sale by the trustee of the property conveyed by said deed of trust, or so much thereof as may be forthcoming, and the application of the proceeds thereof, or so much as may be necessary to pay said sum of five hundred dollars, with interest from the 2d of September 1842, on so much thereof as at the time of payment was applicable to the principal of said execution. And if the property described in said deed of trust of the 12th of May 1842, or so much thereof as may be forthcoming, should prove insufficient to pay said sum of five hundred dollars, with interest as aforesaid, then that the appellant should be at liberty to resort to any other lands owned by said John Hill at the date of said judgment, or afterwards acquired, for satisfaction.

The court is therefore of opinion, that said decree is erroneous, and it is reversed with costs against the appellant; and the cause is remanded to be further proceeded in according to the principles of the foregoing opinion and decree, in order to a final decree.

DANIEL and MONCURE, Js., dissented.

Decree reversed.

*Harrison v. Middleton.

July Term, 1854, Lewisburg.

(Absent ALLEN, P.)

1. Unlawful Detainer—Removal of Cause.—If a case of unlawful detainer has been pending in a County court for more than twelve months without a final decision, it may be removed, on motion, to the Circuit court.
2. Civil Actions—Removal of Cause.—All civil causes of which the Circuit court has either original or appellate jurisdiction, may be removed from the County to the Circuit court, upon motion, after they have been pending in the County court for one year.
3. Unlawful Detainer—Removed—Order of Hearing.—An unlawful detainer case removed to the Circuit court is properly placed on the docket at the head of the civil causes in the court.
4. Evidence—Witnesses—Refreshing Memory—Use of Paper.†—A witness may refresh his memory by Civil Actions in County Court—Removal after Pending Twelve Months.—The principal case holds that all civil causes (of which unlawful detainer is one) of which the circuit court has either original or appellate jurisdiction, may be removed from the county to the circuit court, upon motion, after they have been pending in the county court for one year. For the above proposition the principal case is cited and approved in the following cases: Hale v. Burwell, 2 P. & H. 610; Kincheloe v. Tracewells, 11 Gratt. 598; Gas Co. v. Wheeling, 7 W. Va. 25. See generally, monographic note on "Unlawful Detainer" appended to Dobson v. Culpepper, 23 Gratt. 352.

†Evidence—Witnesses—Refreshing Memory—Use of Paper.—For the proposition that a witness may reference to a paper, whether an original or a copy, and whether written by himself or another; but he must then speak from his own recollection thus refreshed.

5. Same—Same—Surveyors—Use of Diagram.‡—But a surveyor who made a survey from a diagram handed him by the plaintiff, and which he has in court, may refer for the courses and distances to the diagram, though he may not be able to remember them independent of the diagram. The diagram is itself evidence, and he may point out on it what lines he ran.
6. Same—Same—Same—Extract of Field Notes.—An extract or copy taken by a surveyor from his field notes, is not evidence; and he can only use it to refresh his memory; and must then speak from his recollection.
7. Same—Same—Interest—Case at Bar.—A witness is offered to be introduced, who is objected to as being interested, and proof aliunde of his interest is introduced. He is then examined by the party offering him, on his voir dire to show that he has no interest, and this is objected to by the other party; but before he is sworn in chief, a deed is produced which shows he has no interest. If it was error to examine him on his voir dire it was cured by the introduction of the proof of his want of interest, before he was sworn in chief.
8. Landlord and Tenant—Agreement to Surrender Possession When Desired—Effect.—An agreement under seal by a tenant that he will surrender possession whenever a purchaser from the landlord requires it, constitutes him a tenant at will or at sufferance; and he is not entitled to six months' notice to quit.
9. Same—Tenant Holding Adversely—Right to Notice of Suit.—If a tenant claims to hold adversely to his landlord, he is not entitled to notice.

528 *10. Same—Unlawful Detainer—Who Should Bring Suit.‡—A landlord sells land in possession of his tenant, by agreement under seal, and the tenant refuses to deliver possession; the landlord is the proper party to institute a proceeding of unlawful detainer, to obtain possession.

refresh his memory by reference to a paper, whether an original or a copy, and whether written by himself or another; but he must then speak from his own recollection thus refreshed, the principal case is cited and followed in Vinal v. Gilman, 21 W. Va. 307.

‡Same—Same—Use of Diagram Made by Witness.—For the proposition that a map or a diagram made by a witness, and shown by him to be correct, may be given in evidence and shown to the jury for their consideration, see in accord with the principal case, Poling v. Ohio River R. Co., 38 W. Va. 645, 18 S. E. Rep. 782.

§Unlawful Detainer—Who Should Bring Action.—In Hawkins v. Wilson, 1 W. Va. 121, where the vendee in an executory contract for the purchase of land brought unlawful detainer against the vendor for the possession of the land, the court said: "In Middleton v. Harrison, 11 Gratt., it was held that 'a landlord who sells land, in the possession of his tenant, by agreement under seal, and the tenant refuses to deliver possession,' the landlord is the proper party to institute a proceeding of unlawful detainer to obtain possession." This affirms the right of the vendor, in an executory contract for the sale of land, to bring the suit to obtain the possession. And the inference would seem fair that the converse of the proposition was equally true.

11. Evidence—Deeds Collaterally Introduced—How Non-execution May Be Shown.—If a deed of a defendant is introduced collaterally upon the trial, as evidence, he may show that it is not his deed, without making oath to the fact: And for this purpose may introduce a subscribing witness to it, to prove that it was misread to the defendant.

12. Same—Proof That Deed Misunderstood—Admissibility—Case at Bar.—Proof that the deed when read was understood in a very material respect as different from what it is, may tend to show that it was misread, and therefore is competent evidence. But if the deed was correctly read, the misunderstanding of it by a party cannot affect its validity as a deed.

This was a writ of unlawful detainer brought in the county of Jackson, by Henry O. Middleton against Josiah Harrison, to recover possession of a tract of seven thousand nine hundred and twenty-three acres of land. The case was docketed in the County court of Jackson in June 1847, and was continued on the docket of that court without a trial until August 1848, when the court being about to adjourn, on the motion of the plaintiff, it was ordered that the case be removed to the Circuit court of Jackson county. And in September of the same year, the plaintiff produced in that court the original papers, and the orders made in the cause, and on his motion it was docketed, and was placed at the head of the civil causes on the docket.

At the August term 1850 of the Circuit court, when the cause was called, the defendant by his counsel, moved the court to strike it from the docket, on the ground that it was not one of the cases contemplated by the act of March 28th, 1843. Sess. Acts 1842-43, ch. 9. But the motion was overruled by the court: And he excepted. The defendant then moved the court to place the cause on what he insisted was its proper place on the docket, viz: only before such cases as had been brought in that court after the cause had been docketed that the vendee in an executory contract for the purchase of land, could not bring the suit to obtain the possession.

"But when the case of Middleton v. Harrison is carefully considered, it will be found to embrace both propositions, substantially. For the learned and able judge of the circuit court of Jackson county, who tried the cause in the court below, instructed the jury substantially to that effect. And JUDGE MONCURE, in delivering the opinion of the court of appeals, says expressly that, 'in regard to the instructions, I think the court did not err in refusing to give those which were asked for by the parties, or in giving those which were given by the court.'"

[Evidence—Proof That Deed Misunderstood—Admissibility.]—In the last headnote of the principal case it is held that, proof that the deed when read was understood in a very material respect as different from what it is, may tend to show that it was misread, and therefore is competent evidence. In a long quotation from the principal case on this point, the court, in Morrow v. Bailey, 2 W. Va. 829, says that this is certainly the settled law in this state.

there. But the court overruled the motion, because the case occupied the place on the *docket which it had occupied ever since it had come into the court; and had priority over all civil causes in the County court, and was entitled to the same priority in the Circuit court that it had in that court. And the defendant again excepted.

On the trial of the cause the plaintiff introduced in evidence an agreement between himself and the defendant, bearing date the 22nd of February 1847, in relation to the land in controversy. This agreement recited that Harrison lived on a tract of land of seven thousand nine hundred and twenty-three acres, patented to Thomas A. Taylor, under Taylor's representatives, as tenant; that Middleton had become the owner of the tract, and had sold it, and wished immediate possession: And then Harrison agreed to surrender the plantation and houses by the 10th of April 1847, and to surrender the farm at any time that William Fisher (the purchaser from the said Middleton) may think proper to take possession. And in consideration of Harrison's agreeing to give up as aforesaid, Middleton agreed to refer it to arbitrators to say what Harrison should be allowed for his improvements beyond the use of the plantation for the time he had enjoyed it. And it was agreed that on signing that agreement, all controversy between the parties was to be at an end; and that Harrison was to give up to Middleton all claims and leases theretofore set up by him. The agreement was under seal and attested by three witnesses, of whom Alexander Harrison was one. The plaintiff also introduced the patent under which he claimed, which was a grant in 1786 to Thomas A. Taylor. He then called a witness, who stated that some years previous to the trial he surveyed two or three of the lines of the survey on which the defendant Harrison lived. That when he ran these lines he had no authentic document to run them by; and only had a paper with a diagram of the seven thousand nine *hundred and twenty-three acre tract, which paper had an endorsement on it in the handwriting of the plaintiff, stating that it was the tract on which defendant lived; and which diagram was made by the plaintiff. To this diagram the witness referred for courses and distances, and admitted that he did not remember how far he had run or what courses he had run, without reference to said paper, and did not remember either course or distance independent of the paper. To the witness refreshing his memory from said paper, the defendant objected, which objection was overruled by the court; and the witness often referred to the paper to refresh his memory; the court directing the witness not to state anything set out in the paper; but only to state what acts he did in running the lines aforesaid, and what he found on the ground. To this the defendant again excepted.

The same witness, in order to answer

other questions propounded to him by the plaintiff, referred to a memorandum made by himself but two days before the trial, copied by him from his field notes of the survey before spoken of; the said field notes being then at his home; but he did not pretend to say that he recollected the courses or distances deposed to from said memorandum independent thereof. This evidence was also objected to by the defendant, because the original field notes from which the copy was taken, were not produced: But this objection was also overruled; and the witness was permitted to refer to said paper to refresh his recollection of the running of the lines done by him. And to this the defendant again excepted.

In the further progress of the trial William Fisher was offered as a witness, and was objected to by the defendant; who offered the agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant, before mentioned, to prove his interest. This agreement stated that the land in controversy had been sold by the plaintiff to Fisher.

531 *The plaintiff then proposed to examine Fisher on his voir dire, to show that the agreement for the sale to him had been rescinded; and that he had no interest in the controversy. To this the defendant objected, because he had shown the interest of the witness otherwise than by his own oath. But the objection was overruled; and the witness was sworn on his voir dire, and stated that he had no interest, because he and the plaintiff had, by a contract made on the 5th of August 1847, rescinded the previous contract between them: And this contract of the 5th of August was produced, and provided especially for the rescission of the previous contract for the sale of the land in the possession of the defendant. To this the defendant again excepted. This witness being sworn in chief, stated that previous to his purchase from the plaintiff he had heard the defendant say that he had no title to the soil on which he lived, and did not claim the land. And that in the spring of 1847 he was with the defendant, but not on or near the land, and asked him if he would give up its possession, to which the defendant replied that he would not.

In the further progress of the trial the defendant offered Alexander Harrison as a witness. He was a subscribing witness to the agreement aforesaid of the 22d of February 1847, between the plaintiff and defendant, and had been previously sworn and examined as to that fact by the plaintiff. This witness was offered by the defendant to prove that at the time of the execution of that agreement, both the witness and the defendant, who was the father of the witness, understood said paper, which is in the handwriting of the plaintiff, as referring the title to the land to the arbitrators therein named; and that the witness was present when it was read to the defendant; and that both the witness and the defendant did not understand or believe that the said paper made the 532 defendant the tenant *of the plaintiff, nor did they know that such a thing was in the paper. And further that both the witness and the defendant understood said paper as it was read to them, as simply referring to the arbitrators the question of right to the land; and not that the defendant had thereby given up his right to it, and referred to the arbitrators the defendant's title to compensation for his improvements to be set off against the rents of the land. To the admission of this evidence the plaintiff objected, and the court sustained the objection: And the defendant again excepted.

After the evidence in the cause had been introduced, the plaintiff moved for an instruction to the jury, "that if they believed all the evidence before them, the plaintiff had a right to maintain his suit at the time of its institution, and was entitled to recover in this action." The court thereupon enquired whether the defendant intended to ask for any instructions; when he by his counsel objected to the instruction asked for by the plaintiff as being too broad and general, and asked the court to instruct the jury as follows:

1. That if they believed, from the evidence before them, that the defendant was, at the time of the institution of this suit, a tenant of the plaintiff, he was entitled to six months' notice to quit before he could be turned out as unlawfully detaining the land under the contract of February 1847: and that the language of said contract, "to surrender the farm at any time that William Fisher the purchaser of Middleton might think proper to take possession," was not a certain time either in contemplation of law, or by the true interpretation of the contract.

2. If the jury were satisfied from the evidence before them, that before the institution of this suit, William Fisher had purchased the land in controversy of the plaintiff, and that such purchase, at the time this suit was instituted, was in 533 force and not rescinded, *the plaintiff had no right to the possession of said land, and could not maintain this suit against the defendant.

There was a third instruction asked by the defendant substantially the same as the second.

The court refused to give the instruction asked for by the plaintiff, because it was too general, and because it called on the court to decide upon the sufficiency of the evidence before the jury; and declining to give the instructions asked for by the defendant in the form in which they were asked, proceeded to instruct the jury, "that if they believed from the evidence, that the defendant was at the time of the institution of this suit, a tenant from year to year of the plaintiff, he was entitled to six months' notice to quit; and he would not be liable to be turned out of possession of the land in controversy without such notice: But if they should believe from the evidence, that the tenant was a tenant to the plaintiff, and that his time was to end at a certain time, that then no notice to quit would be necessary. The court further instructed the jury, that that part of the contract of the 22d of February 1847, which provides for the surrender of the farm at any time that William Fisher might think proper to take possession, would not necessarily create a tenancy from year to year, and entitle the defendant to six months' notice; and that if the evidence satisfied the jury that a demand of the possession had been made of the defendant by the said Fisher, and the defendant had refused to surrender such possession, it was not necessary to give the defendant six months' notice before the institution of this suit.

The court further instructed the jury, that they must be satisfied from the evidence, before they could render a verdict for the plaintiff, that at the time of the institution of this suit the plaintiff had the right of possession to the premises in controversy in this suit, and that the contract of the 22d of February 534 *1847, between the plaintiff and the defendant, did not in the opinion of the court, of itself furnish such evidence of a transfer of the right of possession from the plaintiff Middleton to Fisher, as to disable the plaintiff from maintaining this action in his own name, provided he has shown himself otherwise entitled to maintain it; or that the said contract so transferred to or vested in the said Fisher such right of possession as would have enabled him to maintain this action against the defendant. To the refusal of the court to give the instructions asked by him, and to the giving the instructions given by the court, the defendant excepted. There was then a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff; and on the application of the defendant, a supersedeas was awarded by this court.

Fisher, for the appellant, insisted:

1. That this was not a case which could be removed from the County to the Circuit court. That the case having arisen before the 1st of July 1850, the question was to be determined under the act of March 28th, 1843, Sess. Acts of 1842-43, ch. 9, § 4, p. 17. That from the time when the constitution of 1829 went into operation, the County and Circuit courts had concurrent jurisdiction in chancery causes; and in 1838 the act was passed authorizing the removal of such causes from the County to the Circuit courts; but that this act only applied where the Circuit court had original jurisdiction of the subject matter involved in the cause. In March 1843 the act was passed allowing the removal of common law causes "upon the same terms and in the same manner in all respects as if it were a suit in equity;" and therefore this act must be construed to apply to the same class of cases as the act of February 1838; which were cases in which the Circuit court might have taken original jurisdiction. This construction was confirmed by the act of Feb-

535 ruary *7th, 1849, Sess. Acts 1848-49, ch. 75, § 1, p. 42, in relation to the removal of causes where the amount in controversy was under fifty dollars. And he insisted that this being indisputably a cause of which the Circuit court could not have taken original jurisdiction, it was therefore illegally removed to the Circuit court, and was therefore coram non iudice, and all the proceedings were null and of no effect.

2. That although a case of unlawful detainer has priority in some cases, yet that there is no law which gives it this priority where the special court fails to meet, and the cause goes regularly on the docket of the County court.

3. That the court erred in permitting the witness to refer to the diagram and a copy of his field notes, and to state facts from them, of which he could not speak of his own recollection. 1 Greenl. Evi. § 436; 1 Stark. Evi. 128; Doe ex dem. Church v. Perkins, 3 T. R. 749.

4. That the court erred in swearing the witness Fisher to ascertain his want of interest, after the defendant had proved his interest. Vincent v. Huff's lessee, 4 Serg. & Rawle 298; 2 Stark. Evi. 756; Offutt v. Twyman, 9 Dana's R. 43.

5. That the court erred in excluding the evidence to prove that the agreement of the 27th February 1847 had been misread to the defendant. If the paper had been the foundation of an action of covenant, the evidence would have been admissible: And it was a fortiori admissible when the paper was offered collaterally. 1 Chitty's Plead. 479; Van Valkenburgh v. Rouk, 12 John. R. 337; Taylor v. King, 6 Munf. 358. This last case is conclusive of the question. It decides that if a paper is misread to a party, he may plead non est factum.

6. That the court erred in refusing to give the instructions asked for by the 536 defendant. The contract *under which the plaintiff claims bears date in February 1847; and that shows he had sold the land to Fisher. The proceeding was commenced in June of that year; and the contract with Fisher for the rescission of the sale bears date in August. Not the plaintiff but Fisher was entitled to the possession at the time this proceeding was commenced. Or if Fisher was not the party to bring this action, neither can the plaintiff do it. Fisher had purchased from him, and he claimed as purchaser from Taylor's heirs under whom Harrison had been in possession for years. If Fisher's purchase from the plaintiff did not authorize him to sue, neither could the plaintiff's purchase from Taylor's heirs, it not appearing that he had received a conveyance, entitle the plaintiff to sue.

But further: A tenant is entitled to six months' notice to quit. It is true this law does not apply to a tenancy which is to determine at a fixed period, nor where there is an express agreement to dispense with notice. But the only time fixed, and the only agreement, is when Fisher shall think proper to take possession; which is neither certain as to time, nor does it dispense with notice: Nor indeed is there satisfactory proof of any demand of possession by Fisher.

7. That the instructions given by the court were improper and erroneous: Improper, because the instructions were not asked for by either party; and because it referred the construction of the written agreement to the jury, when it should have been construed by the court: And it was erroneous, in so far as it varied from the instruction asked for by the defendant.

Price, for the appellee:

The first point made by the appellant's counsel must depend upon the construction of the act of March 28th, 1843. That 537 act says, "Whenever any civil *action in a court of law shall have been, or shall hereafter be, pending in a county court for the space of one year without a final decision thereof having been made, it shall be lawful," &c. Is this a civil action? If it is, and who doubts it, it is embraced within the terms of the law. It is equally embraced within the spirit and object of the act. The object is to obviate the delays of the county court. It is true the act refers to the act of 1838, but that relates to the time and manner of removing the cause. The object of the statute and its language apply to all cases in which the Circuit court has either original or appellate jurisdiction.

Upon the second point made by the appellant's counsel, the court allowed the witness to refer to the papers to refresh his memory, but he was only to state what he then remembered. And this seems to be the settled rule on the subject. 1 Greenl. Evi. § 436. This author says, it is not necessary that the paper referred to should have been written by the witness, or should be an original paper. It matters little how the memory is refreshed; but the witness is to speak from his then recollection.

As to the competency of the witness Fisher: It was a question before the court; and, not only his competency was shown by the evidence, but by the contract for the rescission of his purchase.

Upon the fifth point made by the counsel for the appellant, it is to be observed that the evidence was not offered to prove that the agreement was not correctly read, but that it was not correctly understood. The design of this evidence was to invalidate the deed; and if it was not sufficient for that purpose, it was not admissible.

But further: The evidence, if competent, was not admissible without the affidavit of the defendant that *the paper 538 was not his deed. The court is referred to 3 Bac. Abr. title Fraud, letter A, p. 294-95.

Upon the instructions given or refused, it is enough to say that the objection that the court should have construed the agreement is not well taken, as the court does in fact construe it in the instruction given. That this was not a tenancy from year to year, so that the law in relation to notice does not apply; and there was in fact a positive agreement to give up the premises whenever required by Fisher, which of course dispensed with notice. As to Fisher's right, his was a mere executory contract, giving him neither title or right of possession, which still remained in Middleton: and it was for him to enforce it, that he might execute his contract with Fisher.

MONCURE, J. I am of opinion that the Circuit court did not err in overruling the motion of the defendant to strike this case from the docket. I think the case was properly removed from the County court to the Circuit court, under the fourth section of the act of March 28, 1843; Sess. Acts, p. 18; which declares "that whenever any civil action in a court of law shall have been, or shall hereafter be, pending in a county or corporation court for the space of one year, without a final decision thereof having been made, it shall be lawful for any party in any such civil action, or his or her legal representatives, to obtain, by motion, without notice, an order of such court for the removal of such cause to the Circuit superior court of law and chancery of the same county or corporation, upon the same terms, and in the same manner in all respects, as if it were a suit in equity, and the same proceedings shall be had in reference to the removal and trial of such causes as are directed by the act passed the 18th (12th) of February 1838, (Sess. Acts. p. 61,) entitled "An act to authorize 539 the removal of *causes in equity from the inferior to the superior courts."

The case at the time of its removal was a civil action in a court of law, and had been pending in the County court for the space of one year, without a final decision thereof having been made. It was, therefore, within the literal terms of the statute. Was it not within its spirit and meaning also? I think it was. The manifest object of the statute was to avoid the great evil of delay in the trial of causes in the County courts. This evil existed in regard both to chancery suits and civil actions; but in a greater degree, to the former. The act of 1838 was intended to remedy the evil in regard to chancery causes, and the act of 1843 in regard to civil actions. The action of unlawful detainer is peculiarly and especially within the scope of the policy of the legislature, as indicated by these acts. It is a remedy for a wrong which requires immediate redress. The law has, therefore, provided that it shall be prosecuted in a most summary way, and have precedence for trial over all other civil causes. It was probably not contemplated by the legislature that such a proceeding for the redress of such a wrong would ever "be pending in a County court for the space of one year, without a final decision thereof having been made." But if it would, surely the legislature intended that it might be removed to the Circuit court, in the same manner in which any other civil action, under similar circumstances, might be so removed under the act of 1843.

The ground on which the counsel of the plaintiff in error contended that the action of unlawful detainer is not a civil action within the meaning of the act of 1843, is that that act applies only to civil actions of which the Circuit court has original jurisdiction; and the Circuit court has not original jurisdiction of an action of unlawful detainer. It is true that the Circuit

540 court has not original jurisdiction of an action of *unlawful detainer. The only reason for not giving such jurisdiction is, that the nature of the wrong for which the remedy lies, requires a more speedy redress than could well be afforded by that court, sitting as it does but twice in a year.

Formerly the County court, though 'holding a session every month, was not considered by the legislature as affording the means of a sufficiently speedy redress of the wrong; and, therefore, a tribunal composed of at least two justices, and meeting not less than ten nor more than twenty days after the date of the warrant, was provided for the trial of actions of unlawful detainer. They are now triable by the County court; but at any term whether monthly or quarterly: and are still tried in a summary way, and have precedence over all other civil causes on the docket. But while the Circuit court has never had original, it has always had appellate jurisdiction in actions of unlawful detainer; and I think the act of 1843 was not intended to be confined to civil actions of which the Circuit court has original jurisdiction, but was intended to embrace all civil actions of which that court has jurisdiction, whether original or appellate. I can see no good reason for the restrictive meaning contended for, contrary to the literal terms and obvious policy of the act. It was contended that as the act of 1843 declares that the same proceedings shall be had in reference to the removal and trial of causes under that act, as are directed by the act of 1838 in regard to causes in equity; and as the act of 1838 declares that the Circuit court shall have the same jurisdiction of a cause in equity removed under that act, and shall proceed therein in all respects as if the cause had been originally instituted in that court; therefore, no civil action of which the Circuit court has not original jurisdiction can be removed 541 under the act of 1843, because no case in equity of which the *Circuit court has not original jurisdiction can be removed under the act of 1838. In other words, it was contended, if I rightly understood the argument, that the act of 1843, in consequence of its reference to the act of 1838, is to be read as if the words, "and the Circuit superior court shall have the same jurisdiction thereof, and shall proceed therein in all respects as if the cause had been originally instituted in the Circuit superior court," which are contained in the act of 1838, had been repeated in the act of 1843. And that as an action of unlawful detainer could not be originally instituted in the Circuit court, therefore that court could have no jurisdiction thereof, if removed from the County to the Circuit court. This argument, though plausible, is, I think, unsound. The words referred to were not used in the act of 1838 for the purpose of excluding from its operation any causes in equity of which the County court had jurisdiction and the Circuit court not; for there were no such causes. If the jurisdiction of the two courts in such causes was not entirely concurrent, certainly the Circuit court had jurisdiction of every cause in equity of which the County court had. The words could only have been used for the purpose of giving to the Circuit court the same jurisdiction of a cause in equity removed to it as of a cause instituted therein. Different words might and probably would have been used if there had been any causes in equity cognizable in the County, and not in the Circuit, court: but as there were not, the words used conveyed the idea intended as well as any that could have been selected. The act of 1843 refers to the act of 1838 merely to avoid repetition; and the legislature could not have intended, by the implied adoption of ambiguous words, to exclude from the operation of the former, the action of unlawful detainer, which, as I have already said, is embraced both by the letter and the spirit of the act.

542 *The act of February 7th, 1849, Sess. Acts, p. 42, though passed after the removal of this case, was referred to in the argument as serving to show that prior to that act a civil action, in which the Circuit court had not original jurisdiction, could not have been removed from the County to the Circuit court under the act of 1843. The act of 1849 is somewhat of the nature of a declaratory law. At all events, while it adopts a rule for the future, it does not even express the opinion of the legislature as to what had been the true rule before. It recites that different constructions had been put upon the 30th section of the act of April 16th, 1831, Sup. Rev. Code, p. 146, and the 4th section of the act of March 28th, 1843, and that it was desirable to have uniformity in the construction of the said sections. It then declares that the Circuit courts shall have power to award a writ of error and supersedeas to any judgment, &c., of the County courts in which the latter have original jurisdiction; and to order the removal of any civil action pending in such courts in the manner provided in the fourth section of the last recited act, notwithstanding that the amount in controversy in such judgment &c. may be less than fifty dollars.

When the act of 1849 was passed, the Circuit court had no original jurisdiction in pecuniary actions, in which the amount in controversy was less than fifty dollars; and it seems to have been supposed by some that the Circuit court had no appellate jurisdiction in such cases. Those who entertained that supposition, as a natural consequence, also supposed that as the Circuit court had neither original nor appellate jurisdiction in such cases, they could not therefore be removed from the County to the Circuit court under the act of 1843. And hence the act of 1849 was passed to remove all doubt on the subject, by declaring that the Circuit court should have jurisdiction of such cases, whether removed to it by writ of error &c. under 543 *the act of 1831, or an order of removal under the act of 1843.

The act of 1849 indicates the sense of the legislature that the jurisdiction of the Circuit court under the act of 1843 should be coextensive with its appellate jurisdiction. The words "notwithstanding that the amount in controversy in such judgment &c. may be less than fifty dollars," were certainly not designed to exclude the jurisdiction of the Circuit court in an action of unlawful detainer removed to it under the act of 1843. It would be strange indeed, if the legislature intended by the act of 1849 to confer jurisdiction on the Circuit court under the act of 1843, in cases in which it had not original, and was supposed by some not before to have had appellate jurisdiction, and at the same time to exclude its jurisdiction under that act in a case in which it always had appellate jurisdiction.

I am further of opinion that the Circuit court did not err in overruling the motion of the defendant to change the place of the case upon the docket; and that the reason assigned by the court, to wit, "because this case occupied the place on the docket which it has occupied ever since it came into this court, and had priority over all civil causes in the County court, and was entitled to the same priority here that it had in that court," was well founded, and a good reason for overruling the motion. If, however, there had been any error in this respect, I do not see how it could have prejudiced the parties, or been any ground for reversing the judgment.

In regard to the exceptions of the defendant to opinions of the court permitting a witness who had surveyed, or partially surveyed, the land in controversy for the plaintiff, to refresh his memory by referring to certain papers which he had in his 544 hand: The law on this subject is thus laid down in Greenl. on *Evidence, § 436: "Though a witness can testify only to such facts as are within his own knowledge and recollection, yet he is permitted to refresh and assist his memory, by the use of a written instrument, memorandum or entry in a book, and may be compelled to do so if the writing is present in court. It does not seem to be necessary that the writing should have been made by the witness himself, nor that it should be an original writing, provided, after inspecting it, he can speak to the facts from his own recollection." "And it is not necessary that the writing thus used to refresh the memory, should itself be admissible in evidence." Numerous authorities are cited by the author, which, I think, fully sustain his view of the law; though there is certainly some conflict, at least in the dicta of some of the judges.

The doctrine established by the authorities seems to be that if a witness, after looking at the paper to recall the facts, can speak from his own recollection of them, and not merely because they are stated or referred to in the paper, his evidence will be admissible, notwithstanding the manner in which his recollection was revived, and no matter when or by whom the paper was made, nor whether it be original, a copy, or an extract, nor whether referred to by the witness in court or elsewhere. 4 Philips' Evi.; Cowen & Hill's Notes, part 2, p. 734. This kind of testimony is liable to abuse; the chief objection to it being that the paper referred to operates on the mind of the witness like a leading question: but it is rendered necessary by the frailty of the human memory; and the abuse to which it is liable must be guarded against by the vigilance of the court. If after looking at the paper the witness cannot speak from his recollection merely, his testimony, so far as he cannot speak from his recollection, is inadmissible; and the paper itself, if admissible evidence,

545 either alone, or so far as it may *be supported by the recollection of the witness or other testimony, must be produced. In Jacob v. Lindsay, 1 East's R. 460, the witness was permitted to refer to a paper which itself was not admissible evidence. In Henry v. Lee, 2 Chitty's R. 124, 18 Eng. C. L. R. 273, a witness was allowed to refresh his memory from a document though not written by himself. "It is sufficient," said Lord Ellenborough, C. J., in that case, "If a man can positively swear that he recollected the fact, though he had totally forgotten the circumstance before he came into court; and if upon looking at any document, he can so far refresh his memory as to recollect a circumstance, it is sufficient; and it makes no difference that the memorandum was written by himself, for it is not the memorandum that is the evidence, but the recollection of the witness."

I see nothing in Starkie on Evidence, nor in the case of Doe ex dem. Church v. Perkins, 3 T. R. 749, so much relied on by the counsel for the plaintiff in error, which is in conflict with the doctrine as laid down by Greenleaf. On the contrary, the case of Doe v. Perkins is one of the cases cited by that author, and tends to support the doctrine. The point decided therein, as stated in the marginal abstract, was that a witness may refresh his memory by any book or paper, if he can afterwards swear to the fact from his own recollection. But if he cannot swear to the fact from recollection, any further than as finding it entered in a book or paper, the original book or paper must be produced. Mr. Justice Buller in Doe ex dem. Church v. Perkins, referred to a case of Tanner v. Taylor, in which, being an action for goods sold, "the witness who proved the delivery, took it from an account which he had in his hand, being a copy, as he said, of the day book, which he had left at home: and it being objected that the original ought to have been produced, Mr.

Baron Legge said that if he would 546 swear *positively to the delivery from recollection, and the paper was only to refresh his memory, he might make use of it. But if he could not, from recollection, swear to the delivery, any further than as finding them entered in his book, then the original should have been produced; and the witness saying he could not swear from recollection, the plaintiff was nonsuited."

This doctrine is of easy application to the case under consideration. The witness was permitted to refer to two papers to refresh his memory. The first was an original paper; being a diagram made by the plaintiff of the tract of land claimed by him, which paper had an endorsement thereon in the handwriting of the plaintiff, stating that it was the tract on which the defendant lived. The witness stated that some years before, he surveyed two or three lines of the survey on which the defendant lived, and when he run the lines he had no authentic document to run them by, and only had the paper with the diagram and endorsement aforesaid. To this diagram the witness referred for courses and distances, and admitted that he did not remember how far he had run or what courses he had run, without reference to said paper; and did not recollect either course or distance independent of said paper. To the witness refreshing his memory from said paper, the defendant objected; but the court overruled the objection, directing the witness not to state anything set out in the paper, but only to state what acts he did in running the lines aforesaid, and what he found on the ground. I think there is no error in this ruling and direction of the court.

The witness had run certain lines, at the request of the plaintiff, and according to a paper containing a diagram, which the plaintiff placed in his hands. The fact that such lines were run, was a link in the chain of the plaintiff's evidence. Whether 547 they were lines *of the patent under which he claimed, depended upon a comparison with the patent which was before the jury, and the evidence of the surveyor as to the appearances upon the ground, &c. There was no objection to the fact as irrelevant evidence, but only to the use made of the paper, on the ground that not having been written by the witness, and he not recollecting what course or distance he had run independently of the said paper, it could not be referred to by him to refresh his memory. It was an original paper; was in court; was identified by the witness; and, in connection with his testimony, was the very best evidence of the lines he had been requested by the plaintiff to run. The witness might have recollected the courses and distances of these lines; and if so, might have given evidence of them, without reference to the paper. But it could hardly be expected, after the lapse of several years, that he could remember them without such reference, or even with it. All that he could reasonably be expected to be able to say, was, that, at the plaintiff's request, he ran certain courses and distances set forth in the paper which he had in court, and held in his hand. This he did say, and it was admissible evidence to prove the fact accordingly. In this and the like cases, the paper itself, being a part of the evidence, must be produced.

The other paper, to which the witness was permitted to refer, was an extract or copy from his field notes of the survey before mentioned, which notes were at his home. He said that the copy was accurately made by him, but did not pretend to say that he recollected the courses or distances deposed to from said copy, independently thereof. The defendant objected to the evidence, because the original field notes were not produced. The court overruled the objection, and permitted the witness to refer to the copy to refresh his recollection of the running done by him. If the witness, 548 *after referring to the copy, had said that he had no recollection of the facts therein contained, and could only say they were true, because they were therein contained, I think, according to the authorities before cited, it would have been necessary to have produced the original. There may be some ambiguity on this subject in the bill of exceptions, which might produce some difficulty, if the question were material; but in this case it is not. Understanding the court as permitting the witness to refer to the paper merely to refresh his recollection of the running done by him, or of the facts therein set forth, I think there was no error in so doing.

In regard to the objection that the court permitted the witness Fisher to be sworn on the voir dire after his interest had been shown by evidence aliunde: It is sufficient to say that the error of the court, if any, was cured by the fact, that before the witness was sworn in chief a deed was produced and proved, which terminated his interest.

In regard to the instructions: I think the court did not err in refusing to give those which were asked for by the parties, or in giving those which were given by the court. The agreement of the parties, which was by deed exhibited and proved to the jury, if it did not terminate the defendant's right to hold the land in controversy on the 10th of April 1847, at least made him a tenant at will or at sufferance after that day; and such a tenant is not entitled to six months' notice, to which a tenant from year to year is entitled. The most that he can require is reasonable notice, and he is entitled to no notice if he claims to hold adversely, or attorns to some other person, or does some other act disclaiming to hold as tenant. 1 Lom. Dig. 165. In this case there was evidence that the defendant refused to surrender possession of the land to Fisher according to the agreement. I think with the legal title, had a right to maintain the action at the time it was instituted, notwithstanding his executory contract with Fisher.

In regard to the only remaining question: I think the court erred in excluding the evidence of the witness Alexander Harrison, offered by the defendant. In a suit brought upon a deed, the plaintiff is not required to prove it without a plea of non est factum, verified by oath. But when, as in this case, a deed is introduced collaterally as evidence, it must be proved by the party introducing it, according to the rules of law; and the other party, without any denial of the deed on oath, may assail it by any evidence which shows, or tends to show, that it is not his deed; indeed, by any evidence which would be admissible on the plea of non est factum. He may, therefore, introduce evidence tending to show that there was fraud in the execution of the instrument, as that it was misread to him, or his signature obtained to a different instrument from the one he intended to sign. Taylor v. King, 6 Munf. 358; Dorr v. Munsel, 13 John. R. 430; Van Valkenburgh v. Rouk, 12 Id. 337.

In the last case, the court said, "If a deed be misread or misexpounded to an unlettered man, this may be shown on non est factum, because he has never assented to the contract. So, if a man be imposed upon, and signs one paper while he believes he is signing another, he cannot be said to have assented, and may show this on non est factum." It does not certainly appear whether the defendant in this case was unlettered or not. His signature to the deed purports to have been made by himself, and the presumption therefore is, that he was not. But the admissibility of evidence tending to prove fraud in the execution of an instrument does not depend upon the fact that the party whose deed it purports to be, was unlettered; though the weight of the evidence is materially increased thereby.

550 *In this case, the defendant offered to prove by one of the subscribing witnesses to the bond, that he and the defendant both understood the agreement (which is in the handwriting of the plaintiff) as referring the title to the land to the arbitrators named in said paper; that said witness was present when it was read to the defendant, and neither the witness nor the defendant understood or believed that said paper made the defendant the tenant of the plaintiff; nor did they know that any such thing was in said paper; and further, that both the witness and the defendant understood said paper as read to them, as simply referring to the arbitrators the right to said land, and not that the defendant had by that paper given up his right to the land, and referred to arbitrators his right to pay for improvements, to be set off against the annual rents of said land. If the paper was correctly read to the defendant at the time of its execution, his misunderstanding of it could not affect its validity as a deed:

And so far as the evidence offered tends to show a mere misunderstanding of the paper, it is wholly immaterial and irrelevant to the issue. But if it tends, in any degree, however slightly, to show that the paper was materially misread to the defendant at the time of its execution, and that he was thus induced to execute it, the evidence is admissible. I think it has such tendency, and ought to have gone to the jury, to be weighed by them with the other evidence in the case. It may be of little weight in itself to prove fraud in the execution of the paper, and of less or none when taken in connection with the other evidence. But of that the jury are the exclusive judges. The witness was selected by the parties to attest the instrument; and it was his duty to notice the circumstances attending its execution. He did not say that the paper was misread, nor how it was read to the defendant at the time of its execution. He may not have remembered particulars, or been able to state 551 *more than his understanding of the substance of the paper as read to the defendant. That understanding was materially different from the plain meaning of the paper itself; and it is difficult to conceive that he could have so understood it, if he is a man of ordinary intelligence, and heard the paper correctly read. But these are matters for the consideration of the jury, and are adverted to here only to show that at least the evidence is relevant and admissible; which is the only question the court has to decide in regard to it.

I am of opinion that the judgment should be reversed, the verdict set aside, and the cause remanded for a new trial to be had therein.

7. Note—Debt—Contemporaneous Origin.§—A note does not import a debt existing previous to the period of its execution; but its effect is to give the debt and the note a contemporaneous origin.

In March 1848 James C. Johnston filed his bill in the Circuit court of Ohio county against Jacob S. and William W. Shriver, trustees of Platoff Zane and Eliza Jane his wife and their children, and others, in which he alleged that Platoff Zane of Wheeling in his life time being indebted to A. J. Prentiss in the sum of one thousand two hundred and seventy-five dollars, on the 9th of March 1837 at Wheeling, executed to him his note payable on demand for 553 that sum. That at the urgent request of said Zane, who was the brother of plaintiff's wife, the plaintiff bought the note; and that in October 1841 he recovered a judgment thereon against Platoff Zane.

He alleged further, that two days before the said note was made, Zane executed two deeds of trust to Charles D. Knox and Samuel Sprigg, copies of which he exhibited with his bill, by one of which he conveyed a part of his property, with the professed purpose of securing the payment of his debts; and by the other, he conveyed all the residue of his property in trust for himself and his wife. These conveyances the plaintiff charged were made to delay, hinder and obstruct his creditors in the collection of their just debts. He insisted that his judgment was a lien on the lands conveyed in said deeds. That Platoff Zane retained an interest in said lands, which ought to be subjected to the payment of the plaintiff's debt. He stated the death of Sprigg and the substitution of the Shriver as trustees in the place of Knox; and that there was a large amount of the trust property in the hands of the trustees, much more than sufficient to pay his debt; and he prays that they may be subjected for that purpose; and for general relief.

The children of Platoff Zane, all of whom were infants, answered by a guardian ad litem; and the bill was taken for confessed as to Mrs. Zane. The acting trustee William W. Shriver answered. He said that he could not admit or deny the existence of the note spoken of in the bill, as a valid debt of Platoff Zane, he having no personal knowledge of its existence, nor of the consideration for which it was given. Nor could he admit or deny that the plaintiff bought the note at the urgent request of Platoff Zane, he having no knowledge on the subject; and he called for full proof of the same.

The defendant admits the judgment

554 and the execution *of the deeds, and the substitution of himself and Jacob S. Shriver as trustees; but he denies that they were intended to delay, hinder or defraud his creditors; on the contrary, they were intended in good faith to provide for and secure the payment of all his just debts as then existing; and to provide for and secure a comfortable support for himself and wife and children out of the residue of his estate after the payment of all his just debts then existing, and to protect such as remained of his estate from his own improvident and reckless waste. That Noah Zane, the father of Platoff Zane, died in 1833, leaving to said Platoff, then a minor, a large estate. That Platoff Zane attained to the age of twenty-one years in February 1836, when he took possession of his estate, and between that time and the making of said deeds, a period little over a year, he contracted debts and liabilities to the amount of between fifty and seventy thousand dollars. His friends seeing this reckless waste of his estate, and foreseeing that unless it was secured beyond his control, in a very little time the whole would be squandered, and himself and his family reduced to want or dependence, procured him to execute the said two deeds of trust, for the purpose, first, of paying all his and his wife's debts then existing; and second, to provide for himself and his wife and family. He insisted that the deeds were valid against all subsequent creditors of Platoff Zane; and that no such creditor could claim from said trust subject any interest beyond what was reserved to said Platoff Zane out of the rents and profits, after the support of himself and wife and children: and he alleged that more than the whole rents and profits were so expended during the life of Platoff Zane, and upon his wife and children since his death.

The deeds which were assailed by the plaintiff, are dated the 6th day of March 1837; they were acknowledged 555 *by Platoff Zane and his wife before two justices on the next day; and were admitted to record, one on the 7th and the other to secure creditors on the 11th of the same month. The deed to secure creditors does not set out any specific debt due from the grantors, but recites that whereas the said Platoff Zane is largely indebted to sundry persons, and is desirous to provide a fund for the payment thereof; and then proceeds to convey a large amount of property, principally real estate; the personal property was his interest in the store and store concern kept in Wheeling by Zane & Pentoney, which had been bequeathed to him by his father Noah Zane. The trustees were authorized to proceed to sell the real estate and reduce to money the interest of Platoff Zane in the said store; and in selling the real estate, they were authorized to sell for cash or on a credit, and divide the lots or sell each as a whole, as they might think would best promote the interest of the fund. The trustees were to have immediate possession of the property, and to take the rents and profits until a sale, and these rents and profits were to be applied to the payment of debts and other objects and purposes contemplated by the deed. In collecting debts, the trustees were authorized to compound or compromise doubtful or disputed claims, if they thought it judicious. And it was further provided that the trustees should pay no debt before a judgment, to which Platoff Zane objected; nor should they be bound to pay a debt until after judgment which they might think Platoff Zane was not legally bound to pay; but if he should request a debt to be paid, and the trustees paid it, the payment thereof was not afterwards to be questioned. The trustees were to be allowed a fair and liberal compensation for their services, and to be authorized to employ, at the cost of the trust fund, agents, servants and clerks; they being responsible for the acts of 556 the *same; but in such case, the compensation was to be no more than what was reasonable, considering the employment of such agents, &c. And after all the debts then due of Platoff Zane and his wife, and all charges and expenses of the trust were paid, the moneys arising from the sale of the real property aforesaid, and from the said store concern, were to be applied, first, in purchasing a residue for Platoff Zane and his wife; and the balance was to be invested in bank stock or other good securities; and the residence was to be occupied by Zane and wife for their lives and the life of the survivor, and the interest and profits arising from the stocks and other securities were to be received by the trustees, and applied to the support of Zane and his wife during their lives and the life of the survivor of them. And it was further provided that if Platoff Zane should have children or descendants, in life at the death of the survivor of him and his wife, that said residence, stocks and securities should then go to them, the descendants taking per stirpes; and if there were no such children or descendants, then to his right heirs. But a power of appointment among his children was reserved to Platoff Zane.

The other deed conveyed to the same trustees other real estate, a part of which was the property of Mrs. Zane. The trustees were to manage the property, rent it out and receive the rents. The said rents and profits were not to be assigned or transferred by either Zane or his wife, and were not to be liable for any debt which either of them might contract. The trusts were in favor of Platoff Zane and wife, and the survivor of them, for their lives, except of so much of the property as belonged to Mrs. Zane, of which the trusts were for her separate use; and then for the children and descendants of Platoff Zane; and on failure of children, to his right heirs; 557 with a power of appointment *in him among his children, substantially the same in all these respects as were the trusts of the other deed.

It is stated in the answer of the trustee

Shriver that Platoff Zane died in May 1846, leaving his wife surviving him, and leaving six infant children. There was no parol testimony; and the cause came on to be heard upon the pleadings and the documentary evidence, consisting of copies of the plaintiff's note and judgment and the two deeds of trust; when the court below dismissed the bill with costs. From this decree the plaintiff obtained an appeal to this court.

Bibb and Baxter, for the appellants.
Fry, for the appellees.

LEE, J. Three grounds have been assigned by the appellant's counsel, upon some one of which it is insisted he is entitled to the relief sought by his bill. These are:

First, that the deeds of the 7th of March 1837 are fraudulent and void as to the creditors of Platoff Zane, and that the appellant is entitled to impeach them as such, whether he is to be regarded as a prior or subsequent creditor, in reference to the time of their execution.

Secondly, that in point of fact his debt was a pre-existing debt, and is, therefore, in terms provided for by the deeds.

Thirdly, that under the provisions of said deeds Platoff Zane took such an interest in the subject thereby conveyed as would be liable to subsequent creditors, and that the appellant is entitled as such to subject the same to satisfaction of his debt.

As to the first ground: Nothing is better settled than that a voluntary conveyance, which interferes with or breaks in upon the rights of existing creditors, to the prejudice of their just demands: and this according to many of the cases, without regard to the amount of the debts, or the extent of the property settled, or the circumstances of the party. Fitzer v. Fitzer, 2 Atk. R. 511; Taylor v. Jones, 2 Atk. R. 600; Chamley v. Lord Dunsany, 2 Sch. & Lef. 690, 714; Reade v. Livingston, 3 John. Ch. R. 481; Thomson v. Daugherty, 12 Serg. & Rawle 448; Howe v. Ward, 4 Greenl. R. 195; Hopkirk v. Randolph, 2 Brock. R. 132; Backhouse v. Jett, 1 Brock. R. 500, 511; Ridgway v. Underwood, 4 Wash. C. C. R. 67; Jackson v. Seward, 5 Cow. R. 67; O'Daniel v. Crawford, 4 Dev. Law R. 197.
558 *will not be permitted to take effect

On the other hand, numerous cases are to be found, which in effect maintain the doctrine, that a conveyance, although voluntary, may be good, under circumstances, even as against existing creditors; and that a party's being indebted at the time is but an argument of fraud, the question still being in every case, whether the conveyance is a bona fide transaction, or a mere device to delude and defeat creditors. Cadogan v. Kennett, Cowp. R. 432; Doe v. Routledge, Ibid. 705; Richardson v. Smallwood, 1 Jac. R. 552, 4 Cond. Eng. Ch. R. 202; Gale v. Williamson, 8 Mees. & Welsb. 405; Verplank v. Sterry, 12 John. R. 536; Wicks v. Clarke, 8 Paige's R. 161; Seward

v. Jackson, 8 Cow. R. 406; Hinde's lessee v. Longworth, 11 Wheat. R. 199.

The subject is one involving the enquiry into the relations which the two great classes of creditors, prior and subsequent, occupy in relation to a voluntary settlement. And the question is whether they occupy a common ground, so that a conveyance which would be adjudged fraudulent as to the former, would also be held to be fraudulent as to the latter; or will a discrimination be made, the effect of which will be to withdraw from enquiry in the case of a prior creditor the various circumstances attending the execution of *the conveyance, such as the nature of the consideration, the value of the property settled compared with that, if any, retained, the extent of their indebtedness, &c., &c.; all of which are in the case of a subsequent creditor, most proper to be considered; and upon which, in order to succeed, he must be able to fix the imputation of fraud in the absence of direct and positive proof of the intent. Chancellor Kent clearly recognizes a distinction between the two classes. In the case of the prior creditor, he considers that any enquiry into the amount of debts existing at the time would be embarrassing if not dangerous; and he regards it as wholly unnecessary, considering the debtor as absolutely disabled from making any voluntary settlement to the prejudice of any existing debts; and such, he says, is the clear and uniform doctrine of the cases. Reade v. Livingston, 3 John. Ch. R. 481, 500. Judge Story, on the other hand, evidently considers him as carrying the doctrine too far. He thinks that mere indebtedness would not per se, avoid a voluntary conveyance even as to subsisting creditors, unless the other circumstances are such as justly to create a presumption of fraud. 1 Story's Eq. Jur. § 360 to 365, inclusive. The opinion of Chancellor Kent is supported by that of Mr. Atherley, in his work on Marriage Settlements, at p. 212; and numerous authorities are cited, which he regards as fully sustaining it. In support of his views, Judge Story refers to many cases which he regards as necessarily tending to maintain them; which will be found in the notes to the sections above cited.

The question has been the subject of a most animated and elaborate discussion between two of the former judges of this court in the cases of Hutchison v. Kelly, 1 Rob. R. 123; Bank of Alexandria v. Patton, Ibid. 499; and Hunters v. Waite, 3 Gratt. 26. Judge Baldwin strenuously combats the opinion of Chancellor Kent.

560 *He maintains that prior and subsequent creditors stand upon common ground; and that although indebtedness at the time of a voluntary settlement may create a legal presumption against its validity, yet such presumption is only prima facie, and not conclusive, depending upon the particular circumstances of the case. Judge Stanard takes the opposite grounds; he maintains the correctness of

Chancellor Kent's opinion, and argues that prior and subsequent creditors stand upon different grounds; that their rights have different degrees of merit, and that a voluntary settlement might well be held invalid and ineffectual as against the claims of existing creditors, which would be entirely impregnable to any assault made by a subsequent creditor. The subject is most fully explored in the opinions of these eminent jurists, and the whole store of argument and authority that might be brought to bear upon it well nigh exhausted. But while I have formed for myself an opinion on the point, I yet deem it one not material to be decided in this cause. I understand both these judges as agreeing that in the case of a subsequent creditor, a settlement cannot be impeached on the mere ground of its being voluntary, if there be no actual fraudulent view or intent at the time it is made. To let in such a creditor, it must be shown that there was mala fides or fraud in fact in the transaction. And if this be shown, whether the actual fraudulent intent relate to existing creditors or (as it may) be directed exclusively against subsequent creditors, the effect is the same, and the subsequent creditor may upon the strength of it successfully impeach the conveyance. Such is, I think, the clear result of all the authorities. Stileman v. Ashdown, 2 Atk. R. 477; Walker v. Burrows, 1 Atk. R. 93; Russell v. Hammond, 1 Atk. R. 12; White v. Sansom, 3 Atk. R. 410; Kidney v. Coussmaker, 12 Ves. R. 136; Holloway v. Millard, 1 Madd. R. 414; Shaw v. Standish, 2 Vern. R. 326; Richardson v. Smallwood*, 1 Jacob's R. 552, 4 Cond. Eng. Ch. R. 262; Sexton v. Wheaton, 2 Wheat. R. 229, 246; Hinde's lessee v. Longworth, 11 Wheat. R. 199; Reade v. Livingston, ubi supra; Hutchison v. Kelly, ubi supra; Hunters v. Waite, ubi supra; Bennett v. Bedford Bank, 11 Mass. R. 421; Salmon v. Bennett, 1 Conn. R. 525.

But though fraud in fact must thus be shown, it is not required that the actual or express intent be shown by direct proof. This would be unattainable in many cases, and if it cannot be given, it may be supplied by just legal implication from the evidence where the circumstances are such, or such marks or badges of fraud are present, that the vicious intent may and must be inferred. Lord Townsend v. Winham, 2 Ves. sen. 1; per Baldwin, J., in Hutchison v. Kelly, 1 Rob. R. 123, 134; and per Standard, J., in Hunters v. Waite, 3 Gratt. 26, 72.

Where the grantor is not indebted at the time of making a voluntary conveyance, no fraudulent intent can of course be shown as against existing creditors; and yet it might be thoroughly vicious because prompted by a fraudulent purpose aimed at such as might become creditors thereafter. If the grantor, however, be indebted at the time, but due provision be made for all existing debts, it is clear that all just imputation of fraud in respect of them is out of the question. In Stephen v. Olive, 2

Bro. C. C. 90, a settlement had been made in favor of a wife and child, by a party who was indebted at the time in about the sum of five hundred pounds, but the debt was amply secured by a mortgage on all the estate embraced by the settlement. The master of the rolls maintained the validity of the settlement; thus in effect placing a settlement made by a party indebted at the time, but whose indebtedness was duly provided for, upon the same footing as one made by a party not indebted *at all. In George v. Milbanke, 9 Ves. R. 189, 194, Lord Chancellor Eldon clearly recognizes this as the modern doctrine. He says that a provision in a voluntary settlement for payment of existing debts, would make such a settlement good against all future creditors. In Reade v. Livingston, 3 John. Ch. R. 481, 501, Chancellor Kent says, the presumption of fraud as to subsequent creditors arising from the circumstance that the party was indebted at the time of the settlement, is repelled by the fact of those debts being secured by a mortgage or by a provision in the settlement. And in the case of Hester v. Wilkinson, 6 Humph. R. 218, this doctrine was carried still further. That was a case of a voluntary settlement on a wife and children, by a party indebted at the time, and the deed contained no provision for the payment of the debts, nor was there any mortgage or other security given by which they were provided; but the trustee admitted that it was the understanding and agreement of the parties that he should pay all existing debts by the sale of so much of the property as might be necessary for that purpose. The court held this to be sufficient, and declared that a voluntary settlement on a wife and children, if fair at the time, will be good against subsequent creditors of the party making it.

I think, therefore, that the case of a voluntary settlement upon a wife and children, although by a party indebted at the time, will, according to most approved authorities, stand on the same footing with such a settlement by a party not indebted, provided due and ample provision be made for the payment of such subsisting debt; and that in either case, to assail such a settlement successfully, an actual fraudulent intent must be manifested, or must be collected from the circumstances of the case. Now it would seem at most a solecism to say of a conveyance, a primary object of which is to secure all existing debts, and for *which full provision is made, that it is fraudulent as to the creditors existing at the time. I agree, however, that a conveyance might purport to secure all existing debts, and yet by reason of terms and stipulations which it contained, intended or serving to hinder, embarrass or delay the creditors in the receipt of their respective debts, it might be held to be fraudulent and void as to them. But there is nothing of that kind in this case. The deeds contain no terms or stipulations which are unusual or unreasonable. Their provisions are such as might well be called for by the character of the subjects conveyed, the nature and amount of the heavy debts which it secured, and the circumstances under which they were contracted, the situation of the grantor and the condition of his family at the time they were executed. There is no such arbitrary power reserved to Platoff Zane to direct the management of the trust subject as is supposed by the counsel. He was not authorized to require any debt to be paid before judgment, nor were the trustees forbidden to pay any other debts than such as he might direct to be paid, before judgments were rendered upon them. This is an entire misapprehension of the true meaning of the provision alluded to, but it is not difficult to understand it. The debts to be provided for were numerous and heavy, amounting as it would seem, to a sum between fifty and seventy thousand dollars, and all contracted by an indiscreet, inexperienced and extravagant young man, within a period of a little over one year after he attained his majority. Many or some of these debts might be such as from an utter want of consideration, or because contracted under the influence of fraud or imposition, or for some other cause, he might not feel himself bound or willing to pay. Hence it was provided that if he objected to the payment

564 of any debt claimed, the trustees against his will should not pay it *till a judgment was recovered upon it. And though he might direct a debt to be paid, yet if the trustees thought it was one which he was not legally bound to pay, they were not bound to pay until a judgment should be recovered upon it; though if he requested a debt to be paid, and the trustee did pay it, the payment was not to be afterwards called in question; meaning of course by Zane or those claiming under the settlement, the fund being confessedly more than adequate to the payment of all the debts. To these provisions no just exception can be taken: they were obviously intended to protect the trust subject against unfounded pretensions, and at the same time to give a reasonable assurance to the trustees of exemption from personal liability for the acts done by them in discharge of the trust.

As to the matters relied on as badges of fraud, they are either inapplicable or without significance. That the grantor was largely indebted and the conveyance one of his whole estate, and that the creditors were hindered from their ordinary remedies by judgment and execution, would only be of force where no provision or an inadequate one is made for the payment of the debts. Here it is full and ample, and no creditor provided for is complaining. That the deeds were voluntary and by one largely indebted, is a point I have already fully considered. That neither of the trustees was a creditor, that the consideration named was the inadequate and indeed nominal one of five dollars, and that the creditors are not named and were not consulted nor consenting to the terms of the deeds at the time of their execution, are matters which under the circumstances of this case, cannot be entitled to the slightest weight. Nor is the absence of any antenuptial agreement for a settlement, a circumstance that will affect the validity of the settlement made, if it be otherwise free from objection.

565 This is *sufficiently apparent from the cases already cited for other purposes; to which numerous others to the same effect might be added.

In what has been just said it has been assumed that a subsequent creditor may come with a fishing bill charging indebtedness to others at the time of the settlement; and upon proving the same, obtain relief directly against the subject. Yet this would seem for a long period not to have been a settled point. Chancellor Kent expresses the opinion that he will be entertained, and that his rights will not depend on the mere pleasure of the prior creditors whether they will or will not impeach the prior settlement. Reade v. Livingston, 3 John. Ch. R. 481. And such Judge Baldwin seems to think is the fair conclusion from the current of decisions. Hutchison v. Kelly, 1 Rob. R. 123. Sir William Grant was of a different opinion in Kidney v. Coussmaker, 12 Ves. R. 136; and the opinion of Lord Rosslyn, referred to by him, in the case of Montague v. Lord Sandwich, is adopted as the precedent which he professes to follow. In Lush v. Wilkinson, 5 Ves. R. 384, a bill of this kind was dismissed; the master of the rolls (Lord Alvanley) saying, "it is very extraordinary for a subsequent creditor to come with a fishing bill in order to prove antecedent debts." He however gave the party liberty to file another bill. Of this case, Sir William Grant remarked in Kidney v. Coussmaker, 12 Ves. R. 136, 155, that the only surprise he felt at Lord Alvanley's decree was, that his lordship did not dismiss the bill absolutely without giving leave to file another. And indeed in a recent case decided in 1843, the vice chancellor remarked that a deed (of voluntary settlement) can only be set aside as fraudulent against creditors at the instance of a person who was a creditor at the time; though when it shall have been set aside, subsequent creditors may be let in. Ede v. Knowles, 2 Younge & Collyer 177, 21 Eng. Ch. R. 177.

566 *In Virginia, according to the opinions of Judges Stanard and Baldwin, it would seem that subsequent creditors will be let in upon a fund fraudulently alienated wherever the conveyance has been or might be successfully assailed upon the ground of actual fraud by prior creditors. Hutchison v. Kelly, 1 Rob. R. 123; Bank of Alexandria v. Patton, Ibid. 499.

There is certainly no proof in this case of any actual or express fraudulent intent on the part of Platoff Zane in executing these deeds. Nor is such intent to be fairly deduced from the circumstances of the transaction. The provision for all existing creditors, ample and complete as it is, puts an end to all question so far as they are involved. The consideration of the settlement upon his wife and children, arising out of the natural duty to provide for their support, is one of the most meritorious character, entitled to the respect and support of the court of chancery, rather than to its frown and reprehension; and especially so, when we see the utterly improvident and wasteful habits of the grantor, and that their ruinous consequences to himself and his family were already beginning to cast their shadow before. Under the circumstances, there was nothing unreasonable in the settlement. On the contrary, it was perhaps the most judicious and prudent measure which he consummated during his brief but eventful career, after he attained his majority. Possession of the property was not reserved to nor retained by him. He did not continue to exercise acts of ownership over it, nor was he entitled to receive the rents or otherwise enjoy the proceeds. In short, not one of the usual marks or badges of fraud appears to be present. The only circumstance which can with any plausibility be relied on as evincive of a fraudulent intent, is the fact that the debt to the assignor of the appellant was contracted so shortly after the execution of the deeds. It is true, this 567 may be looked to as evidence of the intent *of the party at the time.

Walker v. Burrows, 1 Atk. R. 93. It is, however, but a circumstance to be considered in connection with all the others surrounding the transaction; nor do I understand Lord Hardwicke as intending anything more by the remarks made by him in the case just cited. So viewed, I regard it as insufficient to bring home the evil intent which will stamp the transaction with the character of meditated fraud. No attempt to deceive is manifested; no suggestion of falsehood or suppression of truth. The deeds were duly admitted to record upon the same day on which they were executed. Such notice as the public records can furnish was thus given to the world. The note was executed in Wheeling, where Platoff Zane with his family and the trustees all resided, and where the deeds were recorded. The appellant was the brother in law of Platoff Zane, and it must be presumed was fully aware of all that had taken place. The bill does not aver ignorance of the existence of the deeds on the part of Prentiss when he took the note, nor on the part of the appellant when he bought it of him. Considering the wild, extravagant and improvident habits of Platoff Zane, as evinced by the history of the preceding thirteen months, his giving a note for one thousand two hundred and seventy-five dollars two days after the execution of the deeds, or upon any day, could excite neither surprise nor suspicion. It might have been for a good or a bad consideration, and upon a transaction wholly originating after the execution of the deeds.

In every view, I think the attempt of the appellant to assail these deeds on the ground of fraudulent intent either as it respects existing creditors, or those who might thereafter become such, must be held to be ineffectual.

We come now to the second ground
568 assumed, that *the note of Zane to Prentiss was for a pre-existing debt; and that it may, therefore, be regarded as provided for by the terms of the deeds. But the bill contains no such allegation. It does not set out the consideration or the origin of the note. It simply avers that Zane, being indebted to Prentiss in the sum of one thousand two hundred and seventy-five dollars, on the 9th of March 1837 executed his note for the payment of the same. This is but the usual and formal mode of stating the execution of a note in pleading. It is not understood to import the existence of the debt at a previous period, but only at the time of, and just before, the execution of the note. Its effect is to give the note and the debt which it evidences a contemporaneous origin. But if a prior existence of the debt had been formally alleged, the answer of Shriver the trustee, sufficiently puts it in issue to require the appellant to support it by proof. He says that he can neither admit nor deny the existence of the note, having no personal knowledge of it or of the consideration for which it was given, but calls for full proof touching the same. No proof whatever is furnished as to the origin or the consideration of the note. If it were for a pre-existing debt, that fact and the commencement of the debt might have been shown in evidence; and in the absence of any such proof, I think it clear that the origin of the debt must be referred to the date of the note.

It is said though that Mrs. Zane has not answered, and the allegations of the bill are as to her to be taken for confessed, and that therefore the pre-existence of the debt being admitted, the appellant is entitled to relief to the extent of any interest she may have in the subject. I have, however, already shown that there is no such allegation in the bill: and if there had been, the answer of Shriver the trustee, would 569 serve to put it in issue for her benefit, and that of all *others claiming under the deeds. For this purpose, he may properly be regarded as representing the cestuis que trust, and his answer will enure alike to the benefit of all.

The last ground upon which the pretensions of the appellant have been rested is, that under the provisions of the deeds Platoff Zane took such an interest and property in the subject conveyed as may and should be subjected to satisfaction of such debts as he might afterwards contract. The extent of the interest secured to Platoff Zane was the right to occupy, jointly and in common with his wife and family, the residence and homestead to be purchased by the trustees for their benefit out of the trust funds, after satisfaction of the debts, and to a support and maintenance during his life, with a power of appointment to such of his children or descendants, and in such proportions as he might name; the fund to go, in default of such appointment, to his children or descendants, and failing them, to his right heirs. His interest is for a bare maintenance, and continues during his life only. Beyond his own support, he can claim nothing from the fund. If the profits were more than adequate to the necessary wants of the whole family, including himself, and a surplus accrued for investment, he would be entitled to no benefit from it whatever. Upon his death every vestige of interest, which he could be said to have in the subject, would absolutely cease and determine, and there would be nothing which could be made the subject of pursuit by a creditor. The bill here was not filed until after the death of Platoff Zane; and this is a sufficient answer upon this point. Were he in full life, however, a not less sufficient answer to the pretension could be readily given. The interest of Platoff Zane under the deeds imports no such notion of property as involves a liability to his debts.

This would violate the plain intention and provisions *of the deeds, and would utterly disregard the exigencies of the occasion which led to their execution. Their purpose was to arrest a thoughtless, inexperienced and prodigal young man in the headlong career of extravagance and folly to which he would seem to have committed himself, the disastrous results of which to himself and his wife and children could be too readily foreseen by his friends. They induce him to make these deeds, conveying away his whole estate, making full provision for all his then existing debts, but intentionally and formally disabling him from in any manner charging the property thus conveyed with any debts thereafter to be contracted. This he had a right to do, no creditors existing at the time being in any way injured, and no fraudulent intent being fairly to be imputed to the transaction. 1 Story's Eq. Jur. § 356, and authorities cited in the note; Markham v. Guerrant, 4 Leigh 279. And although a support is reserved to him in common with his wife and children, out of the surplus, after paying all subsisting debts, yet it is a leading idea of the deeds that the entire subject is to be preserved by the trustees free from the control of the cestuis que trust, or any of them, and exempt from liability for any debts they might thereafter contract; and thus all idea of a property in Platoff Zane in the subject, is utterly excluded by the very terms of the deeds. The interest which he possessed, such as it was, by virtue of his right to a subsistence out of the fund, in common with his wife and children, and joint and inseparable from theirs, is not such a property as can be reached in any form by his creditors. The case is fully within the principles of several cases which have been decided in this court, and which may be regarded as settling the law upon the subject. Scott v. Gibbon, 5 Munf. 86; Markham v. Guerrant, 4 Leigh 279; Roanes v. Archer, Ibid. 550; Perkins v. Dickenson, 3 Gratt. 335. 571 The case of Markham *v. Guerrant will be found to be marked by circumstances very similar to those we find in the case under consideration.

Upon none of the grounds assigned do I think the pretensions of the appellant can be maintained; and I am of opinion to affirm the decree.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Lee, J.

Decree affirmed.

*Levasser v. Washburn.

July Term, 1854, Lewisburg.

1. Nullum Tempus Occurrit Regi.—Time does not run against the commonwealth.
2. Adversary Possession—Forfeiture of Land to State—Effect.†—Though an adversary possession of land had commenced to run against the true owner, yet upon the forfeiture of the land to the commonwealth, under the delinquent land laws, the possession, until the land is sold by the commonwealth, is no longer adversary against her, or her grantee claiming under a conveyance from a commissioner of delinquent lands.
3. Tax Titles—Forfeiture—Effect of Statute.‡—The forfeiture of land for the failure to enter it upon the commissioner's books and pay the taxes and damages due upon it, was effected by the statute, and required no judicial proceeding to complete it. The forfeiture was, therefore, complete at the time fixed by the statute.

Nullum Tempus Occurrit Regi.—For the proposition that, time does not run against the commonwealth, the principal case is cited and followed in the following cases: Calwell v. Prindle, 19 W. ‡Tax Titles—Forfeiture—Effect of Statute.—For the proposition that, for the failure to enter lands upon the commissioner's books and pay the taxes and damages due upon it, such land is forfeited to the commonwealth by force of the statute and it requires no judicial proceeding to complete it, the principal case is cited and approved in McClure v. Maitland, 24 W. Va. 574, 576; State v. Sponangle, 45 W. Va. 426, 32 S. E. Rep. 288; Wiant v. Hays, 38 W. Va. 683, 18 S. E. Rep. 807; McClure v. Manperture, 29 W. Va. 641, 2 S. E. Rep. 765; Forqueran v. Donnally, 7 W. Va. 123; Schenck v. Peary, 21 Fed. Cas. 682; King v. Mullins, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 929, 931, 171 U. S. 404. In Read v. Dingess, 60 Fed. Rep. 27, the principal case is cited as supporting the constitutionality of the forfeiture statutes. But in that case the court did not find it necessary to pass upon that question. In Hornbrook v. Elm Grove, 40 W. Va. 548, 21 S. E. Rep. 852, citing the principal case, it is admitted that it is not necessary, under the forfeiture statutes in regard to lands, to have a judicial proceeding to vest the title to such land in the commonwealth, but it is held that the forfeiture of the charter of a municipal corporation must be by judicial proceedings.

4. Statutes—Relinquishment of Commonwealth's Right to Forfeited Lands—Application of Statute.—The act of March 18th, 1841, Sess. Acts, p. 81, relinquishing the commonwealth's right to forfeited lands to a junior patentee in possession, only applies to those whose patents bear date previous to the 1st of April 1841.

5. Forfeited Lands—Effect of Subsequent Patent—Case at Bar.—A patent for land which had been previously granted by the commonwealth, and had been forfeited under the delinquent land laws, passed nothing to the patentee; and a conveyance of the land forfeited by the commissioner of delinquent lands, passed the title vested in the commonwealth by the forfeiture.

See, in accord with the principal case, foot-note to Martin v. Snowden, 18 Gratt. 100, where the cases are collected. See also, Smith v. Tharp, 17 W. Va. 221; Tebbetts v. Charleston, 33 W. Va. 705, 11 S. E. Rep. 23; Strader v. Goff, 6 W. Va. 257. In Morrill v. Scott, 61 Fed. Rep. 770, it is said: "It appears from the evidence in this case that the lands now in controversy were forfeited under the act of 1835, and that the forfeiture became absolute the 1st day of November, 1836, whereby the title to them vested in the commonwealth. During the time the lands were held by the commonwealth, Thomas Coleman and Henry Sherman, two of the defendants, obtained grants from the commonwealth on the 29th of June, 1844, upon entries and surveys made in 1843. Charles Smith, another defendant, obtained his grant for the land he claimed September 20, 1844. But before the defendants obtained their grants, and while their title was in an inchoate condition, the legislature, by a private act passed February 12, 1844, authorized the previous owners to redeem the lands by the payment into the treasury of the commonwealth of all taxes due thereon on or before the 1st day of June, 1845. It is conceded that this act was complied with by the payment of all back taxes into the treasury of the state before that time. There was, however, a saving in the act to any person having legal or equitable title to any of the lands by virtue of subsequent grant or otherwise.

"This brings me to the consideration of the legal effect of this act; and the first question that presents itself is, were these lands liable to entry and survey, and subject to grant? As we have before seen, they were granted by the commonwealth of Virginia in 1786, when the title passed out of the state, and so remained until she was reinvested with it under the act of 1835, holding them as forfeited and delinquent lands; and she so held them down to the time she relinquished her right to them by the act of February 12, 1844. At no time since the grant of 1786 were they ever held as waste and unappropriated lands, and as such liable to survey, entry, and grant. It is evident that they could not be granted as waste and unappropriated lands; and, if liable to entry, it must be because the state held them as forfeited lands, and, by legislative enactment, made them subject to entry and grant after

6. Instructions—Obscurely Expressed.—The court may refuse to give an instruction because it is so obscurely expressed as to leave in doubt the meaning intended.

This was an ejectment in the Circuit court of Jackson county. The declaration contained one count on the demise of Honore Girond, another of the president and directors of the literary fund, a third of J. E. Norvell and John De Homergue, a fourth of said Norvell and Eugene Levasser, and a fifth in the name of Eugene Levasser alone. The plaintiff, under the last mentioned count, claimed as derivative purchaser under a sale made by order of the Circuit court of Jackson county, under the acts of assembly in relation to delinquent and forfeited lands. A grant had issued to *one Honore Girond bearing date on the 22nd of March 1786, for ten thousand eight hundred and forty-three and three-quarter acres; and the land thus granted having become forfeited to the commonwealth by reason of the failure of the owners to cause the same to be entered upon the books of the commissioners of the revenue in the proper county, and to be charged with taxes and damages, and to pay the same according to law, the same was reported to the court, and on the 13th of September 1841, a decree was entered, directing the land to the forfeiture. But since the lands became forfeited, and during the time the title was in the state, there was no act of the legislature in existence that authorized the entry of forfeited lands. In fact, a grant for land forfeited for nonpayment of taxes was unauthorized by any law prior to the Code of 1849. Atkins v. Lewis, 14 Gratt. 30. It is true that forfeited and delinquent lands have been in some, possibly in a number of, instances, surveyed, entered, and carried into grant; but in no instance were these grants ever held valid by the courts except where the legislature relinquished the right of the state to the land. Such was the effect of the decision of the court in the case of Levasser v. Westburn, 11 Gratt. 572. If this position be correct, it must follow that the lands granted to the defendants by their patents passed no title to them, in the absence of any law either authorizing them to enter the lands, or confirming their title to them."

§ Instructions—Obscurely Expressed.—For the proposition that, where an instruction which is so obscurely expressed as to leave in doubt the meaning intended, the court may refuse to give it, the principal case is cited and followed in *Gas Company v. be sold by the commissioner. The sale took place on the 4th Monday in November 1841, and was confirmed by the court on the 15th of April 1842. A deed was executed to the purchaser in pursuance of such confirmation on the 25th of December 1843. The declaration in ejectment was filed on the 10th of April 1847; and on the same day the defendant appeared and pleaded the general issue. The defendant Thomas Washburn claimed under a patent to himself for one hundred acres of land bearing date the 1st day of April 1841, and under a written contract which he had made for the purchase of four hundred and eighty acres of land, embracing the premises in controversy, of one James Hector, in the spring of 1836. This contract was proven to have been lost, and evidence was given of its contents. He also proved that he went upon the land in the spring of 1836, claiming title to the same, and had continued in possession down to the institution of the suit. He also proved that one Smith had settled upon the land in 1833, had held it until he took possession in 1836; claiming under one Watson, who claimed under a grant founded on an inclusive survey, which issued to one Samuel M. Hopkins on the 1st of July 1796; but he gave no evidence of any connection between his claim and that of Smith.

The grant to Girond and the proceedings of the Circuit court of Jackson county in the matter of the *forfeiture for nonentry and nonpayment of taxes, the deed from the commissioner to De Homergue, the purchaser, and a conveyance from him to Levasser, one of the lessors of the plaintiff, were given in evidence to the jury. A plat and report made in the cause under the order of the court, were also exhibited, and it appeared that the land claimed by the defendant lay within the boundaries of the tract claimed by the plaintiff.

The defendant gave in evidence the grant to Hopkins in 1796, and a conveyance from one Oliver Walcott to the said Watson, dated 22nd June 1808. After the evidence had been closed on both sides, the plaintiff moved the court to exclude the defendants' grant from the jury; but the motion was overruled. He then asked the court to instruct the jury:

First. That the decree of the court of Jackson was conclusive as to the forfeiture of the land and the quantity forfeited; and that it was not competent for the defendant to contradict it by alleging that the land embraced by his grant for one hundred acres, was not forfeited.

Secondly. That if said one hundred acres had been before granted by the commonwealth to Girond, the grant to defendant passed nothing.

Thirdly. That the statute of limitations did not run against the state, and that it only commenced running against the plaintiff on the purchase at the commissioner's sale in the fall of 1841.

Fourthly. That the purchaser at said sale was entitled to the land purchased by him, and that when the sale was confirmed and the deed made, the latter related back to the sale, and that he was entitled to a deed at the time of the sale.

The court declined to give the instructions in the form and terms in which they were asked for; but instructed the jury, that the decree and proceedings in forfeiture adduced in evidence by the plaintiff, were *conclusive to show that the title under the grant to Honore Girond had been regularly forfeited to the commonwealth, and that the rights and interests acquired by the commonwealth or the literary fund had been passed to the purchaser at the sale made by the commissioner under said decree; and that it was not competent to contradict such forfeiture: But that the commonwealth took nothing by the forfeiture aforesaid, other than the right, title and interests which existed in those in whose name and for whose defaults such forfeiture accrued, and as the same were at the time of the forfeiture; and she took the same in the plight and condition in which it stood at the time of the forfeiture.

The court further instructed the jury, that in as much as the patent for one hundred acres to the defendant, bore date on the 1st day of April 1841, that he could not be in a condition to take the benefit of the act of March 18th, 1841, which only applied to patents issued previous to the 1st day of April 1841, if even in other respects he had shown himself within the provisions of that statute, by the payment of taxes, &c.; that the purchaser at the sale aforesaid, became entitled to all the rights which had vested in the commonwealth or literary fund, by the forfeiture aforesaid, and that his deed from the commissioner, when made, related back to the time of the sale of the said land.

The court further instructed the jury, that if the statute of limitations had commenced to run by reason of the adversary possession of the defendant against the said Honore Girond, under whom the plaintiff claims, by the forfeiture, sale and conveyance aforesaid, prior to the said forfeiture, that then and in that event the statute would continue to run, notwithstanding said forfeiture; and that if such adversary possession of the land in controversy was held by the defendant and those under whom he claimed, under a *claim of title, legal or equitable, commencing before such forfeiture, and continuing for seven years uninterruptedly, before the institution of the suit, that it would bar a recovery in this action.

The court also, in reply to an enquiry of the defendant's counsel, expressed the opinion that the forfeiture of the land granted to Girond did not accrue or become complete "until the decree of forfeiture was entered declaring the land to be forfeited."

To all these opinions of the court the plaintiffs excepted; and the jury having found a verdict for the defendant, he moved the court to set it aside and grant him a new trial. This motion was overruled, and the defendant again excepted; this bill of exceptions setting out the facts proven in the cause by reference to the first bill of exceptions in which they were fully stated. The court gave judgment for the defendant; and the plaintiff obtained a supersedeas from this court.

LEE, J. It is a maxim of great antiquity in the English law, that no time runs against the crown, or as it is expressed in the early law writers, "nullum tempus occurrit regi." Magdalen College Case, 11 Coke 68-74; S. C. 1 Roll. R. 151; Bracton, lib. 2, ch. 5, § 7; Britton, ch. 18, p. 29; 8 Bac. Abr. "Prerogative," E, p. 95; 7 Comy. Dig. "Prerog." D, 86, p. 90. And it may be laid down as a safe proposition, that no statute of limitations has been held to apply to suits by the crown, unless there has been an express provision including it. United States v. Hoar, 2 Mason's R. 311.

The reason sometimes assigned why no laches shall be imputed to the king, 577 is, that he is continually *busied for the public good, and has not leisure to assert his right within the period limited to subjects. Coke Litt. 90; 1 Black. Com. 247. A better reason is, the great public policy of preserving public rights and property from damage and loss through the negligence of public officers. Sheffield v. Ratcliffe, Hob. R. 347; United States v. Hoar, 2 Mason's R. 311; The People v. Gilbert, 18 John. R. 227; United States v. Kirkpatrick, 9 Wheat. R. 720-735. This reason certainly is equally, if not more, cogent in a representative government, where the power of the people is delegated to others, and must be exercised by these if exercised at all; and accordingly the principle is held to have been transferred to the sovereign people of this country when they succeeded to the rights of the king of Great Britain, and formed independent governments within the respective states. Inhab. of Stoughton v. Baker, 4 Mass. R. 522; The People v. Gilbert, 18 John. R. 227; Kemp v. Commonwealth, 1 Hen. & Munf. 85; Nimmo's ex'or v. Commonwealth, 4 Hen. & Munf. 57; Chiles v. Calk, 4 Bibb's R. 554; Commonwealth v. McGowan, Ibid. 62. And though it has been sometimes called a prerogative right, it is in fact nothing more than an exception or reservation introduced for the public benefit, and equally applicable to all governments. Per Story, J. United States v. Hoar, ubi supra.

Independently of the particular reason above referred to, another has been advanced, founded on the presumed legislative intention. In general, legislative acts are intended to regulate the acts and rights of citizens; and it is a rule of construction not to embrace the government or effect its rights by the general rules of a statute, unless it be expressly and in terms included or by necessary and unavoidable implication. United States v. Hoar, ubi supra; People v. Gilbert, 18 John. R. 227.

578 *This exemption from the imputation of laches and the operation of the statutes of limitation is not confined to debts and demands of personal nature in favor of the sovereign, but extends also to lands and real estate held jure coronæ. Bracton, lib. 3, ch. 3, p. 103; Lee v. Norris, Cro. Eliz. 331; Chiles v. Calk, 4 Bibb's R. 554; Johnston v. Irwin, 3 Serg. & Raw. R. 291. And accordingly, we find it treated as a settled maxim, that there can be no adversary possession of lands against the commonwealth, and that no time will bar her recovery, or that of her grantee, against the party holding, except only in the solitary case specially provided by statute, of a settlement of thirty years accompanied by payment of taxes or quit rents within that time. Gore v. Lawson, 8 Leigh 458; Tichanal v. Roe, 2 Rob. R. 288; Shanks v. Lancaster, 5 Gratt. 110. See also Ward v. Bartholomew, 6 Pick. R. 409.

But though the general rule will not be controverted, it may be said that it will not apply in the case of a forfeiture of lands to the commonwealth for failure of the owner to comply with her revenue laws, where an adversary possession had been commenced against the former owner before the forfeiture.

It is true, in a certain sense, the commonwealth takes the land on forfeiture in the same plight and condition in which it stood at the time of the forfeiture. The commonwealth takes the estate and title of the former owner, and no other. If at the time of the forfeiture his title were absolutely bound by the adversary possession of another, it may be no title would vest in the commonwealth, unless it were saved by the existence of her lien on the land for arrears of taxes; a point upon which I express no opinion. But if when the forfeiture accrued the right of entry still remained to the owner, though an adversary possession had been commenced, 579 the possession as to her *must lose its adversary character, and she must take and hold the subject with the same rights, privileges and immunities which pertain to any other lands held by her in her demesne. I can perceive no good reason why any discrimination should be made, or why she should hold forfeited lands upon different principles and with diminished privileges from the applying to other subjects of similar character. Certainly, the reason for exemption from the effects of laches and inattention on the part of her public officers, is as cogent in such a case as in any other whatever. Nor have I seen any case, so far as my investigation has extended, which warrants any such distinction. The case of Hall v. Gittings, 2 Har. & John. 112, fully supports the contrary doctrine. In that case certain lands, which had escheated to the lord proprietary (under grant of the English crown) were confiscated to and vested in the state of Maryland under the act of October 1780, ch. 49, without office found or actual entry. Prior to the confiscation, adversary possession of the land had been taken and was held against the proprietary. Yet it was held that upon the passage of the act of confiscation, such possession ceased to operate against the state during the time the title was vested in her, and that the defendant could not, upon the strength of such possession, resist the right of her subsequent grantee to recover. See also Harlock v. Jackson, 1 Constit. R. (S. C.) 135.

The opinion of the court in United States v. White, 2 Hill's N. Y. R. 59, might seem to countenance a different doctrine. It was an action on a promissory note by plaintiffs as endorsees, against defendant as maker. The defendant pleaded actio non accrevit infra, &c., and other pleas; to all of which the plaintiffs demurred. The court said that if the statute had commenced to run before the endorsement, it would continue to run afterwards even against the 580 plaintiffs, and *their privilege would not apply; but upon the pleadings, it held that the plaintiffs became the holders of the note before its maturity; and judgment for plaintiffs. Here then the question did not arise, and what was said by the court was obiter merely. And it might too not be difficult to show a marked difference in reference to the effect of the statute between the case of a state taking a note by contract of endorsement, voluntarily, and that of acquiring title to real estate by act of law under a forfeiture. The case of United States v. Buford, 3 Peters' R. 12, was assumpsit for moneys claimed from the defendant upon a receipt, in which he had promised to account for the same. The plaintiff claimed an assignment to the United States from the original contracting party; more than five years had elapsed after the cause of action arose before the assignment was made, and the statute of limitations was pleaded. The Supreme court held that as the bar of the statute was complete before the assignment, the plaintiffs could not recover; but it appears to be conceded that if the statute had not run its course when the assignment was made, the character of the claim might be so changed that it would be thereafter withdrawn from its operation.

I think, therefore, that as the right of entry of Girond had not been barred at the time of the forfeiture, if that were even fixed at the time assumed by the court, the possession of the defendant after that time ceased to be adversary, and became, as said in Harlock v. Jackson, ubi supra, the joint possession of himself and the other members of the community; and that the court erred in its opinion that the statute continued to run against the commonwealth. And this view I consider is fully sustained by the opinion of this court in the cases of Staats v. Board, 10 Gratt. 400, and Eale v. Branscum, 10 Gratt. 418.

According to the decisions of this 581 court in the cases *just referred to, and also that in the cases of Wild v. Serpell, 10 Gratt. 405, and Smith v. Chapman, Id. 445, the Circuit court also erred in its opinion as to the time at which the forfeiture under the Girond grant occurred or became complete. It appears to have proceeded on the notion that some inquest of office, or decree or other proceeding should have been had in order to declare and perfect the forfeiture. Nothing of the kind was necessary. The act of the 27th of February 1835, Sess. Acts, p. 11, declaring that lands which had been omitted from the books of the commissioners of the revenue should be forfeited unless the owners should cause the same to be entered and charged with taxes, and should pay the same except such as might be released by law, was intended by its own force and energy to render the forfeiture absolute and complete, without the necessity of any inquisition, judicial proceeding or finding of any kind, in order to consummate it. It was perfectly within the competence of the legislature to declare such forfeiture and divest the title by the mere operation of the act itself, and the whole legislation upon the subject of delinquent and forfeited lands, plainly manifests the intention to exercise its power in this form. By the fourth section of the act of March 6, 1827, Supp. Rev. Code 1819, p. 314, the title to lands vested in the literary fund for non-payment of taxes and not redeemed, is transferred in certain cases to those who may have settled and improved them under title claimed under a grant from the commonwealth. The language of the act is "that all right, title, &c." (of the literary fund) "shall be and the same is hereby relinquished to and vested in such person, &c." By the second section of the act of April 1, 1831, Supp. Rev. Code, p. 345, certain delinquent lands and lands sold and theretofore redeemed by the executive under 582 a previous act, which should not be re-deemed by a *given day, were declared to be forfeited. The language of the act is, "shall be from and after (the day named) absolutely forfeited, &c.;"—"and such lands, &c., shall be thenceforth and the same are hereby absolutely vested in" the literary fund. The eighth, ninth and tenth sections of the same act provide for transferring the title to certain forfeited and escheated lands to persons in possession under other grants in certain cases; and by the eleventh section, a mode is provided by which the occupant is to obtain a decree on petition to the proper court, investing him with the title. But by the act of March 10th, 1832, this proceeding is dispensed with, and the title immediately vested by the operation of the act. Its language is, "all such lands, &c., shall be and the same are hereby declared to be absolutely vested in such holders, and as to those not yet forfeited, immediately after the forfeiture, &c.; and such holder in any action brought against him for the recovery of such land, shall have the full benefit of the commonwealth's right hereby intended to be transferred to him." The act of February 1835, in similar language, forfeits omitted lands, if not assessed and the taxes paid, after the 1st of July 1836; and the title thus vested in the commonwealth is transferred to and absolutely vested in any person in possession claiming bona fide under a grant bearing date previous to the 1st of April 1831.

All these provisions, and those of similar character in other acts, would seem to be utterly incompatible with the idea of an inquest of office, or any such proceeding, being necessary to consummate or give effect to the forfeiture.

I think there is little aid to be derived in construing these statutes from the common law doctrines in relation to forfeiture of land for crimes to the crown. These acts were designed to remedy certain evils for were intended to perform the office and perfect the remedy proposed by their own mere force and operation. Where by statute a forfeiture of goods is created, the property, by the forfeiture, is divested out of the owner without any proceeding on the part of the state, and becomes vested in the government. Coke Litt. 128; Wilkins v. Despard, 5 T. R. 112; Fontaine v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 10 John. R. 58; Kennedy v. Strong, 14 John. R. 131. Where it is of lands, the same rule should prevail if such is the plain intention of the legislature. See Barbour v. Nelson, 1 Litt. R. 60. Even at common law, though lands or goods forfeited for treason or felony, could not be seized into the king's hands, nor granted by him to another, before attainder, yet the forfeiture of the lands relates to the time of the offence, to avoid all subsequent sales and incumbrances; otherwise as to goods. Coke Litt. 390 b; Hale's Pl. C. 264; 4 Com. Dig. "Forfeiture," (B 6,) p. 412; Ibid. p. 413, and note u; 4 Bac. Abr. "Forfeiture," D. p. 346.

By the act of February 9th, 1814, 2 Rev. Code 1819, p. 545, all previous laws forfeiting omitted lands were repealed, and all previous forfeitures of the same released; and as no provision was made subsequently in relation to such lands until the passage of the act of February 1835, no forfeiture could occur previous to that time. By the act of March 1836, Sess. Acts, p. 7, further time was allowed till the 1st of November 1836, for the owners of omitted lands to enter the same on the books, and have them charged with taxes, and to pay such taxes, as prescribed by the second section of the act of February 1835. But on failure of such owners to perform this duty, the forfeiture became absolute and consummate from and after the 1st of November 1836, and the provisions of subsequent laws giving 584 time for redemption did not release *the forfeiture which had accrued, except in such cases where the owner availed himself of the opportunities of redemption thus afforded.

In this case, therefore, the forfeiture accrued and became complete on the 1st of November 1836, and the Circuit court erred in not so instructing the jury, instead of fixing it at the date of the decree for the sale, or decree of forfeiture, as it is styled in the bill of exceptions.

I think the Circuit court committed no error in instructing the jury, that as the defendant's grant bore date on the 1st of April 1841, he was not in a condition to take the benefit of the act of March 1841, though in other respects he could show himself to be within the provisions of that act, because it only applied to grants issued previous to the 1st of April 1841; and that the purchaser at the commissioner's sale acquired all the right vested in the commonwealth by the forfeiture of the Girond title, and that his deed from the commissioner related back to the sale of the land. But I do not perceive why the court refused to instruct the jury, that if the land embraced by the defendant's grant had been before granted by the commonwealth to Girond, nothing passed to the defendant under his grant. The court very correctly refused to exclude it from the jury, because in doing so it would have undertaken to decide that the boundaries of the grant to Girond did in fact embrace the land covered by the defendant's grant; a matter which it was the province of the jury to determine; but if the jury should be of that opinion, the court should have instructed them that the commonwealth's title passed by the elder grant to Girond; and there remained nothing which could pass by the junior grant to the defendant. That before the grant to the defendant issued, the title under the Girond grant had been forfeited to the commonwealth, will give no 585 strength to the defendant's *grant;

because it was for land entered and surveyed by him as waste and unappropriated land, and there was no act then in force authorizing forfeited lands to be entered as waste and unappropriated; the act which at one time had authorized it, having been repealed. And in the absence of such a statutory provision, no title could be acquired to such lands by entry and survey, and a patent obtained for them would be merely void. The law pointed out the mode by which the title to such lands was to be passed, and that was by sale and conveyance by the commissioner of forfeited lands, and any attempt to acquire title to them in any other mode would be utterly ineffectual. When a conveyance should be made in the mode prescribed by law, it would pass the forfeited title and overreach any intermediate grant founded upon an entry and survey; such grant not precluding the commonwealth from making a deed through her commissioner in the appointed mode, which would be effectual to pass the title vested in her by the forfeiture. Wilcox v. Calloway, 1 Wash. 38; Whittington v. Christian, 2 Rand. 353.

In the refusal of the court to give the first and fourth instructions asked for by the plaintiff, in the terms suggested by him, there was no error of which he can complain, because the court did give in substance, if not in the same language, all and so much of said instructions as he could properly require; the portion of the first instruction which seems to have been omitted being so obscurely expressed as to leave in doubt the meaning intended; and it was for that cause, if no other, properly omitted.

With regard to the third instruction: From what I have already said, it will appear that the court erred in refusing to give so much of it as informed the jury that the statute of limitations did not run against the commonwealth upon the facts in 586 this case. Whether, *however the statute only commenced to run against the plaintiff from the time of the sale by the commissioner in November 1841, as the plaintiff contended, or whether the time for which the defendant held the land before the forfeiture accrued to the commonwealth, is to be added to that for which he held it after the commissioner's sale and up to the institution of the suit, with a view to make out a bar under the statute, is a question which will require very grave consideration when it shall be necessary to decide it. In this case no such necessity exists, because giving to the defendant the benefit of his possession from the time he got the title bond from Hector under which he claimed title, until the forfeiture took place, (and he can claim nothing more because he wholly fails to connect himself in any way with the anterior possession held by Smith,) and adding to it the whole period from the sale by the commissioner in November 1841 down to the institution of the suit, it will not amount to seven years' possession, which is necessary to constitute the statutory bar. I leave this, therefore, without further comment.

For the reasons I have thus endeavored to assign, I am of opinion to reverse the judgment, and to remand the cause for a new trial.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Lee, J.

Judgment reversed.

587 *Kincheloe v. Tracewells.

July Term, 1854, Lewisburg.

(Absent DANIEL, J.)

1. Unlawful Entry—Removal of Cause.—A warrant for unlawful entry, &c., is a civil action, which may be removed, on motion, without notice, from the County to the Circuit court, if it has remained undecided for a year or upwards: And the time is to be estimated from the organization of the court summoned to try it.

Civil Actions—Removal from County to Circuit Court.—See foot-note to Harrison v. Middleton, 11 Gratt. 527, and cases there cited, all of which cite the principal case. See generally, monographic note on "Unlawful Detainer" appended to Dobson v. Culpepper, 23 Gratt. 352.

2. Unlawful Detainer—What Plaintiff Must Prove.—To entitle the plaintiff to recover upon a warrant of unlawful detainer, he must prove that the defendant withheld the possession at the date of the warrant. But if the warrant does not state the withholding of the possession by the defendant, that may be aided by the complaint which states the fact.

3. Instructions—Partially Erroneous—Court Need Not Modify.†—Upon a motion by plaintiff to instruct the jury to disregard all the documentary evidence introduced by the defendant, of which some part is legal and other illegal, the court may properly overrule the motion, without undertaking to state to the jury which is legal and which is illegal.

4. Adversary Possession—Interlock—Case at Bar.‡—The boundaries of two coterminous owners of land interlock; and the party claiming under the elder patent, enters upon his land outside the †Instructions—Partially Erroneous—The Court Need Not Modify.—In Green v. Crain, 12 Gratt. 254, the principal case and Harvey v. Epes, 12 Gratt. 153, were cited as holding that the courts may decide upon motions to instruct the jury just as they are made, and are under no legal necessity of shifting or modifying such motions so as to separate and withhold the erroneous portions from the jury.

But, though an instruction as asked is not wholly correct, yet, if the general refusal of it may mislead the jury, the court should accompany the refusal with an explanation to the jury, or should give them an instruction stating the correct proposition. Foot-note to Peshine v. Shepperson, 17 Gratt. 473.

But see, on the whole subject, monographic note on "Instructions" appended to Womack v. Circle, 29 Gratt. 192.

Evidence—Objection to.—A general objection to evidence, part of which is admissible and part inadmissible, will be overruled by the court; the objection should specifically point out the objectionable part of the evidence in order to have it excluded. Sulphur Mines Co. v. Thompson, 93 Va. 307, 25 S. E. Rep. 232, citing the principal case.

‡Adversary Possession—Interlock.—See monographic note on "Adversary Possession" appended to Nowlin v. Reynolds, 25 Gratt. 137.

Same—Same—"The Open Question."—When the senior patentee is in actual possession of a part of his grant, but outside of the interlock, at the time of the junior patentee, does the latter, by an actual possession of a small part of the interlock, gain a prescriptive title to his pedis posito only, or to all of the land within the interlock? This is known as "the open question" in Virginia. Several articles have been written on this subject in the Virginia Law Registers. See 3 Va. Law Reg. 763; 3 Va. Law Reg. 848; 4 Va. Law Reg. 8; 4 Va. Law Reg. 138; 5 Va. Law Reg. 810.

In Garrett v. Ramsey, 26 W. Va. 376, JUDGE SNYDER, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "I, therefore, conclude that the quære or proposition under discussion should be decided in the affirmative; that is, where the elder grantee is in actual possession of the land covered by his grant outside of the interlock and the adverse or junior claimant is in the actual possession of a part of the land in the interlock claiming the whole, he will in contemplation of law and by force of the said statute be treated as being in the actual possession of the whole land embraced within his grant or color of title. The foregoing conclusion is fully sustained interlock, and cultivates and improves it, holding continued possession thereof. The party claiming under the junior patent, enters on his land outside the interlock, and clears and improves it and lives upon it, the land in the interlock being uncleared; and he exercises such continued acts of ownership over the whole land lying within the interlock as constitutes an adversary possession thereof, though but a part of it is cleared and enclosed; and after thus living on his land and acting for upwards of five years, he dies in possession, and his heirs continue to hold possession, and claim and exercise like acts of ownership over the land within the interlock. Held:

1. Same—Same—Same.—The possession of the heirs is not limited to their inclosure.

2. Same—Same—Same—Entry Tolled by Descent.—The entry of the party holding under the senior patent is tolled by the five years' possession and descent cast; and he cannot recover by a warrant of unlawful detainer.

by the able and instructive opinion of JUDGE BALDWIN in Taylor v. Burnside, 1 Gratt. 190. It is also sustained by the opinion of JUDGE LEE, as I understand it, in the case of Koerner v. Rankin, 11 Gratt. 424, and by the decision of the court in Cline v. Catron, 22 Gratt. 378, 392, though the question was not directly presented by the record in the two latter cases." In this decision, JOHNSON, P., and WOODS, J., concurred, GREEN, J., dissenting. Thus the question would seem settled as far as West Virginia is concerned.

But the Virginia courts maintain that the cases cited by SNYDER, J. (see preceding paragraph), do not decide this question. In Turpin v. Saunders, 32 Gratt. 88, STAPLES, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "I did not sit in the case of 'Cline's Heirs v. Catron,' having been counsel in the lower court. But I am confident this question (i. e., 'The Open Question') did not arise either upon the evidence or upon any of the instructions propounded on either side. It is obvious that JUDGE ANDERSON did not intend to lay down any such doctrine as the reported opinion would seem to indicate. What I take it he intended to say was, that when the junior grantee has actual possession of a part of the interlock, and the senior grantee has actual possession of no part of his tract, then the possession of the junior grantee is not confined to his pedis positio, but is coextensive with the boundaries called for in his grant. A proposition of law, sound in itself, and sustained by the authorities. It is, however, a very different matter, where, as in this case, the senior grantee was in possession of a part of the land within the limits of his grant, although outside of the interlock. The question involved in this latter proposition was discussed by JUDGE BALDWIN in Taylor's Devisees v. Burnside, 1 Gratt. 165, 196; and again alluded to in Overton's Heirs v. Davisson, 1 Gratt. 211, 224; but the judges being divided in opinion, it was not decided. It was also mentioned by JUDGE LEE in Kincheloe v. Tracewells, 11 Gratt. 587, 603, and again left undecided. So that it is still an open question in Virginia. As a decision of the point is not required in the case before us, it is better it shall so remain until a thorough discussion can be had before a full bench. What is now said is only said for the purpose of removing an erroneous impression, which has gone abroad with respect to what was actually decided in Cline's Heirs v. Catron."

5. Transfer of Land in Adversary Possession of Another—Effect.—A deed conveying land then, and continuing to be, in the actual adversary possession of another, cannot operate to pass the title to the grantee.

588 *6. Entry on Land—What Possession Necessary to Bar Right.—In 1831 and until the passage of the act of March 30th, 1837, no possession short of fifteen years, unaided by a descent cast, would bar the entry of one having right or title to the land.

7. Adversary Possession—Claim of Title Necessary—Color of Title Unnecessary.—An entry upon land in the possession of another, in order to operate an ouster and give a possession to the party entering, must be with claim of title: But the claim of title need not be under a deed or other writing; or if it is under a deed, it is not necessary that his possession shall be restricted to what shall prove to be within the precise boundaries of his deed.

Adversary Possession.—On the general subject of adversary possession, see the principal case also cited in Brown v. Caldwell, 23 W. Va. 194; Witten v. St. Clair, 27 W. Va. 772; Taylor v. Philippi, 35 W. Va. 560, 14 S. E. Rep. 123; Olinger v. Shepherd, 12 Gratt. 478.

§Transfer of Land in Adversary Possession of Another—Effect.—See, in accord, Early v. Garland, 13 Gratt. 1; Carrington v. Goddin, 13 Gratt. 599. See also, Tabb v. Baird, 3 Call 475; Hall v. Hall, 3 Call 488. But, by Code of 1849, it was enacted that "any interest in or claim to real estate may be disposed of by deed or will" (Va. Code 1849, ch. 116, sec. 5; Va. Code 1857, sec. 2418). See Carrington v. Goddin, 13 Gratt. 597.

§Adversary Possession—Claim of Title Necessary—Color of Title Unnecessary.—In Creekmur v. Creekmur, 75 Va. 440, the principal case was cited to the point that an entry to operate as an ouster must be accompanied with claim of title, but that the claim may be wholly independent of any writing; and that, even where the party entering claims under a deed or other writing with a specific boundary, he may go outside of his boundary and acquire adversary possession of land not included in his colorable title. Again, in Va. Midland R. Co. v. Barbour, 97 Va. 122, 33 S. E. Rep. 554, the court (citing the principal case, Creekmur v. Creekmur, 75 Va. 430, and Sulphur Mines Co. v. Thompson, 98 Va. 319, 320, 25 S. E. Rep. 232) said that the question in cases of adverse possession is not whether the claim asserted is good or bad, but whether there has been a hostile claim of title and continuous possession under it for the statutory period; nor is it necessary that such hostile claim should be under color of title, that is under a deed or other writing. See, in accord, the principal case also cited in Oney v. Clendenin, 28 W. Va. 54; foot-note to Koerner v. Rankin, 11 Gratt. 420.

On this subject, see further monographic note on "Adversary Possession" appended to Nowlin v. Reynolds, 25 Gratt. 137.

Same—Claim of Title—Extent of Possession.—The principal office of a claim or color of title is to define the boundaries and fix the extent of the adverse holding. If it is a mere claim of title—that is, a mere assertion of right without any paper title—the adverse holding will be limited to the actual

8. Unlawful Detainer—The issue.†—Whatever may be the effect in ejectment or a writ of right, of the party in possession having taken that possession under a mistake as to the true boundary of his land; in a warrant of unlawful detainer, the question is whether in fact such entry had been made and possession taken, and how long before the institution of the suit; and the mistake if it existed, is wholly unimportant.

9. Instructions—Obscure—Misleading—Irrelevant.*—

The court should refuse to give an instruction, where it is obscure and calculated to mislead the jury; or where it asks the court to decide upon a fact in issue in the cause; or where it is irrelevant or not applicable to the evidence.

10. Appellate Practice—Harmless Error of Lower Court.††—Though the court below should err in enclosure of the claimant. But, if it is a deed or other paper title, and the possession is exclusive, it will be regarded as coextensive with the boundaries contained in such deed or paper. The color of title however may be good or bad, legal or equitable.

The principal case is cited in support of this proposition—or some portion of it—in Core v. Faupe, 24 W. Va. 245, 247; Storrs v. Feick, 24 W. Va. 609; Oney v. Clendenin, 28 W. Va. 53 (citing also Taylor v. Burnsides, 1 Gratt. 165; Shanks v. Lancaster, 5 Gratt. 110; Overton v. Davisson, 1 Gratt. 211; Kolner v. Rankin, 11 Gratt. 420; Adams v. Alkire, 20 W. Va. 480; Garrett v. Ramsey, 26 W. Va. 345); Congrove v. Burdett, 28 W. Va. 225. See also, the principal case cited in Garrett v. Ramsey, 26 W. Va. 369; *Parkersburg, etc., Co. v. ¶ Unlawful Detainer—General Verdict.—Gorman v. Steed, 1 W. Va. 15, was a case of unlawful detainer in which there was a verdict for the plaintiff as follows: "We the jury find that the defendant unlawfully withholds from the plaintiff, the possession of the premises in the within summons mentioned; and that he has not so held the possession thereof for three years prior to the institution of this suit, and therefore we find for the plaintiff." Objection was made that the verdict was not responsive to the issues, because it failed to find that the defendant unlawfully withheld the premises in question at the time of the institution of the suit. But the court said: "This objection is not well taken, because the verdict is substantially a general verdict for the plaintiff below. And a general verdict, in effect, finds every essential fact necessary to authorize it, and withholding the possession at the date of the institution of the suit, is one of those facts. Olinger v. Shepherd, 12 Gratt. 462; Kincheloe v. Tracewells, 11 Gratt. 587."

See generally, monographic note on "Unlawful Detainer" appended to Dobson v. Culpepper, 23 Gratt. 353.

*Instructions—Misleading.—See principal case cited and approved in Campbell v. Hughes, 12 W. Va. 209. See also, foot-note to Boswell's Case, 20 Gratt. 860; monographic note on "Instructions" appended to Womack v. Circle, 29 Gratt. 192.

††Appellate Practice—Harmless Errors in the Lower Court.—The great majority of Virginia and West Virginia decisions seem to uphold the proposition of the principal case, that where it clearly appears affirmatively that an error of the lower court could deciding upon a proposition submitted to it, yet if it can be seen from the bill of exceptions, that the decision did not and could not affect the merits of the case, it is not ground for reversing the judgment.

On the 26th of May 1849 Nestor Kincheloe made complaint, that Mary, Moses, Aaron and Wesley Tracewell had unlawfully turned him out of, and against his consent withheld from him, the possession of a certain tenement containing by estimation twenty-five acres of land lying in the county of Wood, whereof he prayed restitution. This complaint was accompanied by his affidavit to the truth of the facts stated in his complaint. On the same day a warrant was issued by a justice of the peace for the not affect the merits of the case, nor in any way be prejudicial to the party appealing, the appellate court will not reverse the judgment on the ground of such error. See cases collected in foot-note to Binns v. Waddill, 32 Gratt. 588.

But it seems also in accord with the weight of authority that if a misdirection or other mistake of the court appear in the record, it must be presumed that it affected the verdict of the jury, and is therefore a ground for which the judgment must be reversed, unless it plainly appear from the whole record that the error did not and could not, have affected the verdict. Kimball v. Borden, 95 Va. 207, 28 S. E. Rep. 207, citing the principal case; Danville Bank v. Waddill, 27 Gratt. 448; Edmunds v. Harper, 31 Gratt. 637, 644; Richmond Ry., etc., Co. v. Garthright, 92 Va. 637, 631, 24 S. E. Rep. 267; 4 Min. Inst. (4th Ed.) 937.

For the more specific proposition, that, where there is error in giving, or refusing to give, certain instructions; or in admitting, or refusing to admit, certain evidence, if it is manifestly evident from the record that the appellant could not have been prejudiced thereby, such error can afford no ground for a reversal of the judgment, see principal case cited in Bank v. Waddill, 27 Gratt. 450; Binns v. Waddill, 32 Gratt. 592; Snouffer v. Hansbrough, 79 Va. 180; Payne v. Grant, 81 Va. 173; Bernard v. R. F. & P. R. R. Co., 85 Va. 794, 8 S. E. Rep. 785; Reusens v. Lawson, 91 Va. 258, 21 S. E. Rep. 347; Richmond Ry., etc., Co. v. Garthright, 92 Va. 631, 24 S. E. Rep. 267; Nicholas v. Kershner, 20 W. Va. 263. But there is not perfect harmony of decision on this subject in either Virginia or West Virginia.

As to the rule of action of a court in reversing a judgment on account of erroneous instruction, see foot-note to Colvin v. Menefee, 11 Gratt. 87, where there is an extended review of the Virginia and West Virginia decisions in point. Further remarks here, on this subject, would be superfluous.

As to when there will be a reversal of judgment because of error in admitting, or excluding, evidence, see foot-note to Early v. Wilkinson, 9 Gratt. 68.

In Western M. & M. Co. v. Virginia, etc., Co., 10 W. Va. 295, the court, citing the principal case as authority, lays down the proposition, that, though the lower court errs in refusing to allow an amended bill to be filed, yet, if such error does not affect the merits of the case, nor in any way injure the party tendering such bill, it is no ground for reversing the decree of the lower court.

See principal case also cited in Burtners v. Keran, 24 Gratt. 73.

county of Wood, which recited that Kincheloe had made complaint that the Tracewells unlawfully and against his consent withheld from him the possession of a certain tenement, &c., and directed the sheriff of the county to summon the parties to appear at the court-house of this county on the 7th day of June 1849, to answer the complaint; and also directed the sheriff to summon two justices and a jury to appear there at the same time to try the complaint.

589 *The court was organized on the day appointed, and an order was made directing the surveyor of the county to make a survey of the land in controversy; and it then adjourned until the 23rd of the same month. The court seems afterwards to have adjourned until the 17th of August, when the defendants moved the court to quash the warrant and complaint; which motion was overruled. A jury was then impanelled for the trial of the cause, which failed to agree in a verdict and was discharged; and the cause was continued for a trial to be had at the next term of the court. At the July term 1850 of the County court of Wood, on the motion of the plaintiff, and because the cause had remained in that court for more than one year without being determined, an order was made removing it to the Circuit court of the county.

At the October term 1851 of the Circuit court, the defendants again made a motion to quash the complaint and warrant, which was overruled: And at the November term 1852 a jury was impaneled to try whether the defendants, at any time within three years next before the exhibition of the complaint filed by the plaintiff in the cause, did unlawfully enter upon the tenement in the said complaint mentioned, and turn the said plaintiff out of possession thereof; and whether the defendants continued to hold the possession thereof at the time of the exhibition of said complaint.

On the trial the plaintiff claimed under a patent bearing date the 20th day of October 1785, by which there was granted to Mark Hardin nine hundred and nine acres of land lying on the lower side of the Little Kanawha river, about six miles above its mouth, beginning at a sugar tree at the mouth of Grape creek, and running down the river. Hardin sold and conveyed this land in 1805 to Hugh Phelps, who 590 entered *upon it, but outside of the land in controversy, and cultivated and improved it. In 1821 Phelps conveyed one hundred and fifty acres of his tract of land to Vandiver and Marsh, who took possession of it, and cultivated and improved it. This tract, it was insisted, embraced the land in controversy, but their improvements were not upon that part of it. The land conveyed to Vandiver and Marsh passed by several intermediate conveyances to John Ralston in September 1832; and he conveyed it to the plaintiff Nelson Kincheloe in October 1842. There was no doubt that the successive owners of this land from the time of Hugh Phelps had been in the constant occupation and cultivation of it;

but no part of their improvements was upon the land in controversy. And there is little reason to doubt that the boundaries of Hardin's patent, and consequently of the plaintiff's conveyance, included this disputed land.

The defendants claimed under a patent to John Gibson for one thousand acres of land, bearing date the 20th of October 1785, the same date as that of Hardin. This land was also on the Little Kanawha river, and called to include the mouth of Tygart's or Grape creek, and run up the river.

John Gibson died, leaving three children his heirs; and his son John is alleged to have transferred his interest in this land to William Laing: but the proof on this point is defective. There was an allotment of a part of the tract to the children of one of John Gibson's heirs, under a decree of the County court of Wood; and there were deeds of partition executed by attorneys in fact between James Gibson and Laing in December 1830, by which the land next to that held by the plaintiff was allotted to Laing. In August 1831 Laing by his attorney and agent sold to Arnold Tracewell one hundred acres of his land, and executed to him a bond by which he bound himself to convey *the same to him. 591

This one hundred acres was described as lying on the Little Kanawha, immediately above the mouth of Tygart's creek, beginning at a sugar tree on the bank of the river; and one of its lines called to run to a corner of Kincheloe, and thence with the line of the tract owned by the plaintiff at the time of the trial, to the beginning. Laing in May 1833 conveyed his whole tract to James M. Stephenson; and in August 1834 Stephenson conveyed to Tracewell the one hundred acres purchased by him from Laing.

Arnold Tracewell entered upon the land purchased by him of Laing in 1831, all of it then being in forest and uncultivated, and in August of that year had a corner marked, and a line run and marked from thence to the beginning corner of Hardin's survey on the river at the mouth of Tygart's creek. This corner and line is that claimed by the defendants in this cause, and includes all the land in controversy in their tract. After running the exterior boundaries of said tract, Tracewell, in August 1832, moved upon the land, taking with him his wife and two children, and continued in possession claiming up to the marked boundaries, until the year 1834, when he received his deed for the land; and continued the possession in the same manner, claiming the same marked boundaries, up to the 22nd of November 1839; at which time he died.

In 1832 or 1833 Tracewell made some thousand rails upon the land in controversy, and sold them. He also sold timber from it to make some eighty thousand staves; and in 1837 he took cord-wood from it and also tan-bark. Whilst he was thus living on the land he bought of Laing, he made sugar on this land in controversy; and since his death the defendants rented out the sugar camp: And during Arnold Tracewell's life time the family obtained their fire-wood off this disputed land; and during all that time John Rolston, 592 *under whom the plaintiff immediately claims, and who lived on the land now owned by the plaintiff, was cognizant of the aforesaid acts of ownership, and made no objection thereto: He set up no claim to the disputed territory; and recognized the corner and line marked and run by Tracewell as the dividing line between them.

The family of Arnold Tracewell, who were the defendants, continued to reside upon the said land, claiming the boundaries their ancestor had claimed, exercising acts of ownership over the land in controversy, and took timber therefrom for a barn, until about the year 1845 or 1846, at which time some person (supposed to be the plaintiff in this suit) cut and made some rails upon it, which the defendants hauled off: And some of the family attended at the August quarterly term of the court for that year, for the purpose of indicting the plaintiff for his alleged trespass, when they were met by the plaintiff, who agreed that if they would not try to indict him, he would not trouble them any more for that land: And no indictment was made, nor was there any further difficulty until the institution of this suit.

All the evidence having been submitted to the jury, the plaintiff, after the opening argument had been concluded, and one of the counsel for the defendants was about concluding his argument, moved the court to exclude from the jury all the documentary evidence offered by the defendants, and purporting to deduce title from the patent of Gibson to the defendants, upon the ground that the same did not connect the defendants with the legal title from Gibson. But the court overruled the motion; and the plaintiff excepted.

The defendants then moved the court to give three instructions, which are not stated. The court refused to give them, because they were not considered in 593 all *respects applicable to the case; but in lieu thereof gave the following:

First. If the jury shall believe, from the evidence, that the deed to the plaintiff, and the several deeds of the persons under whom he claims (commencing with the deed of the attorney of Mark Hardin the patentee, and the patent to the said Hardin), embrace the land in controversy, and that from the time the tract claimed by the plaintiff was severed from the residue of the land contained in the said patent; that the several persons under whom he claims according to the terms of their deeds resided on and improved and cultivated the same, but if none of them resided on, improved or cultivated any part of the land in controversy, but that the same continued to be a forest, and in a state of nature until Arnold Tracewell, the ancestor of the defendants, entered upon the said land under his deed from James M. Stephenson; and if they shall believe that the said one hundred acres conveyed by said deed was plainly marked and bounded; that it embraced the land in controversy, and that the said Arnold Tracewell by virtue of his said deed entered upon the said land in controversy, claiming the same as his own, embraced by the deeds under which the plaintiff claims, and also embraced in the deed under which the said Tracewell entered with intention to take possession of all within his metes and bounds (if the said land in controversy should appear from the evidence to be unimproved forest lands), and took and held actual adverse possession thereof by residence, improvement, cultivation or other open, notorious and habitual acts of ownership, such possession operated as a disseizin of the person owning and in possession of the land claimed by the plaintiff to the interference, notwithstanding the said Tracewell may not have inclosed and cultivated the whole of the land in controversy. And if he so continued in the possession of 594 the land in *controversy under his said claim until the time of his death; if such continuous possession was five years or upwards, and so died in such possession; that on his death there was a descent cast upon his heirs, which would toll the entry of the plaintiff or those under whom he claims, then being the owner of the land now claimed by the plaintiff; and if the said defendants continued the possession as held by their said ancestor and had not abandoned the same at any time before the commencement of the present suit, the plaintiff could not, under such circumstances, maintain a warrant for unlawful entry.

Second. If the jury shall believe from the evidence, that the said Arnold Tracewell, the father of the defendants, entered upon the land in controversy and took possession of it at the time and in the manner supposed in the first instruction, and that he remained in such possession for more than three years after he so took the possession; if they shall also believe that the defendants, at the time that their father so took possession, were infants of tender years, they cannot be considered so responsible for any act that he did upon said land as to enable the plaintiff to maintain an unlawful entry against such infants for such acts.

Third. If the jury shall believe that the said Arnold Tracewell took and held adverse possession of the land in controversy at the time and in the manner supposed in the first instruction, and died so possessed, and that the defendants took possession after his death in the manner in which he had so taken and held the same, and had at no time abandoned said possession, and were in the actual adverse possession of said land in controversy at the time of the conveyance to the plaintiff, then his deed was inoperative for the land in controversy so held in adverse possession.

county of Wood, which recited that Kincheloe had made complaint that the Tracewells unlawfully and against his consent withheld from him the possession of a certain tenement, &c., and directed the sheriff of the county to summon the parties to appear at the court-house of this county on the 7th day of June 1849, to answer the complaint; and also directed the sheriff to summon two justices and a jury to appear there at the same time to try the complaint.

589 *The court was organized on the day appointed, and an order was made directing the surveyor of the county to make a survey of the land in controversy; and it then adjourned until the 23rd of the same month. The court seems afterwards to have adjourned until the 17th of August, when the defendants moved the court to quash the warrant and complaint; which motion was overruled. A jury was then impanelled for the trial of the cause, which failed to agree in a verdict and was discharged; and the cause was continued for a trial to be had at the next term of the court. At the July term 1850 of the County court of Wood, on the motion of the plaintiff, and because the cause had remained in that court for more than one year without being determined, an order was made removing it to the Circuit court of the county.

At the October term 1851 of the Circuit court, the defendants again made a motion to quash the complaint and warrant, which was overruled: And at the November term 1852 a jury was impaneled to try whether the defendants, at any time within three years next before the exhibition of the complaint filed by the plaintiff in the cause, did unlawfully enter upon the tenement in the said complaint mentioned, and turn the said plaintiff out of possession thereof; and whether the defendants continued to hold the possession thereof at the time of the exhibition of said complaint.

On the trial the plaintiff claimed under a patent bearing date the 20th day of October 1785, by which there was granted to Mark Hardin nine hundred and nine acres of land lying on the lower side of the Little Kanawha river, about six miles above its mouth, beginning at a sugar tree at the mouth of Grape creek, and running down the river. Hardin sold and conveyed this land in 1805 to Hugh Phelps, who 590 entered *upon it, but outside of the land in controversy, and cultivated and improved it. In 1821 Phelps conveyed one hundred and fifty acres of his tract of land to Vandiver and Marsh, who took possession of it, and cultivated and improved it. This tract, it was insisted, embraced the land in controversy, but their improvements were not upon that part of it. The land conveyed to Vandiver and Marsh passed by several intermediate conveyances to John Ralston in September 1832; and he conveyed it to the plaintiff Nelson Kincheloe in October 1842. There was no doubt that the successive owners of this land from the time of Hugh Phelps had been in the constant occupation and cultivation of it;

but no part of their improvements was upon the land in controversy. And there is little reason to doubt that the boundaries of Hardin's patent, and consequently of the plaintiff's conveyance, included this disputed land.

The defendants claimed under a patent to John Gibson for one thousand acres of land, bearing date the 20th of October 1785, the same date as that of Hardin. This land was also on the Little Kanawha river, and called to include the mouth of Tygart's or Grape creek, and run up the river.

John Gibson died, leaving three children his heirs; and his son John is alleged to have transferred his interest in this land to William Laing: but the proof on this point is defective. There was an allotment of a part of the tract to the children of one of John Gibson's heirs, under a decree of the County court of Wood; and there were deeds of partition executed by attorneys in fact between James Gibson and Laing in December 1830, by which the land next to that held by the plaintiff was allotted to Laing. In August 1831 Laing by his attorney and agent sold to Arnold Tracewell one hundred acres of his land, and executed to 591 him a bond by which he bound himself to convey *the same to him.

This one hundred acres was described as lying on the Little Kanawha, immediately above the mouth of Tygart's creek, beginning at a sugar tree on the bank of the river; and one of its lines called to run to a corner of Kincheloe, and thence with the line of the tract owned by the plaintiff at the time of the trial, to the beginning. Laing in May 1833 conveyed his whole tract to James M. Stephenson; and in August 1834 Stephenson conveyed to Tracewell the one hundred acres purchased by him from Laing.

Arnold Tracewell entered upon the land purchased by him of Laing in 1831, all of it then being in forest and uncultivated, and in August of that year had a corner marked, and a line run and marked from thence to the beginning corner of Hardin's survey on the river at the mouth of Tygart's creek. This corner and line is that claimed by the defendants in this cause, and includes all the land in controversy in their tract. After running the exterior boundaries of said tract, Tracewell, in August 1832, moved upon the land, taking with him his wife and two children, and continued in possession claiming up to the marked boundaries, until the year 1834, when he received his deed for the land; and continued the possession in the same manner, claiming the same marked boundaries, up to the 22nd of November 1839; at which time he died.

In 1832 or 1833 Tracewell made some thousand rails upon the land in controversy, and sold them. He also sold timber from it to make some eighty thousand staves; and in 1837 he took cord-wood from it and also tan-bark. Whilst he was thus living on the land he bought of Laing, he made sugar on this land in controversy; and since his death the defendants rented out the sugar camp: And during Arnold Tracewell's life time the family obtained their fire-wood off this disputed land; and during all that time John Rolston, 592 *under whom the plaintiff immediately claims, and who lived on the land now owned by the plaintiff, was cognizant of the aforesaid acts of ownership, and made no objection thereto: He set up no claim to the disputed territory; and recognized the corner and line marked and run by Tracewell as the dividing line between them.

The family of Arnold Tracewell, who were the defendants, continued to reside upon the said land, claiming the boundaries their ancestor had claimed, exercising acts of ownership over the land in controversy, and took timber therefrom for a barn, until about the year 1845 or 1846, at which time some person (supposed to be the plaintiff in this suit) cut and made some rails upon it, which the defendants hauled off: And some of the family attended at the August quarterly term of the court for that year, for the purpose of indicting the plaintiff for his alleged trespass, when they were met by the plaintiff, who agreed that if they would not try to indict him, he would not trouble them any more for that land: And no indictment was made, nor was there any further difficulty until the institution of this suit.

All the evidence having been submitted to the jury, the plaintiff, after the opening argument had been concluded, and one of the counsel for the defendants was about concluding his argument, moved the court to exclude from the jury all the documentary evidence offered by the defendants, and purporting to deduce title from the patent of Gibson to the defendants, upon the ground that the same did not connect the defendants with the legal title from Gibson. But the court overruled the motion; and the plaintiff excepted.

The defendants then moved the court to give three instructions, which are not stated. The court refused to give them, because they were not considered in 593 all *respects applicable to the case; but in lieu thereof gave the following:

First. If the jury shall believe, from the evidence, that the deed to the plaintiff, and the several deeds of the persons under whom he claims (commencing with the deed of the attorney of Mark Hardin the patentee, and the patent to the said Hardin), embrace the land in controversy, and that from the time the tract claimed by the plaintiff was severed from the residue of the land contained in the said patent; that the several persons under whom he claims according to the terms of their deeds resided on and improved and cultivated the same, but if none of them resided on, improved or cultivated any part of the land in controversy, but that the same continued to be a forest, and in a state of nature until Arnold Tracewell, the ancestor of the defendants, entered upon the said land under his deed from James M. Stephenson; and if they shall believe that the said one hundred acres conveyed by said deed was plainly marked and bounded; that it embraced the land in controversy, and that the said Arnold Tracewell by virtue of his said deed entered upon the said land in controversy, claiming the same as his own, embraced by the deeds under which the plaintiff claims, and also embraced in the deed under which the said Tracewell entered with intention to take possession of all within his metes and bounds (if the said land in controversy should appear from the evidence to be unimproved forest lands), and took and held actual adverse possession thereof by residence, improvement, cultivation or other open, notorious and habitual acts of ownership, such possession operated as a disseizin of the person owning and in possession of the land claimed by the plaintiff to the interference, notwithstanding the said Tracewell may not have inclosed and cultivated the whole of the land in controversy. And if he so continued in the possession of 594 the land in *controversy under his said claim until the time of his death; if such continuous possession was five years or upwards, and so died in such possession; that on his death there was a descent cast upon his heirs, which would toll the entry of the plaintiff or those under whom he claims, then being the owner of the land now claimed by the plaintiff; and if the said defendants continued the possession as held by their said ancestor and had not abandoned the same at any time before the commencement of the present suit, the plaintiff could not, under such circumstances, maintain a warrant for unlawful entry.

Second. If the jury shall believe from the evidence, that the said Arnold Tracewell, the father of the defendants, entered upon the land in controversy and took possession of it at the time and in the manner supposed in the first instruction, and that he remained in such possession for more than three years after he so took the possession; if they shall also believe that the defendants, at the time that their father so took possession, were infants of tender years, they cannot be considered so responsible for any act that he did upon said land as to enable the plaintiff to maintain an unlawful entry against such infants for such acts.

Third. If the jury shall believe that the said Arnold Tracewell took and held adverse possession of the land in controversy at the time and in the manner supposed in the first instruction, and died so possessed, and that the defendants took possession after his death in the manner in which he had so taken and held the same, and had at no time abandoned said possession, and were in the actual adverse possession of said land in controversy at the time of the conveyance to the plaintiff, then his deed was inoperative for the land in controversy so held in adverse possession.

Which instructions were objected to by plaintiff, but were given by the court.

595 To which opinion of *the court giving said instructions the plaintiff excepted. Thereupon the plaintiff moved the court to give the following instructions:

No. 1. If the jury are satisfied that Hugh Phelps entered under the deed from Hardin, dated 12th day of July 1805, upon the land described in said deed, built a mill, caused a portion of it to be fenced and cultivated by his tenants, intending in so doing to assert his right to the possession of the entire tract, then such acts on the part of Phelps, the same land being wholly unoccupied by any other person, gave him the possession of said tract of land, coextensive with the boundaries of his deed, which possession would continue in Phelps and his assigns (until there was an actual entry upon some part of said tract, under color of title, with an intention to oust said Phelps and those claiming under him, which intention must be evidenced by building, residence, inclosure or other open and notorious acts of possession, equivalent to residence or cultivation or inclosure), and such possession so taken by Phelps, and continued for the period of seven years, would be a bar to any right of entry on the part of the defendants or their ancestor, or any other person claiming under the Gibson patent, in the year 1831 or subsequently, the patent of said Gibson being of the same date of the Hardin patent under which the plaintiff claims.

Nos. 2 & 3. Ask the court to instruct the jury that Arnold Tracewell, up to the making of the deed from Stephenson in August 1834, was bounded and abutted by his title bond on and by the line of Daniel Kincheloe, and that the said Kincheloe, and those claiming under him living on his tract of land called for by said title bond, the law adjudged him or them in possession to his boundary called for by the bond of Tracewell, and that occasional acts of cutting timber, getting tan-bark, making 596 rails or making sugar, outside *of the calls of said title bond by said Tracewell, unaccompanied with a paper title, either legal or colorable, would not confer on the said Tracewell any actual possession within the bounds of said Kincheloe and outside of the boundaries of said title bond, and that such acts up to the time of making of the deed in August 1834, would be adjudged in law to be trespass. That until the making of the deed in August 1834, the said A. Tracewell was bounded and abutted by the line of said Daniel Kincheloe, and that after the making of said deed, it calling for a course common to the deed of Kincheloe and the line of Kincheloe, and the line of Kincheloe called for being marked, are, together with the title bond and the parol evidence before them, to be weighed, and if on the whole evidence they are satisfied the call for, and the marking of the beech, were intended to be in Hardin's or Daniel Kincheloe's line, and that the surveyor and said Tracewell marked said beech, supposing it to be in Hardin's or Kincheloe's line, then, it being marked by mistake, the jury would reject such mistaken mark, and run the line by the other calls, the course and marked line of Tracewell's deed.

No. 4. If the jury believe that A. Tracewell had taken possession at the time and manner indicated in the first instruction given, as early as August 1834, or in the early part of that year, and had cleared and improved upon the land in controversy with an intention to take possession, according to the metes and bounds of his deed, and did such other open and notorious and habitual acts of ownership upon the said land in controversy, as would give him an actual adverse possession, according to the facts supposed in the first instruction given, and so continued in possession, and died in said possession in November 1839, and the defendants, his children and heirs, held and retained the possession so taken by 597 him, then the entry *of the plaintiff, and building of the fence inclosing a part of the land in controversy within the bounds of his deed, would not so operate as to divest the defendants of their possession of the land in controversy according to the metes and bounds of their deed, and confine it to their actual inclosure. But if the said A. Tracewell had not been in possession of the land in controversy for five years before his death, so as to cast a descent upon the defendants, and the said Kincheloe entered upon and inclosed a part of the land in controversy under his title, he would thereby divest the defendants of the possession of all the uninclosed lands within the interlock, provided that the said A. Tracewell, in his life time, and the defendants after his death, had not been, as is supposed in the first instruction, in the actual and continued adverse possession of the land more than seven years; but if the jury shall believe that, at the time the said Kincheloe entered and inclosed part of the interlock, that the said defendants or their ancestor had not the actual possession of the said land long enough to toll the entry of the said Kincheloe, that the defendants again entering upon the possession of said Kincheloe thus regained, would be a trespass; and if they continued to hold the possession, this action may be maintained against them, provided it is brought within three years after they regained possession.

No. 5. The patents being read and there being no parol evidence offered to fix any point whereby the survey of Gibson can be located, nor any evidence other than appears on the face of the papers, the plaintiff's counsel moved the court to instruct the jury what point is by them to be adopted in laying down said survey on the plat, or in other words, how far below the mouth of Tygart's creek they are to fix the beginning corner required.

No. 6. Move the court to instruct 598 the jury that *when there are two patents of the same date, and those claiming under one enter and hold under the same for twenty years, from 1805 to 1833, then such title should prevail against the other patent of same date under which no possession was had until 1833.

All of which instructions the court refused to give, and the plaintiff again excepted.

There was a verdict in favor of the defendants: Whereupon the plaintiff moved for a new trial upon the ground that the verdict was not sustained by the evidence; and on the further ground of a misdirection of the jury by the court. But the court overruled the motion and gave judgment for the defendants; and the plaintiff again excepted: And upon his application this court granted a supersedeas to the judgment.

LEE, J. That a warrant for a forcible or unlawful entry upon lands and tenements and turning another out of possession, or for unlawfully and against his consent withholding possession from the party entitled, under our statute, is a civil action, which, by virtue of the act of the 28th of March 1843, may be removed to the Circuit court, on motion without notice, after it shall have remained undecided in the County court for the period of one year or upwards, has been decided by this court, after full argument during the present term, in the case of Harrison v. Middleton, supra 527. I refer to the opinion delivered by Judge Moncure in that case, for a very full and (to me) satisfactory exposition of the reasons which conduced to that conclusion.

By the provisions of the act referred to, any two justices of the peace of the county

599 may meet at the court-house, and form a court for the trial of such a *warrant; when so met and a court is so constituted, it is declared to be a court of record, with power to issue all proper process to bring before them witnesses or other persons whose attendance may be lawfully required by them; and to adjourn from day to day and from time to time till the trial is ended. The sheriff of the county is required to attend upon the justices constituting it, and to execute their orders. The clerk of the County or Corporation court is also to attend them, to record their proceedings and file away the papers exhibited. A jury is to be impaneled and charged in the manner prescribed by the act; the justices are to suffer the parties to be heard by counsel; to admit all legal evidence offered on either side; to decide all questions of law properly submitted to them; to admit bills of exceptions to their opinions; and in all respects conduct the trial according to the usages of courts of law within this commonwealth. When a verdict has been rendered, the court is to render judgment upon it in favor of the plaintiff or the defendant, according to the nature of the finding; or it may for proper cause set it aside, and grant a new trial, as in other civil causes (Sess. Acts, 1825-6, p. 26, § 3); in which latter case, the cause is to be continued to the regular term of the County or Corporation court, and the new trial is to be had therein. The judgment of the justices so rendered is to be regarded as a judgment of the court of the county, and is to be in all respects executed in the same manner as if it had been the judgment of such court at an ordinary term; and either party thinking himself aggrieved, may have the same remedy, by writ of error or supersedeas, as if it had been the judgment of such court; and if it be reversed, the cause is to be remanded to such court, where necessary. I think it clear, therefore, that a court so constituted is to be regarded as a special County court for the trial of 600 the *particular cause; and that when two or more justices meet and form such a court, the case is to be regarded for the purpose of the act above referred to, and all other legal purposes, as pending in the County court; and that after the expiration of one year from that time, if it remain undecided, it may be removed to the Circuit court, according to the provisions of that act.

I think the objection which has been urged on the part of the defendants to the warrant is without any valid foundation. The complaint made and verified by the party under oath, may be looked to in aid of the warrant; and taking them in connection, they may be fairly construed as being for an unlawful entry and turning the plaintiff out of possession of the tenement in controversy, and unlawfully holding the plaintiff out of possession at the institution of the suit. The withholding of the possession by the defendant at the emanation of the warrant, was a fact as important to be found by the jury as that of the original turning out, to entitle the plaintiff to a recovery. I think the motion to quash was properly overruled.

The plaintiff's motion to exclude all the documentary testimony offered by the defendant, came at a late period, not having been made until all the evidence had been given, and after the opening argument for the plaintiff had been concluded and that of one of the defendant's counsel about closed; but if the motion is to be treated as a motion to instruct the jury to disregard the evidence, and in that view deemed admissible when made, and waiving the question whether the grant to Gibson and the conveyance from Laing to Stephenson being referred to in the deed from Stephenson to the ancestor of the defendants, as instruments of title under which, together with the title bond from Laing and the deed from Stephenson, the defendants claimed, might not properly have been given in evidence along with the title bond and 601 deed, *for the purpose of proving such a possession under an honest and bona fide claim of title as might ripen their claim, however defective originally, into a perfect title, still, for the purpose of proving such a possession and thus making out a bar under the statute, the title bond and deed from Stephenson were legitimate and proper testimony, though the defendants did fail to connect themselves with the grant to Gibson; and as the motion was to exclude all the documentary evidence of the defendant, it was too broad. Nor was the court bound to discriminate between the different documents offered; but might properly, as it did, overrule the motion for want of a proper designation by the plaintiff of the particular instruments of evidence which ought to have been excluded.

Of the first instruction given to the jury, complaint is made that its meaning is obscure; and that however understood, it states the law incorrectly. The instruction is perhaps somewhat deficient in perspicuity; but if it be examined with some little care and attention, I think its meaning will be sufficiently apparent. Nor is there any such obscurity about it as would render it unintelligible to a jury of ordinary intelligence. It in effect asserts the following propositions: That if the instruments of title under which the plaintiff and the defendants claimed, respectively, embraced the land in controversy; and if the plaintiff and those under whom he claimed had entered upon and taken actual possession of that part of the land embraced within their boundary outside of the interlock with the defendants' boundary; and if the ancestor of the defendants, under his deed, entered upon the land in controversy (that is, upon the part within the interlock), claiming it as his own, the same being embraced by his deed, and took and held actual adversary possession thereof by residence, improvement, 602 cultivation or other open, notorious and habitual *acts of ownership, co-extensive with the limits of the interlock, the land within the same having continued to be forest and in a state of nature, until so entered upon and taken possession of by the defendants' ancestor, such entry and possession of the latter operated a disseizin of those under whom the plaintiff claimed, to the extent of the interlock, although the ancestor of the defendants may not have actually inclosed and cultivated the whole of the land in controversy. And that if he continued in possession uninterruptedly, for five years or upwards, and died so in possession, upon his death a descent was cast upon the defendants, his heirs, which would toll the entry of those so disseized; and that if the defendants continued to hold such possession uninterruptedly from the death of their ancestor until the institution of this suit, the plaintiff could not maintain his action. So understood, I cannot perceive any well founded objection to the instruction. It presupposes an ouster by the defendants' ancestor of the plaintiff to the whole extent of the premises in controversy, the land embraced by the interlock; and affirms that the adversary possession which constitutes it must not of necessity be evidenced by actual inclosure and cultivation, but may be by other open, notorious and habitual acts of ownership, sufficient to amount to actual possession. That such possession may be in this mode is sufficiently established by the cases of Taylor v. Burnside, 1 Gratt. 165, and Overton v. Davisson, Ibid. 211; and is also supported by the authority of the cases of Ellicott v. Pearl, 10 Peters' R. 412; and Ewing's lessee v. Burnett, 11 Peters' R. 41. That the premises in controversy were embraced by both of the conflicting claims, and that possession had been taken by those under whom the plaintiff claimed, of that part of the land claimed by them without the limits of the interlock, would not render actual inclosure or 603 fencing in, *and actual cultivation, indispensable to enable the defendants or their ancestor to acquire possession of the land within the interlock. For this purpose the exercise of acts of ownership, if they were of the character contemplated by the law as sufficiently importing use, occupation and enjoyment, would suffice: and the possession which they would confer would be of a part or the whole, according as they were restricted to a part, or coextensive with the entire limits of the interlock.

It is supposed, however, that the instruction was intended to present the question raised in the case of Overton v. Davisson, ubi supra, and upon which the opinions of the judges then constituting the court, were so much divided, as to the effect of an actual occupation by a junior patentee of part of an interlock upon the claim of another under an elder and conflicting grant, the latter having previously taken possession of that portion of the land within his boundary outside the interlock. But however that may be, the bill of exceptions as taken, does not present the question. It must be construed as supposing a possession of the whole land within the interlock. Whether it might have been raised upon the evidence in the cause, is immaterial. The instructions asked for by the defendants, and which the court declined to give, are not made part of the record; and in the instructions which the court gave in lieu of them, no opinion is expressed on the point.

The second and third instructions given by the court, have only been questioned, because they refer to the time and manner of taking and holding possession supposed in the first instruction, the expression of which therein is supposed to be elliptical and obscure or repugnant and contradictory in the terms employed. I have already said there is no well founded objection to the first instruction, nor any serious diffi- 604 culty in *understanding its proper meaning. That if the defendants were infants at the time of the acts done by their father, they could not be responsible for those acts in this form, as stated in the second instruction; and if at the time of the conveyance to the plaintiff, the ancestor of the defendants held the land in controversy in actual adverse possession under his claim, and continued to hold the same until his death, and such possession was after his death, continued by the defendants, and never abandoned by them, that such conveyance to the plaintiff was inoperative and ineffectual to pass title to the premises so held in such adversary possession, are propositions too plain to admit of doubt or discussion.

We come next to the instructions asked for by the plaintiff, and which the court refused to give.

With regard to the first of the series, it is only necessary to say that it must be understood as declaring to the jury that possession taken by those under whom the plaintiff claimed, of the premises in controversy, and continued for seven years, would be in the year 1831, or subsequently, a bar to any right of entry on the part of the defendants or their ancestor, or any other person claiming under the Gibson grant; whereas in the year 1831 and until the passage of the act of March 30th, 1837, no possession short of fifteen years, unaided by a descent cast, would bar the entry of one having right or title to the same: and the court, for this reason, might properly refuse to give the instruction.

The second in the series is also objectionable, first, because if taken in connection with the evidence, as it must be to escape the objection of being a mere abstraction, it assumes that the acts relied upon by the defendants as showing their possession, were occasional or interrupted, and not continued and habitual, a matter of which it was for the jury to judge; and 605 *secondly, because it assumes that such acts on the part of the ancestor of the defendants were unaccompanied by any "paper title," legal or colorable; and declares that possession of the premises could not be gained without such a paper title embracing the same within its boundary. An entry by one upon land in possession, actual or constructive, of another, in order to operate as an ouster and gain a possession to the party entering, must be accompanied by a claim of title; but it is not indispensable that the claim should be ostensible in the form of a deed or any other writing. The claim, from its nature and character, may be wholly independent of any written evidence. Nor, if the party have a deed or other writing with a specified boundary, is the possession which he may take and hold necessarily restricted to what shall prove to be within the precise boundary. He may take and may hold actual possession of land lying outside his true boundary. Whether he has done so in any particular case, is a question of fact and of intention; and whether the acts referred to in this case amounted to such a possession, or were those of a mere trespasser, was a matter for the determination of the jury.

With regard to the third instruction asked for, I have only to remark that I think it was upon a matter wholly irrelevant to the issue before the jury. Whether the entry had been made and possession held, mistakenly, in consequence of the supposed error in running the line and marking the beech referred to, was a question which perhaps might have been material on the general issue in an action of ejectment, or on the mise joined on the mere right in a writ of right. But it could not have been material in this case. Here the question was whether in point of fact such entry had been made and such possession held, and how long before the institution of the suit; and I cannot perceive how the origin 606 of the defendant's *possession could tend to illustrate the plaintiff's right, or in any manner aid the jury in determining the line by which the defendant's actual possession was to be bounded.

The fourth instruction asked for by the plaintiff is justly obnoxious to the objection made by him to the first instruction given by the court. The terms in which it is expressed are very vague and indefinite, and the meaning intended is extremely doubtful and obscure. If given, it would have been as likely to confuse the jury as to aid them in their deliberations. But it is otherwise objectionable. It is framed upon the hypothesis that the plaintiff had entered upon and regained possession of the premises in controversy after the entry by the ancestor of the defendants; and there is no proof of such re-entry and regaining of possession. It also assumes as a fact in the cause, that after the plaintiff had thus regained possession the defendants (after the death of their ancestor) had re-entered upon him; and declares such re-entry to be a trespass which might be redressed in this action, if the defendants continued to hold possession, provided it had been brought within three years after they had so regained possession. Now, whether the defendants had entered upon the plaintiff and dispossessed him, was the very gist of the action; and if it had even been stated hypothetically, it would have been no less objectionable, because there was no proof of any such re-entry by the defendants after the death of their ancestor, upon a regained possession of the plaintiff. The only entry that could be imputed to them was the entry made by their ancestor in his life time; and their possession was precisely the continuation of the possession, whatever it was, that he had at the time of his death in 1839. There was no fresh entry made by them, nor any renewal of an interrupted possession. The instruction also imputes to 607 *an entry upon and inclosure of part of the land in controversy by the plaintiff under his title, the effect of divesting the defendants of the possession of all the uninclosed lands within the interlock, without regard to the intent with which such entry and inclosure were made; whether that were to take possession and oust the defendants of the whole, or only the part entered upon and inclosed; and is on this account also obnoxious to just criticism.

The fifth instruction was a direct appeal to the court to settle a fact deemed material in the cause, the locality of the beginning corner of the Gibson survey. It is true the court might be called on to instruct the jury as to the principles of law which might serve to enable them to determine this point; but it was not for the court to apply those principles to the facts of the case, and point out to the jury the place at which they are to place the corner in question. But if this were even otherwise, it was for the party moving the instruction to designate the point which he contended should be adopted, or those which he thought should be rejected; and not to call upon the court in general terms, to examine the whole case and find out and designate to the jury the point at which the corner in question was to be fixed.

The sixth and last instruction asked for by the plaintiff, in the terms in which it is propounded, presents a mere abstract proposition for the opinion of the court. But if those terms could be aided by taking them in connection with the evidence, then the instruction must be understood as assuming that the evidence proved that those claiming under one of the grants referred to, had entered and held possession of the premises from 1805 till 1833, and that no possession had been had under the other grant until 1833, matters in respect of which there should be no interference on the part of the court with the province of 608 *the jury. Besides, although possession had been taken under one of the two grants referred to, bearing the same date, and had been held from 1805 till 1833, yet if in the last named year those claiming under the other grant had disseized those previously in possession, and had continued to hold the premises in uninterrupted adversary possession down to the institution of the suit in June 1849, it by no means followed that the title of those who held the possession prior to 1833, would prevail in this suit. On the contrary, the subsequent adverse possession for sixteen years would be a bar to such title, unless those claiming it could bring themselves within the exception contained in the act of 1837, or were entitled to recover in a writ of right upon the seizin of their ancestor or predecessor. And we must suppose that the comparison of titles made in the instruction referred to the parties in the pending action; for if it were intended to apply as between previous claimants, it would have been totally irrelevant.

For these reasons, I think no error was committed by the court in refusing to give either of the instructions asked for by the plaintiff. The remark too which has been made in relation to the third of the series, is equally applicable to most if not all of the others. The case was not ejectment nor a writ of right, but a statutory proceeding involving merely a question of an unlawful entry and ouster on the part of the defendants within the period of the limitation, and a wrongful detainer of possession at the institution of the suit; though the parties seemed to regard themselves as fully embarked in a trial of titles. It is difficult to perceive how the questions mooted in those instructions could tend to illustrate the matter in issue before the jury. Upon a trial of titles between these parties they might no doubt be proper subjects for discussion; but however decided in this 609 case, they *would seem to be irrelevant and inconclusive. And though decided erroneously, it should seem the judgment should not on that account be reversed, if we can see from the bill of exceptions that they did not and could not affect the merits of the case before the jury. Hunter v. Jones, 6 Rand. 541. See also Le Bret v. Papillon, 4 East's R. 502.

Waiving all objections to the form of the bill of exceptions purporting to set out the facts proved, I think the motion for a new trial was properly overruled upon the merits. The plaintiff wholly failed to prove any such entry and ouster on the part of the defendants, on the foundation of which alone he could be entitled to recover. The only entry and taking possession proved was that of the defendant's ancestor, which was certainly not later than 1834; and the possession of the defendants was but the continuation of the possession of their ancestor, which devolved upon them on his death in the year 1839. Whatever might have been the fate of a proper action for the trial of the disputed title between these parties, the plaintiff clearly mistook his remedy in resorting to this proceeding. He has wholly failed to make out a case upon which he is entitled to recover here; and the attempt to try the title in this form must be wholly ineffectual.

I am of opinion to affirm the judgment.

4. Same—When Personal Decree May Be Rendered.—

If an absent defendant does not appear in the cause, there cannot be a personal decree against him; but the attached effects can alone be subjected. But if he does appear, there may be a personal decree only against him, or there may be both a personal decree and a decree subjecting the attached effects.

5. Same—Same.—If the absent debtor appears, and the attachment has not been sued out or levied, there may still be a personal decree against him. Or the plaintiff may, after the debtor's appearance, make the affidavit, sue out an attachment, and have it levied on the effects of the debtor, and have them subjected.

6. Same—Failure of Bill to Aver Attachment Issued—Effect.—A demurrer to a bill against an absent defendant will not lie for the failure to aver that an attachment had issued; because the statute in terms provides that this process may issue after the institution of the suit.

The case is stated in the opinion of Judge Samuels.

Fisher, for the appellants, and McComas, for the appellees, submitted the case.

SAMUELS, J. The appellants filed a bill in the Circuit court of Mason county, at July rules 1852, against Abraham Williams and William J. Stephens, wherein it was in substance alleged, that Abraham Williams of Mason county, and William J. Stephens, *of the city of Cincinnati, were bound to complainants in a forfeited 611 defendant, it must proceed to give relief according to the principles of equity. For the above proposition, see the principal case cited in Coleman v. Waters, 18 W. Va. 811; Perry v. Ruby, 81 Va. 828; Stewart v. Stewart, 27 W. Va. 175; Hall v. Hall, 12 W. Va. 12.

§Foreign Attachments—When Personal Decree May Be Rendered.—For the proposition that, if an absent defendant does not appear in the cause, there cannot be a personal decree against him, but the attached effects can alone be subjected; but if he does appear there may be a personal decree only against him, or there may be both a personal decree and a decree subjecting the attached effects, the principal case is cited and approved in the following cases: Barrett v. McAllister, 32 W. Va. 760, 11 S. E. Rep. 228; Coleman v. Waters, 18 W. Va. 811; Mahany v. Kephart, 15 W. Va. 619; Taylor v. Cox, 32 W. Va. 159, 9 S. E. Rep. 75; Wetherill v. McCloskey, 28 W. Va. 198; Fowler v. Lewis, 36 W. Va. 126, 14 S. E. Rep. 451. As authority for the proposition (in addition to the cases above) that a personal judgment cannot be rendered against a nonresident defendant who does not appear, and that where there is no service of process the judgment is void, see the following cases: Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 565; Houston v. McCluney, 8 W. Va. 135; Gilchrist v. W. Va. O. & O. L. Co., 21 W. Va. 115; Wilson v. Bank, 6 Leigh 574; *Gray v. §Chancery Practice—Failure of Bill to Aver Attachment Issued—Effect.—In Price v. Pinnell, 4 W. Va. 298, it is said: "To maintain the jurisdiction the counsel forthcoming bond, on which was due the sum of five hundred and twelve dollars and thirty-two cents, with legal interest thereon from April 6th, 1852, until paid. That it was difficult to notify Stephens on the bond; and that it was useless to notify Williams. The bill further alleged that Stephens had valuable real and personal estate in Mason county; and prayed that Stephens' personal property might be sold to satisfy complainants' demand; and if that should not be sufficient for the purpose, that then the real estate might be sold for the deficiency; and for general relief. To this bill the defendants demurred; and upon the hearing, the court below sustained the demurrer, and dismissed the bill. From this decree the appeal before us was taken.

Immediately after July 1st, 1850, when the Code of 1849 went into operation, a bill such as this could not have been entertained; the statute giving the remedy by foreign attachment in chancery, existing prior to July 1st, 1850, having been repealed by the Code of 1849. A new remedy, however, is given by the statute passed April 3rd, 1852, which was in force from its passage. Sess. Acts 1852, ch. 95, § 1, p. 78.

By the statute last named, a right is given to a creditor to sue his debtor in a court of equity, if his debt, exclusive of interest, exceed twenty dollars, if the debtor be not a resident of the state, and if he have estate, or debts due to him within the county or corporation in which the suit is brought. The statute of 1852, above mentioned, taken in connection with the statute, Code 1849, ch. 151, § 1, gives a creditor the right, upon making an affidavit stating the amount and justice of the claim, that there is present cause of action therefor, that the defendant or one of the defendants, is not a resident of this state, and that the affiant believes he has estate or debts due him within *the county

612 relies exclusively on the case of O'Brien v. Stephens, 11 Gratt. 610. In that case there was an appearance and a demurrer to the bill by the nonresident defendant, thereby putting himself fully under the control of the court, for every legitimate purpose. In the case under consideration Pinnell objected to the jurisdiction, because the process had not been executed against him, which makes a case materially different from that of O'Brien v. Stephens.

"The defendant had the right to object, as he did, that the process was not executed against him. Hickam v. Larkey, 6 Gratt. 210; The Bank of The Valley v. The Bank of Berkeley, 3 W. Va. 386. If the defendant, Pinnell, had appeared to the action without objecting to the nonexecution of process against him, he would thereby have placed himself in the same situation he would have occupied if process had been executed upon him, which was the situation the defendant occupied in the case of O'Brien v. Stephens, The Bank of The Valley v. The Bank of Berkeley, 3 W. Va. Rep. 386, and authorities there cited. The fact that the answer filed contains a full answer to the bill, cannot be held to waive that part of the answer which insists that the court cannot proceed until process is served."

or corporation in which the suit is, or that he is sued with a defendant residing therein, to sue out of the clerk's office an attachment against the estate of the non-resident for the amount so stated. Section 2 of ch. 151, Code 1849; and section 1 of the act of 1852, give the creditor the right to sue out the attachment after bringing his suit.

In the case before us, the complainants made no affidavit; nor had they sued out any attachment up to the hearing of the cause; the case stated in the bill, however, was such that the affidavit might be made, and the attachment sued out, after the bill was filed. See act April 3d, 1852, § 1.

The question is thus presented, whether the affidavit and attachment were essential to the jurisdiction of the court at the time the cause was heard on the demurrer?

The statute last above cited, § 2, directs that in suits of this nature the proceedings shall be the same as in other suits in chancery. Applying then the general principles of chancery practice, as modified by the statute of April 3rd, 1852, we must hold that if the court once had jurisdiction, it might rightfully proceed to do full justice between the parties before it, although the claim of the complainant be purely legal; as in case of a bill for discovery and relief in the matter of a legal demand: The right to a discovery gives the court jurisdiction; but having the case before it on this ground, the court should proceed to give a decree for the debt, although it be merely legal in its nature. In this case, the nature of the claim asserted, the residence of the defendant Stephens, and the location of his property, give to the Circuit court jurisdiction of the subject: the mode and measure of relief must be governed by the general rules of chancery practice, as modified by the statute of 1822.

613 *It would be unreasonable to suppose that the mere existence of Stephens' property within the county of Mason was intended to give complainants the right to a general and personal decree in nowise affecting the specific property. The suit must be brought in the county in which the property is placed. There must be some reason for this requisition; and no other than this can be suggested, that the property may be subjected to the payment of complainants' demand. A mere personal decree might be rendered in the courts of any county; a decree subjecting the property would be more conveniently and effectively rendered in the courts of the county in which that property is placed. I am, therefore, clearly of opinion, that the only decree complainants could have had against Stephens, if he had not appeared and made defence, would have been for satisfaction out of his property attached under the process provided by the statute of 1852.

The defendants, however, appeared and made defence, thereby putting themselves fully under the control of the court, for every legitimate purpose in the cause. The attachment was intended to perform two several and distinct functions; one to give the absent defendant notice of the suit brought against him. This mode of giving notice by levying on property, was formerly in familiar use. In the case before us it became unnecessary to resort to this mode of notice, in as much as the absent defendant appeared and defended himself. The other function of the attachment is to give complainants security for the payment of their demand. This operation of the attachment is wholly for the benefit of complainants; if waived or omitted, it can in nowise injure the defendant, seeing that he has already had notice to defend himself, and has acted accordingly. The complainants, if they elect to do so, may waive 614 a part of their remedy, and *rely upon another part. They may, therefore, take a mere personal decree against the defendants before the court, which decree the court in virtue of its jurisdiction over the parties now before it, may lawfully render. Or they may hereafter resort to the remedy by attachment, seeing that the statute authorizes such resort after the suit is brought.

If, however, the law were otherwise, and relief could be had under any circumstances, only by attachment, still the objection was not properly taken in this case. A demurrer reaches only such defects as appear on the face of the pleading demurred to; it will not lie for defect or omission of process; or for omission to aver facts not essential to the jurisdiction, but collateral to the pleading demurred to, although they are necessary to justify the relief prayed for. It is the office of a plea or of an answer to bring before the court reasons for refusing relief not appearing on the face of the bill. In our case it was not necessary to aver in the bill that an attachment had issued, because the statute, in terms, provides that this process may issue after the institution of the suit.

I am, therefore, of opinion to reverse the decree dismissing the bill; to overrule the demurrer; and remand the cause to the Circuit court, with directions to require the defendants to answer; and that the complainants, on proving their case as alleged, may have a personal decree against the defendants; or that they may at their election, sue out an attachment in the mode prescribed by law, and subject the property attached to the satisfaction of their demand.

2. Equity Practice—Lapse of Time—In Whose Favor Rule Invoked.—Lapse of time is justly allowed great weight in controversies about transactions long since past. But this weight is thrown in favor of the party who insists that the state of things existing during that lapse of time shall not be disturbed: It cannot be relied on by those seeking to change that state of things.

3. Statute—Decrees against Absent Defendant—Effect of Fraud.—The statute, 1 Rev. Code, p. 475-6, § 4, which provides that a decree made against an absent defendant shall, after seven years, stand absolutely confirmed against him, does not protect a decree procured by fraud, after the death of the absent defendant, without suggesting his death or reviving it against his representative or heirs.

These cases arose out of the case of Evans & wife v. Spurgin, reported 6 Gratt. 107. That case came up to this court from the Circuit court of Preston county: And after the cause went back, Jesse Spurgin and the heirs of Daniel Lantz filed a bill in that court to enjoin the enforcement of that judgment until the hearing of another suit which the plaintiffs had instituted in the Circuit court of Monongalia county in December 1849, against the heirs of Gilley C. Evans, wife of John Evans, and the administrator of Staley, for the purpose of setting aside the decree of the 21st of April 1836, made in the case of Staley v. Lantz, the proceedings in which case are stated in the report of the case in 6 Grattan.

In their bill filed in the case in Monongalia, after setting out the purchase of the land by Daniel Lantz from Staley, and the proceedings in the chancery cause of Staley v. Lantz, they alleged that Daniel Lantz lived in the county of Alleghany in 616 the state of Maryland *until his death, which occurred in 1816. That the place of his residence and his death were facts well known to Nimrod Evans, John Evans and his wife, long before the death of Nimrod Evans, which occurred in 1828: And they charged that John Evans and his wife, with a view to prevent the correction of the errors and irregularities in the case of Staley v. Lantz, and with a view to defraud the heirs of Lantz, under whom Spurgin claimed, had procured the removal of the cause in 1833 from Staunton to Monongalia county, after the death of Lantz and without notice to his heirs, some of whom were infants and others femes covert; and that all the subsequent proceedings and decrees were fraudulent.

They further alleged that on the 26th of November 1807 Lantz and Staley entered into a contract with the privity and knowledge of Nimrod Evans, by which the sale by the commissioners to Evans was canceled, and his money probably returned to him, or he had purchased for Staley, and everything pertaining to the chancery suit aforesaid was adjusted and satisfied as it related to both Staley and Evans; and Staley bound himself to convey to Lantz three tracts of land supposed to contain twelve hundred and fifty-nine acres, of which the land in controversy was one, when Lantz should pay to Henry Schroeder of Baltimore one thousand eight hundred and fifty dollars for Staley, and when Schroeder's receipts were produced to him Staley bound himself to convey the land. That Lantz did pay the money to Schroeder, and Staley, by deed dated the 16th of August 1809, conveyed the land to Lantz.

The plaintiffs further alleged that Lantz was in possession of the land purchased of Staley in 1805, from that time until his death in 1816. That his widow and children continued in possession until 1834, when a decree was made in the Circuit court 617 of Hampshire, *in a cause instituted by William F. Taylor, a creditor of Daniel Lantz, against his widow and heirs, to subject the lands of Lantz to satisfy the plaintiff's debt, by which decree a sale of the land by a commissioner of the court to George W. Devicman was confirmed: And that in 1839 Devicman sold the land in controversy to the plaintiff Spurgin; and that the possession had been continued by Devicman and Spurgin down to the time of filing the bill. The prayer of the bill was that the decree of 1836 in the suit of Staley v. Lantz might be set aside; that the defendants might be enjoined from enforcing their judgment at law for the recovery of the land; and for general relief.

The heirs of Gilley C. Evans answered the bill. They said they knew nothing of the facts of the case except what appears from the records of the causes in relation to the land in controversy, and they called for proof. They relied on the fact that Devicman was a purchaser whilst the suit of Staley v. Lantz was pending; and therefore, that he had legal notice of Staley's suit; and in fact that Spurgin purchased in 1839 with full knowledge of the decree in that suit of the 21st of April 1836. They say that they had no knowledge of the death of Daniel Lantz at any time previous to the suing out of the writ of right; nor had they any knowledge that John or Gilley C. Evans was informed of that fact at any time before the decree of 1836; and they deny all fraud on the part of said John and Gilley C. Evans, or that they or either of them purposely concealed the death of Lantz; or that they delayed bringing their suit for the purpose of suffering the time to elapse in which the supposed errors in the decree of 1836 might be corrected. They deny that there had been any new discovery of facts or evidence affecting this controversy by the plaintiffs since 1836. And they relied upon the decree of 1836 as a bar to 618 *the relief sought by the bill; and also upon the statute of limitations, and the delay of the plaintiffs for fourteen years to institute proceedings to impeach the decree of April 1836.

It appears from the evidence that Nimrod Evans, the purchaser of the land in controversy from the commissioners in the case of Staley v. Lantz, was in 1807, and continued to be until his death in 1828, clerk of the County court of Preston. And a paper purporting to be a copy of an agreement between Staley and Lantz, though not signed, was produced in evidence, which was proved to be in the handwriting of Evans. By this paper which bore date the 26th day of November 1807, Staley agreed to sell to Lantz certain lands supposed to contain twelve hundred and fifty-nine acres; a part of which was the land previously sold to Nimrod Evans: For which lands Lantz bound himself to pay to Henry Schroeder of Baltimore one thousand eight hundred and fifty dollars, and to procure from Schroeder a receipt in favor of Staley for that sum; when Staley was to convey the lands to Lantz. On the back of this paper was an endorsement also in the handwriting of Nimrod Evans: "J. Staley and D. Lantz. Agreement. Copy. N. E."

It was also proved by a son of John Schroeder, that there was on his father's books, in the handwriting of a partner in the concern who had since died, an entry under the date of February 19th, 1808, by which John Staley was credited by three notes of Daniel Lantz, amounting to one thousand eight hundred and fifty dollars, with a memorandum at the foot of the entry "To be considered a cash payment from the 26th November 1807." And it was proved that Lantz was a man in good circumstances from 1807 up to the time of his death, which occurred in July 1818, fully able to meet all his engagements. It appeared further that 619 Nimrod Evans never had the land entered on the *commissioner's books as his, or paid the taxes; but that it stood on these books as the land of Lantz, and the taxes were paid by him and those claiming under him. Devicman was informed of the decree of April 1836 in the same year; and Spurgin knew it in 1839.

When the causes came on to be heard, the court below set aside the decree of April 1836, and perpetually enjoined the defendants from proceeding to enforce their judgment recovered in the writ of right case. And from these decrees the defendants obtained an appeal to this court.

N. Harrison and Stanard, for the appellants.

Fry, for the appellee.

SAMUELS, J. These two cases being, substantially, between the same parties, in regard to the same property, and depending upon the same facts, were heard together in this court. Many of the facts are set forth in the case of Evans & wife v. Spurgin, 6 Gratt. 107. The judgment in that case determined that the better right at law was in the demandants. After the judgment the tenant Spurgin and others, the heirs at law of Lantz, filed a bill in equity in the Circuit court of Preston county, in which county the land lies, against the heirs at law of Gilley C. Evans (she and her husband John Evans being then dead), to whom the legal title had descended. The sole purpose of this bill was to enjoin the judgment at law until the equity alleged in the other bill could be decided on. Spurgin also filed a bill in the Circuit court of Monongalia county, impeaching the decree of April 1836, as being obtained by fraud on the part of Evans and wife. This fraud is alleged to have been perpetrated by removing the cause from the District court of chancery at Staunton to the Circuit court of Monongalia, and proceeding therein, as reported in 6 Grattan above *referred to, without revivor against Lantz's heirs. The bill alleges that if the heirs had thus been made parties, it would have been shown that Staley's decree of 1807 had been fully satisfied; that Nimrod Evans, in making the purchase, was either acting as the agent of Staley, or that any interest he might have had under his purchase was passed to Staley. That the claim asserted by Staley in the chancery cause, and the claim of Nimrod Evans, whatever it was, were fully adjusted by Staley and Lantz with the privity of Evans. That an agreement in writing was entered into between Lantz and Staley on the 26th of November 1807, with the privity of Evans, by which Staley again sold to Lantz the land in controversy with other land, for one thousand eight hundred and fifty dollars, to be paid by Lantz to the credit of Staley with Henry Schroeder of Baltimore; that the price was paid accordingly, and that Staley on the 16th of August 1809, conveyed the land to Lantz as the contract required.

The facts alleged are established by satisfactory proof. The original agreement in writing is not produced; but a paper in the handwriting of Evans is exhibited purporting to be a copy of that agreement. The signatures of Staley and Lantz are not affixed to this copy: but that it truly sets forth the terms of the agreement is manifest from the facts that Lantz procured credit for Staley with Schroeder for the price of the land named in the copy, that is one thousand eight hundred and fifty dollars; and that this credit was as of the date of November 26th, 1807, the date of the alleged contract; and that Staley afterwards, on the 15th of August 1809, executed a deed to Lantz for the land described in the copy filed, which includes the land in controversy. The acts performed by Staley and Lantz, respectively, distinctly show what the contract was; and their long acquiescence 621 *in the state of things resulting from those acts stamps the contract with absolute verity. So far as the claim of Evans' heirs depends upon the decree in favor of Staley, it is wholly without foundation in equity.

That Nimrod Evans was privy and consenting to the arrangement between Lantz and Staley, is as fully shown as any such fact can usually be shown after such a lapse of time. A paper is produced in the handwriting of Evans, setting forth the terms of the contract precisely as they were afterwards performed by Lantz and Staley respectively; this paper is endorsed in Evans' handwriting, "J. Staley & D. Lantz.

Agreement. Copy. N. E." Evans never in anywise whatsoever exercised any act of ownership over the property, but left it in possession of Lantz and those claiming under him. He was clerk of the County court of Monongalia county, and although the deed to himself from the commissioners in the chancery suit, had been admitted to record in his court, yet he never caused the alienation to be noticed on the land books of the commissioner of the revenue by withdrawing the taxes from Lantz and placing them to his own account. If the land was really his, his official duty required him to make the change; and his duty as a private citizen required him to cause the change to be made. The deed from Staley to Lantz was recorded in the office of which Evans was clerk; and under that deed the vendor and those claiming under him have held quiet possession until disturbed by Evans' residuary devisee asserting a title which Evans himself never set up.

Upon all this I hold that Nimrod Evans had no title, good in equity, against Lantz and those claiming under them. It only remains to consider whether the appellees can set up their equitable title against the legal title held by the appellants.

622 Several reasons *are alleged by the appellants why the equitable title shall not be now set up:

1. Laches.
2. The statute of limitations.
3. That the appellee Spurgin purchased the land with knowledge of the legal title held by Evans and wife.

In regard to the first: Lapse of time is justly allowed great weight in controversies about transactions long since passed. This weight, however, is thrown in favor of the party who insists that the state of things existing during that lapse shall not be disturbed. This is especially the case where the immediate parties to any given transaction are dead. It is presumed that any person having the right of property will ever use that right, such being the ordinary course of things. If no such right be exercised, the presumption is obvious that the right does not exist. In the cases before us, however, the appellees seek only to preserve the existing state of things; they and those under whom they claim have been in possession of the subject in controversy, and have held it since August 1809 at least. They are demanding nothing at the hands of the appellants; they seek only to defend their long continued actual possession, by means of their superior equitable title; a title fully proved by the direct testimony, and confirmed by the lapse of time. There is nothing in the record on which to found the allegation that the appellees or those under whom they claim have abandoned or waived their rights; on the contrary, from 1805 or from 1809, they have in the most emphatic manner asserted those rights by holding and enjoying their property.

Second. As to the statute of limitations: To sustain this branch of the defense, the appellants rely upon 1 Rev. Code, p.

623 475-6, § 4. In considering this *objection it must be recollected that the bills before us are filed for the purpose of avoiding transactions occurring after the decree of 1807; and to prevent the fraudulent use of that decree. The nature of those transactions I have already considered. If we could even hold that the party was guilty of no actual fraud in removing the case from the court at Staunton to Monongalia, and proceeding therein without reviving against Lantz's heirs and administrator, yet the gross disregard of the rights of others manifested in that proceeding is equivalent to fraud; it does all the mischief of fraud. The attempt of the appellants to enforce a mere legal title against a clear equitable title accompanied by long possession, is in itself a fraud; if innocent in acquiring the legal title, they are guilty of fraud in the attempt to use it. If we put ourselves in the place of the legislature, with the purpose of ascertaining the intention of the statute, we cannot suppose for a moment that it was intended to apply to such a case as this. The language of all public statutes is necessarily general; it is the duty of courts to determine their applicability to the circumstances of each particular case coming before them. The statute in question intends to quiet the possession of property acquired under decrees fairly obtained against absent parties, to bar any further litigation in the matter of the suit so decided, after seven years from the date of the decree. It does not intend to quiet parties in the enjoyment of property acquired under a decree fraudulently obtained; and this to the prejudice of parties fraudulently omitted.

Third. The third objection is without force: The vendors of the appellee Spurgin were in actual possession claiming title, and supposing that title to be good at law. In this they were mistaken; for the title, although clearly good in equity, was 624 not good *at law. No reason can be assigned why a vendor in actual possession holding a good equitable title may not sell his title and deliver possession to another; the circumstance that another holds a legal title which may be called in at any time and conveyed to the real owner, cannot prevent the real owner from selling.

I. IN GENERAL.

Scope.—The scope of this note includes the general subject of decrees. The treatment of decrees in particular cases in most instances has been limited, and in some cases it has been altogether omitted, reference being made to the monographic notes on the particular subjects for a more complete treatise.

Definition.—A decree is the judicial decision of a litigated cause by courts of equity, admiralty and probate. In its accurate use the term is employed to distinguish decrees of equity courts from judgments of law courts, though the term judgment is often used to include both. Bouvier's Law Dictionary.

Should Conform to Law of State Where Liability is Fixed.—The decrees of courts of chancery in a state should conform to the law of the state where the liability of the parties is determined, and if it is by that law several, to render a joint decree will constitute error. De Ende v. Wilkinson, 2 P. & H. 663.

Judge Must Be Disinterested.—It is a general and fundamental rule that no man can be a judge in his own cause, and a decree pronounced by a judge who is even remotely interested in the subject-matter in controversy is voidable, and will be set aside if the proper steps therefor are taken. Findley v. Smith, 42 W. Va. 299, 26 S. E. Rep. 370.

II. NATURE AND EXTENT OF RELIEF.

1. COMPLETE RELIEF.

Against Party Ultimately Liable.—It is the practice of a court of equity to decree, in the first instance, against the party who is ultimately liable; but this is done only where the parties are before the court at the time of the decree, and their several liabilities are clearly ascertained. Garnett v. Macon, 6 Call 308.

Joint Decree against Guardian and Sureties.—A joint decree may be entered against a guardian and his sureties in an action against them by the ward on their official bond. Equity never takes two bites at a cherry, and it will not require that the guardian shall be proceeded against first, before the sureties may be held liable. Barnes v. Trafton, 80 Va. 524.

When Proper to Decree against Surety in First Instance.—In an action against a principal debtor and his surety, the bill alleges that there is no estate of the principal against which the plaintiff might resort, and that he is insolvent; this allegation is not denied in the answers and is sustained by the record. In such case it is not error to decree at once against the estate of the surety. Jones v. Degge, 84 Va. 685, 5 S. E. Rep. 799.

Against Land Partitioned among Heirs.—When land, which has been partitioned among heirs, is sold to enforce the vendor's lien, it is not error to decree the sale of their respective shares to pay their proportion of the lien, when it does not appear that the debt will be prejudiced or delayed. Max Meadows L. & I. Co. v. McGavock, 96 Va. 181, 30 S. E. Rep. 460.

Liability of Grantee under Invalid Title to Creditors.—In a suit in chancery against two defendants, one of whom is a nonresident, and the other is in this country, if the defendant present appear not to be a debtor of the absentee, but to hold effects belonging to him by a title invalid as to creditors, he should be considered personally responsible for so much as he may have used, or for the profits he may have received from them, and for that amount a decree may be made against him personally in the first place, holding the property in his hands ultimately liable if he be insolvent; for the balance of the plaintiff's claim, the court may proceed in the first place against the property itself. Gibson v. White, 3 Munf. 94.

Dissolving Injunction against Assignee of Bond.—The decree of a court of equity, dissolving an injunction against the assignee of a bond, because the payments, for which credits are claimed by the complainant, were made to the obligee after notice of the assignment, ought to also provide that the obligee (being defendant to the bill) do repay the sum so received by him, so soon as the complainant shall have paid the amount of the judgment to the assignee. Roberts v. Jordans, 3 Munf. 488.

Equalization in Final Distribution.—If a court of equity takes charge of a large fund, and enters a general decree providing for the distribution of such fund among the distributees entitled thereto in proportionate shares, and in subsequent decrees relating to the fund it departs from such apportionment, in its final distribution of the residue it should so equalize the same as to make the final decree conform to the general decree. Kearfott v. Dandridge, 45 W. Va. 673, 31 S. E. Rep. 947.

Where Maker of Note Enjoins Payee and Assignee.—If the maker of a negotiable note file a bill of injunction against the payee and assignee on the ground of an equity affecting the payee only, the court of chancery having before it all the parties concerned, ought not to discharge the maker altogether, nor to turn over the assignee to a suit at law against the payee, but should decree against the latter in the first instance that he pay the amount of the note to the assignee, and liberty should be reserved to the assignee to apply to the court to dissolve the injunction as to the maker for so much of the debt as he may not be able to recover from the payee; in which case a decree ought also to be rendered in favor of the maker against the payee, for so much thereof as he may be compelled to pay. And the decree should further direct that the action at law in favor of the assignee against the payee, be perpetually enjoined. McNiel v. Baird, 6 Munf. 316.

Additional Trustee Appointed and Accounts Settled.—Where a creditor filed a bill, and asked that a deed of trust to secure him be enforced, it was held competent and proper for the court to decree the appointment of another trustee to aid the execution of the trust, and also to settle the accounts of the administrator, and to adjust and protect the rights of the complainant and all the parties in interest. Woods v. Fisher, 3 W. Va. 536.

2. FLEXIBILITY.

In General.—It is a distinctive characteristic of chancery courts that they have the power to mould their decrees to suit the postures of the case, and to embrace and finally dispose of the rights of the parties to the cause in one decree. 5 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 958, and cases cited. See also, Roberts v. Jordans, 3 Munf. 488; Kearfott v. Dandridge, 45 W. Va. 673, 31 S. E. Rep. 947.

Against Voluntary Devisees—Contribution.—Where a decree is rendered on behalf of a creditor against several voluntary devisees of the debtor, a court of equity should decree contribution among them, so that each man should only pay his just proportion of the debt. But all the devisees should be liable for the failure of any one to pay his part, until the debt is completely discharged, as far as he has received the funds of the donor. Chamberlayne v. Temple, 2 Rand. 384.

Legatees Joint Plaintiffs.—Though specific legatees jointly sue, the decree ought to be several, in conformity with their respective rights. Quarles v. Quarles, 2 Munf. 331.

Against Devisees—Pro Rata Decree.—Where a suit is brought to subject land in the hands of two devisees, one of whom owns one-fourth and the other three-fourths, for the payment of a debt due from their ancestor, the decree should be separate against each for the payment of his pro rata share of the debt, with a reservation to the plaintiff to proceed against him for so much of the share of the other as can be made out of that one's part of the land. Pugh v. Russell, 27 Gratt. 789.

A decree against devisees, who hold by several and distinct devisees, ought not to be against them jointly, but should have directed a valuation of their lands, and charged them pro rata. Mason v. Peter, 1 Munf. 437.

Fraudulent Transaction—Apportionment of Relief.—Where a transaction between a debtor and his creditor was intended by both of them to defraud the other creditors of the debtor, but the creditor was not as guilty as the debtor, a court of equity ought not to refuse relief to the debtor altogether, but ought to apportion the relief granted to the degree of guilt of both parties, in order to avoid the encouragement of fraud, and to prevent extortion and oppression. Austin v. Winston, 1 H. & M. 33, 3 Am. Dec. 583.

Annuity—Future Payments.—In a suit in equity for arrears of an annuity, the decree should be for the sum due, reserving liberty to apply to the court from time to time to extend its decree so as to embrace the payments thereafter falling due. Marshall v. Thompson, 2 Munf. 412.

Same—Security by Mortgage.—A decree against the purchasers of a tract of land, which is encumbered by a mortgage to secure the payment of an annuity ought to provide that so much of the land respectively be sold as will be their proportions of the sum due and unsatisfied by a sale of that part of the tract of land which was retained by the vendor, except so far as they shall pay their respective proportions of debt, and agree to hold their lands subject to the future decree of the court for their share of any sums becoming due to the plaintiff thereafter. Mayo v. Tomkies, 6 Munf. 520.

Estate Committed to Sheriff—Managed by Deputy.—Where the representative of a sheriff was sued on account of an estate committed to his hands, and it appeared that his deputy, who was also sued, had the entire management of the estate, the court may decree against the deputy in the first instance, if assented to by the plaintiff, reserving liberty to him to resort to the court for decrees against the other parties. But if such consent was not given, it was the duty of the court to decree between the defendants, in order to throw the burden on the person ultimately liable. Cocke v. Harrison, 3 Rand. 494.

3. UNDER THE GENERAL PRAYER.

Decree Different from Special Prayer.—Though the decree entered in a suit be different from the special relief prayed for, still if the bill contains a prayer for general relief, and a proper case is made for such relief, it may be given under the prayer for general relief, if consistent with that which is actually prayed. Raper v. Sanders, 21 Gratt. 60; Brown v. Wylie, 2 W. Va. 502. But there can be no decree distinct from that demanded by the bill. Pickens v. Knisely, 29 W. Va. 1, 11 S. E. Rep. 932; Sheppard v. Starke, 3 Munf. 29.

Entitled to Decree on Other Grounds Than Alleged.—Whenever the object of a bill is to recover money for any debt, or for the breach of any contract, or on account of any other matter, and it is shown that the complainant is entitled to any sum on account of the particular matters and transactions alleged in the bill, though it may be on other grounds, and for different reasons, and for a less amount than is alleged and claimed in the bill, the amount to which the claimant may be so entitled may be decreed to him under the general prayer for relief. Hall v. Pierce, 4 W. Va. 107.

Personal Decree against Grantor for Fraudulently Marking Deed Satisfied.—Under the prayer of general relief in a suit to enforce a deed of trust, a personal decree may be entered against the grantor for any loss suffered by the plaintiff, because of the fraudulent marking satisfied of said deed by the grantor after assignment to the plaintiff. Evans v. Bank, 95 Va. 294, 28 S. E. Rep. 323.

Interest in Suit to Set Aside Fraudulent Conveyance.—A creditor having obtained a judgment against his debtor, without running interest, his execution is obstructed by a fraudulent conveyance made by the debtor of his property. A suit in chancery is then brought to remove the obstruction of the conveyance, and for general relief. The chancellor ought to decree the interest, as well as set aside the conveyance: the prayer for general relief being sufficient to cover the demand of interest. Beall v. Silver, 2 Rand. 401.

4. BETWEEN CODEFENDANTS.

General Doctrine.—The general doctrine in regard to decrees between codefendants in equity has been well stated by LORD ELDON as follows: "Wherever a case is made out between defendants by the evidence arising from pleadings and proof between plaintiffs and defendants, a court of equity is entitled to make a decree between the defendants, and is bound to do so. The defendant chargeable has a right to insist that he shall not be liable to be made a defendant in another suit for the same matter which may be then decided between him and his codefendant. And the codefendant may insist that he shall not be obliged to institute another suit, for a matter which may be then adjusted between the defendants." Blair v. Thompson, 11 Gratt. 441. See Braxton v. Harrison, 11 Gratt. 30; and Tallaferro v. Minor, 2 Call 190; Titchenell v. Jackson, 26 W. Va. 400.

It is well settled that where a case is made out between codefendants by evidence arising from pleadings between the complainants and defendants, a court of equity should render a decree between the codefendants; but when there are no such pleadings, a court of equity cannot render a decree between the codefendants. Worthington v. Staunton, 16 W. Va. 208; Roots v. Mason City, S. & M. Co., 27 W. Va. 483; Burlew v. Quarrier, 16 W. Va. 108; Yates v. Stuart, 39 W. Va. 124, 19 S. E. Rep. 423; Hoffman v. Ryan, 21 W. Va. 415; Templeman v. Fauntleroy, 3 Rand. 434; Morris v. Terrell, 2 Rand. 6; Ruffner v. Hewitt, 14 W. Va. 737; Vance v. Evans, 11 W. Va. 342.

Must Be Proper Case for Decree for Plaintiff.—There can be no decree in any case between codefendants, when no decree can properly be rendered in favor of the plaintiff, whether this arises from the fact that the bill does not make out a case, which entitles him to relief, or from the fact that the proof does not sustain the case as set out in the bill. Watson v. Wigginton, 28 W. Va. 533, citing Hansford v. Chesapeake Coal Co., 22 W. Va. 70; Ould v. Meyers, 23 Gratt. 384; Hubbard v. Goodwin, 3 Leigh 522, and numerous other cases to the same effect. See Western Lunatic Asylum v. Miller, 29 W. Va. 326, 1 S. E. Rep. 740; Radcliff v. Corrothers, 33 W. Va. 694, 11 S. E. Rep. 232; Kinports v. Rawson, 36 W. Va. 237, 15 S. E. Rep. 68; Glenn v. Clark, 21 Gratt. 35.

But in a bill asking that the liens in a debtor's lands be audited, the order of their priorities ascertained, and that the land be sold to pay them, though a particular debt is conceded to be a lien, it is proper for the debtor and other lienor to dispute such lien without violating the above rule. Tavener v. Barrett, 21 W. Va. 656.

Issue Must Be Made.—The contest between codefendants can never come fairly before the court, where no issue is made up, nor any provision for taking their testimony as to the matters in difference between them. Hubbard v. Goodwin, 3 Leigh 492.

Same—Satisfactory Evidence.—Unless the matter has been put in issue by the pleadings, and there is satisfactory evidence of the facts, it is not deemed proper to decree in favor of one defendant against another. Yerby v. Grigsby, 9 Leigh 387.

First Subjecting One Ultimately Liable.—A court of equity may enter a decree between codefendants, in a case where the same decree operates in favor of the complainant, by subjecting in the first instance that defendant who ought ultimately to pay the debt. McNiel v. Baird, 6 Munf. 316.

When Decree Not Proper.—In a bill brought by vendee of land to enjoin the payment of purchase money, alleging as a ground a defect of title to a part of the land, and also alleging that there is an adverse claimant to part of the land, there is no privity between the plaintiff and the adverse claimant, and the equity between the latter and the vendor does not arise from the pleading and proof between plaintiff and defendant, and is not therefore the proper subject of a decree between codefendants. Steed v. Baker, 13 Gratt. 380.

Same—Suit against Administrator and Sureties for Devastavit.—A bill was filed by a creditor against an administrator and his sureties, charging a devastavit by the former, and the liability of his sureties for it. Some of the sureties insist in their answer that under the circumstances one of the sureties is liable to the other, if they are liable to the plaintiff. There was a decree for the plaintiff, and though it appeared that the devastavit was occasioned by a payment of a debt of inferior dignity to the surety sought to be charged, yet it was not a proper case for a decree between codefendants. Allen v. Morgan, 8 Gratt. 60.

Proper Case.—Where a decree for a sale of land which was bound for the payment of certain notes was interlocutory, although it was affirmed on appeal, there may be a decree between the codefendants when the cause goes back, if it is a proper case for such a decree. Alley v. Rogers, 19 Gratt. 366.

Same—Setting Aside Fraudulent Deed.—Where judgment creditors seek to subject land of their debtor, which has been conveyed in trust to secure a debt, and in their bill they charge that the deed was intended by the grantor to defraud his creditors, and the trustee and creditor were cognizant of the fraudulent intent at the time, there is enough in the pleadings to justify a decree between the codefendants. Barger v. Buckland, 28 Gratt. 850.

III. ESSENTIALS OF VALID DECREE.

1. JURISDICTION.

a. OF PARTIES GENERALLY.

General Rule—Notice Essential—Effect of Recital.—Jurisdiction of the cause and parties is essential to the conclusiveness of a decree. To acquire jurisdiction of the defendant it is necessary that in some appropriate way he be notified of the pendency of the suit. If upon inspection of the record, it appears that no such notice has been given, the decree is void. But if the court rendering the decree is a domestic court of general jurisdiction, and the record recites that notice has been given, such recital cannot be contradicted by extrinsic proof. In such case the decree is sustained, not because a decree rendered without notice is good, but because the law does not permit the introduction of evidence to overthrow that which, for reasons of public policy, it treats as absolute verity. Wilcher v. Robertson, 78 Va. 602.

Decree a Nullity if No Notice is Given.—No doctrine is better settled than that every man is entitled to a day in court to defend his rights, and that a decree rendered against him, when he has had no opportunity for defence, is a nullity, and may be so pronounced by any court wherein it may be drawn into controversy. Ogden v. Davidson, 81 Va. 757; Myrick v. Adams, 4 Munf. 366; Robinson v. Dix, 18 W. Va. 528; Myers v. Nelson, 26 Gratt. 729; Beery v. Irick, 22 Gratt. 614; Purdie v. Jones, 32 Gratt. 827;

Fultz v. Brightwell, 77 Va. 742; Hobson v. Yancey, 2 Gratt. 73; Shaffer v. Fetty, 30 W. Va. 248, 4 S. E. Rep. 278. The same doctrine is applicable where the decree is in favor of a person not a party. See Bailey v. Robinsons, 1 Gratt. 4, 42 Am. Dec. 540; Shepard v. Starke, 3 Munf. 29. The fact that the necessary parties are infants makes no difference. Clendenning v. Conrad, 91 Va. 410, 21 S. E. Rep. 818.

Against Trustee Not Binding on Cestui Que Trust Not a Party.—In a suit where there is a claim under an adverse title to property, which has been conveyed to trustees for the payment of debts, to which only the grantor and the trustees were made parties defendant, a decree in the cause in favor of the plaintiff does not bind the cestuis que trust because they were not parties to the suit. Com. v. Ricks, 1 Gratt. 416. The general rule that a decree against trustees is not binding on their cestuis que trust seems to be universally accepted as the just and correct doctrine. See Collins v. Lofftus, 10 Leigh 5, 34 Am. Dec. 719, and note.

Coexecutors—Process against Both Essential.—A legatee assigns his interest under a will, which appoints two executors to sell the property therein conveyed, and divide the proceeds among the several legatees. The assignee brought suit against one of the executors only, and did not make the legatees parties. On both of these grounds it was an error for the court to render a decree in favor of the plaintiff. It should also have taken an account of the sale before it rendered a final decree for any particular sum, and this, notwithstanding the defendants have not answered and the bill was taken for confessed. Findlay v. Sheffey, 1 Rand. 73.

Personal Decree against a Corporation.—In West Virginia a personal decree may be rendered for specific performance against a foreign corporation upon which actual service has been had within the state under the provisions of the statute. Shafer v. O'Brien, 31 W. Va. 601, 8 S. E. Rep. 298.

Erroneous Where Proper Parties Not Summoned.—A bill was filed on behalf of certain infants against the heirs of their guardian, his administrator, the surviving security on his bond, and the administrator of the other security, as codefendants. Process was not served on a part of the heirs, nor on the surviving security. The decree against the administrator of the deceased security was held to be erroneous, because the proper parties were not before the court. Bland v. Wyatt, 1 H. & M. 543.

To Sell Land of Testator Devisees Are Necessary Parties.—In a suit for the sale of the land of a testator, his devisees were not made parties. A decree was rendered appointing commissioners to sell, who complied with the decree, and their report was confirmed. But it was held that the devisees were not bound by the decree, and that the sale and deed of the commissioners, and the subsequent confirmation of their report, did not operate to pass the legal title. Hudgin v. Hudgin, 6 Gratt. 820, 53 Am. Dec. 124.

Decree Nisi Necessary before Final Decree—Appearing before Commissioner of Accounts.—Where a defendant in chancery has not answered the bill, it is error to enter a final decree against him without the previous service of a decree nisi. And his appearing before commissioners appointed to take an account, or having notice of their proceeding to take it, does not preclude him from making this objection. Legrant v. Francisco, 3 Munf. 83.

Creditors' Suit—Service of Notice of Account.—A court has no jurisdiction over a person who has not been made a party to a suit, and could render no decree against him, and if one was rendered it was a mere nullity. Hence, where in a creditors' suit to subject real estate, the debtor only is made defendant, although there is a prior deed of trust on the land, a decree in such suit is not binding on the trustee or the cestui que trust, nor does the service of a notice of the taking of accounts by the commissioner make them parties, or render such decree valid. McCoy v. Allen, 16 W. Va. 724.

When Defendant is in Lines of Enemy.—A decree in a suit instituted by a plaintiff within the union lines against defendants in the confederacy, who do not appear and are unnotified other than by order of publication, is void and may be so considered in that or any subsequent suit. Sturm v. Fleming, 22 W. Va. 404; Grinnan v. Edwards, 21 W. Va. 347; Haymond v. Camden, 22 W. Va. 180.

Of Court of Appeals of Virginia in 1861.—A decree rendered by a pretended court of appeals of Virginia at Richmond during the pendency of the civil war, who acted under the authority of citizens of a state then in insurrection against the United States, is not binding on the parties to such cause. Snider v. Snider, 3 W. Va. 200.

Effect of Giving Depositions.—Where defendants are not served with process, and do not in any way enter an appearance in a cause, a personal decree cannot be entered against them, and the fact that they gave their depositions in a case does not authorize the court to give such a decree against them. Edichal, etc., Co. v. Columbia, etc., Co., 87 Va. 641, 13 S. E. Rep. 100.

Action by Joint Vendees—Both Must Be Represented.—After a judgment has been recovered by a vendor against two joint vendees of land for the balance of the purchase money, one of the vendees dies and the other brings a suit in equity against the vendor, asking that the judgment be enjoined and money refunded because of a deficiency in the quantity of the land. In such a case it is improper to enter a decree without having the representatives of the deceased vendee before the court. Crawford v. McDaniel, 1 Rob. 448.

Patents—Patentee Must Be Represented.—A court of equity has jurisdiction to set aside a patent obtained with knowledge of a prior entry, but the court cannot enter a decree in such case on the merits, until the patentee or his representative has been made party to the suit. Hagan v. Wardens, 3 Gratt. 315.

b. OF NONRESIDENTS.

Nonresidents Must Have Notice.—As to defendants, who are nonresidents, who have had no service of process upon them, have not appeared or authorized anyone to appear for them, no personal decree can be entered against them. McGavock v. Clark, 93 Va. 810, 22 S. E. Rep. 864; Coleman v. Waters, 13 W. Va. 278; Barrett v. McAllister, 33 W. Va. 738, 11 S. E. Rep. 220.

Regularity of Proceedings Should Appear.—The record of a suit in which there were nonresident defendants shows that after a decree nisi, the "bill was taken for confessed" at the next rules. This was followed by decrees affecting absent defendants, who were not before the court. It was recited that there was an order of publication as to the absent defendants, but there was nothing to show that it was posted as required by statute. No decree should be rendered affecting the interest of an absent defendant, unless it appear (if it be not otherwise brought before the court) that he had been regularly proceeded against by order of publication duly published in a newspaper and posted at the front door of the courthouse. McCoy v. McCoy, 9 W. Va. 443, citing Craig v. Sebrell, 9 Gratt. 131; Hadfield v. Jameson, 2 Munf. 53. In a suit in chancery against a defendant, who is out of this country, and another within the same, having in his hands effects of, or otherwise indebted to, such absentee, a decree cannot be entered against the defendant in this country until, by legal and regular proceedings, the plaintiff has established his claim against the absentee. Gibson v. White, 3 Munf. 94.

c. OF SUBJECT-MATTER.

Jurisdiction Essential to Valid Decree.—It is an elementary principle in our jurisprudence, that jurisdiction of the subject-matter and the parties is essential to the conclusiveness of a decree and though a court may obtain jurisdiction rightfully, yet its decree may be void, because in the progress of the case, it has exceeded its jurisdiction. In a suit for the sale of land a court exceeded its jurisdiction, hence it was held that the proceedings under the decree of sale were void and might be attacked collaterally. Seamster v. Blackstock, 83 Va. 232, 2 S. E. Rep. 36.

Same—Bankruptcy.—In a suit in bankruptcy it appeared that the court had no jurisdiction over the lands of a person, which had not been surrendered in that court, and against which the bankrupt had no claim. The court was therefore lacking in jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and its decree fixing liens upon the same was void, and may be set aside and disregarded as a nullity, wherever and whenever it may be called in question. Richardson v. Seevers, 84 Va. 259, 4 S. E. Rep. 712.

Same—Contempts.—It is no contempt of court to violate or disobey an order or decree which the court had no authority to make. If the court had no jurisdiction to make said order it is without authority and void. Ruhl v. Ruhl, 24 W. Va. 379, citing Swinburn v. Smith, 15 W. Va. 483, 500.

Improper Exercise of Jurisdiction.—Where jurisdiction has been obtained over the person and subject-matter no error in its exercise can make the judgment void. The authority to decide being shown, it cannot be divested by being improperly or incorrectly employed. Lawson v. Moorman, 85 Va. 880, 9 S. E. Rep. 150.

2. CONFORMITY TO PLEADINGS AND PROOFS.

General Rule.—It is a well-settled rule of the courts of equity that a decree can only be entered in accordance with the case as made by the pleadings, and no account will be taken of evidence of matters not alleged. Welfey v. Shen., etc., Co., 83 Va. 768, 3 S. E. Rep. 376; Mundy v. Vawter, 3 Gratt. 518; Kent v. Kent, 82 Va. 205; Potomac Mfg. Co. v. Evans, 84 Va. 717, 6 S. E. Rep. 2; Staples v. Staples, 85 Va. 76, 7 S. E. Rep. 199; Smith v. Lowther, 85 W. Va. 300, 13 S. E. Rep. 999; Roberts v. Coleman, 87 W. Va. 143, 16 S. E. Rep. 482; Vance Shoe Co. v. Haught, 41 W. Va. 375, 23 S. E. Rep. 553.

Evidence.—Although a plaintiff may present a good case by his proofs he is not entitled to a decree which is not justified by the allegations of his bill. Evans v. Kelley (W. Va.), 38 S. E. Rep. 497. A decree must be justified by both the pleadings and the proof. Fadely v. Tomlinson, 41 W. Va. 606, 24 S. E. Rep. 645. When the evidence is defective as to a particular item, no decree should be made as to that. McConnico v. Curzen, 3 Call 358, 1 Am. Dec. 540.

Answer.—If matter appear in the answer of a defendant in equity, which is nowise alleged in the bill, it cannot justify a decree against the defendant, though it might have been ground for such decree if it had been alleged in the bill. Eib v. Martin, 5 Leigh 182.

When the answer of the defendant contains a claim which has no connection with the relief sought in the bill, and is not necessary to be considered in deciding the case as made by the bill, and the court in its decree expresses an opinion in favor of the defendant, this decree does not conclude the question when it is afterwards set up by the defendant in a cross bill in the cause. Niday v. Harvey, 9 Gratt. 454.

No Relief Unless Prayer Therefor.—When the pleadings contain no proper prayer therefor, it is error to decree affirmative relief. Harrison v. Brewster, 38 W. Va. 294, 18 S. E. Rep. 568; Middleton v. Selby, 19 W. Va. 168.

On Matters in Cross Bill Not in Original Bill.—No decree can be found upon matters in a cross bill, which are not stated in the original bill, for as to them it is an original bill. Hansford v. Chesapeake Coal Co., 22 W. Va. 70.

Trustee of Married Women.—Where there was no misconduct in the trustee of a married woman, it was error to enter a personal decree against him in a suit brought to enforce collection of a debt of his cestui que trust. Woodson v. Perkins, 5 Gratt. 345.

Debts of Heirs Not Enforceable in Suit to Charge Ancestor's Estate.—A suit against a decedent's representative to charge his estate with a debt, the pleadings in which contain no allegation of debts against his heirs, and ask no relief as to their debts against land descended to them from such decedent, cannot be made the vehicle of ascertaining and enforcing personal debts of such heirs against such land, and any decree entered therein as to that matter will be a nullity. Fowler v. Lewis, 36 W. Va. 112, 14 S. E. Rep. 447.

Decree Void as to Party Not Named, and No Allegation against.—In a bill in chancery against several defendants, process was issued against one who was not a party defendant, and against whom there was no allegation and no relief prayed. A decree was entered against him by default and against the other defendants, by some of whom an appeal was taken and the decree reversed as to them, but in all things else affirmed. The decree was a mere nullity as to the party not named in the bill, and against whom the bill contained no allegation and prayed no relief. Moseley v. Cocke, 7 Leigh 224; Cronise v. Carper, 80 Va. 678; Ogden v. Davidson, 81 Va. 757; Strother v. Mitchell, 80 Va. 149.

Relief Not Sought.—A decree is erroneous which passes upon questions not properly presented by the plaintiffs, and directs any relief which is not sought or desired, and the proper parties are not all before the court. Donahoe v. Fackler, 8 W. Va. 249.

Single Creditor's Bill—Account of All Debts Erroneous.—In a single creditor's bill against all lienors on a tract of land designated in the bill, but which was not a general creditors' bill, it is an error to decree an account to be taken of all the debts due by the defendant, and which are valid liens on his land, their amounts and priorities. Such account not being asked by the bill, parties in interest may be taken by surprise. Baughner v. Eichelberger, 11 W. Va. 217.

IV. PRESUMPTION AND EFFECT.

1. PRESUMPTION.

a. AS TO RECITALS.

Verity of When Attacked for Fraud.—The recitals of a decree which are directly attacked for fraud and surprise in the procurement are not presumed to be absolute verities, but are subject to impeachment. Springston v. Morris (W. Va.), 34 S. E. Rep. 766.

No Exceptions Taken to Commissioner's Report.—A decree confirming the report of a master commissioner recited that there were no exceptions taken to it, and it was confirmed. This decree must be presumed to be correct as to its recitals, unless the record shows otherwise. In this case the record contains nothing which conflicts with the decree. There were exceptions found in the record taken by some of the defendants, but they were without date and nothing appears from which it can be inferred that they were filed before the decree was rendered, and it may be that they were taken and filed afterwards. Alderson v. Henderson, 5 W. Va. 182.

Order of Publication.—A decree states that the cause was heard on the bill and order of publication returned duly executed. This decree must be regarded as solemnly affirming that there was an order of publication duly taken against the defendant, and that it was duly published and posted as the law directs, and the verity of the record upon this point is not to be called into question by any averment or proof to the contrary. Craig v. Sebrell, 9 Gratt. 131.

Notice of Papers Recited in Cause.—If the caption of a decree names that the defendants in the cause are certain persons whose answers are filed, and the decree states that the cause was heard upon the bill, answers and exhibits, it will be inferred that the court in giving its decree took notice of the answers. Pickett v. Chilton, 5 Munf. 467.

Service of Process.—Where a decree recites on its face that all the defendants had been duly served with process, in the absence of anything in the record to the contrary, the presumption is conclusive that the recital is true. Moore v. Green, 90 Va. 181, 17 S. E. Rep. 872; Wilcher v. Robertson, 78 Va. 602.

A decree which recites that process was duly served on defendant is sufficient in the appellate court on an appeal, according to the principles in Craig v. Sebrell, 9 Gratt. 131; Moore v. Holt, 10 Gratt. 284, and other cases there cited. Arnold v. Arnold, 11 W. Va. 449.

Preliminary Steps to Trial.—It is not necessary to state in a decree in chancery, that all the preliminary steps towards maturing the cause for hearing were taken; it being intended, where the cause is set for hearing, that it was regularly done, unless the party attempting to impugn the decree show the contrary. Quarrier v. Carter, 4 H. & M. 242.

b. AS TO RECORD.

Of Courts of General Jurisdiction.—Nothing is better settled than that decrees of a court of general jurisdiction, acting within the scope of its authority, are presumed to be right, until the contrary appears, and are not open to collateral attack; and this is so, even though the party against whom, or in whose favor the decree was rendered was dead at the time, and such a decree is unassailable in a collateral action, as the record is conclusively presumed to speak the truth, and can only be tried by inspection. Pugh v. McCue, 86 Va. 475, 10 S. E. Rep. 715; Shelton v. Jones, 26 Gratt. 891; Pulaski Co. v. Stuart, etc., Co., 28 Gratt. 879; Lawson v. Moorman, 85 Va. 880, 9 S. E. Rep. 150; Pennybacker v. Switzer, 75 Va. 671; Brengle v. Richardson, 78 Va. 406; Marshall v. Cheatham, 88 Va. 31, 13 S. E. Rep. 308;

Grigg v. Dalsheimer, 88 Va. 508, 13 S. E. Rep. 993; Hill v. Woodward, 78 Va. 765; Wimbish v. Breeden, 77 Va. 324; Wilcher v. Robertson, 78 Va. 602; Woodhouse v. Fillbates, 77 Va. 317.

A judgment against a person who has not been served with notice is a void judgment, and is ex vi termini a nullity. But when a court of general jurisdiction has pronounced judgment, its adjudication should be as conclusive on the question whether a party was duly notified, as on any other point necessary to a proper determination of the case, as judgments of such courts are presumed correct. Ferguson v. Teel, 82 Va. 690.

Effect of Commissioner's Findings.—In the absence from the record of the evidence upon which a commissioner has reached his conclusions, and the report being confirmed by the lower court, the decree will be presumed to be correct until the contrary is shown. Saunders v. Prunty (Va.), 26 S. E. Rep. 584.

The findings of a commissioner will be sustained, although the record is unsatisfactory, and the evidence not clear, and the conclusions not accurate in all respects. Browning v. Browning (Va.), 36 S. E. Rep. 525.

Without Reservation—Effect.—A decree on full hearing, dismissing a bill generally, without reservation of right to the plaintiff to sue at law, is conclusive upon all matters involved in the case, even though there was no jurisdiction in equity because of an adequate remedy at law. Unless it otherwise appear from the decree, it will be taken that the dismissal was on a hearing on the merits. Carberry v. Railroad Co., 44 W. Va. 260, 28 S. E. Rep. 694.

Of Foreign State.—The record of a decree of a court of another state is regarded as the decree of a court of general jurisdiction, and entitled to every presumption in favor of its validity. Stewart v. Stewart, 27 W. Va. 167.

Where Evidence Is Not Preserved.—An appellate court will not assume that the lower court decreed erroneously, when the evidence upon which it was made has not been preserved, and is not before the appellate court. Paxton v. Rucker, 15 W. Va. 547.

Decree against Absent Debtor—Weight in Collateral Suits.—A decree in personam against an absent debtor is entitled to all the respect to which any other decree is entitled, in all collateral controversies. If property is sold under an execution issued thereon, the title to the property cannot be impeached by objections to the form or merits of the decree. Rootes v. Tompkins, 3 Gratt. 98.

Same—Bars Statute of Limitations.—A decree against an absent debtor merges the original cause of action, so far as to enable the plaintiff to rely thereon, in any subsequent proceeding to enforce it, as prima facie evidence of the demand it establishes; and to repel the statute of limitations, except so far as the statute may apply to judgments or decrees. Rootes v. Tompkins, 3 Gratt. 98.

2. EFFECT.

a. IN GENERAL.

Of Reference as Exhibit.—Where a decree makes an exhibit of the record of another cause by referring to it as such, this makes it a part of the record, although it was not referred to in the bill or answer, nor was made an exhibit by an entry on the order book. Craig v. Sebrell, 9 Gratt. 131.

Decree Obtained by Fraud.—Property which is claimed by a son-in-law under a marriage contract with a decedent in his lifetime, and recovered by a decree against the administratrix and distributees, is not in any way responsible to the creditors of such decedent, unless it appear that such decree was obtained by fraud and collusion between the parties. Clay v. Williams, 2 Munf. 105.

Lapse of Ten Years—Impeachment.—After a lapse of nearly ten years, a party to a suit will not be heard, as a general rule, to impeach a decree in a suit to enforce a vendor's lien, by original bill, unless some valid excuse is shown for the long delay. Walker v. Ruffner, 32 W. Va. 297, 9 S. E. Rep. 215.

Estoppel—After Twenty-Two Years.—A party may be estopped by his acquiescence in a decree, affecting his rights made in the progress of the cause, under which decree he takes a part of the fund affected by it, and makes no objection to it until after final decree in the cause made twenty-two years after it. Burton v. Brown, 23 Gratt. 1.

b. OF DECREE OF COMPETENT COURT.

Valid until Reversed.—A decree of a court of competent jurisdiction, in a suit between proper parties, is valid and conclusive until reversed on some proper proceedings in the same suit and in the same court, or on appeal, unless there be some sufficient ground of fraud or surprise to entitle the injured party to relief in some other suit. Fox v. Cottage, etc., Ass'n, 81 Va. 677, citing Wilson v. Smith, 22 Gratt. 498; Peirce v. Graham, 85 Va. 227, 7 S. E. Rep. 189.

As to Existence of Facts and Parties.—A decree is conclusive, as to the existence or nonexistence of every fact on which it depends, upon the parties to the suit and those claiming through them. Bodkin v. Arnold, 45 W. Va. 90, 30 S. E. Rep. 154.

Jurisdiction.—The validity of a decree of a court of general civil jurisdiction cannot be questioned when it is offered in evidence collaterally in another suit, unless the errors therein affect the jurisdiction of the court. Hall v. Hall, 12 W. Va. 1.

Confirmation of Commissioner's Report.—A court of equity will not interfere to give relief to a purchaser under a decree of a court having jurisdiction of the subject, or to his sureties, for errors in the decree, or the proceedings under it, where the report of the commissioners has been confirmed. Worsham v. Hardaway, 5 Gratt. 60.

Of Court of Another State.—A decree rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction in another state is valid and binding in West Virginia, and its effect here is the same as in the state where rendered. Stewart v. Stewart, 27 W. Va. 167.

Of Bankrupt Court.—A decree of a bankrupt court having cognizance of the parties and the subject-matter, is an act of a court of competent jurisdiction, and cannot be questioned elsewhere. Adams v. Logan, 27 Gratt. 201; Brengle v. Richardson, 78 Va. 410.

A decree which discharges a bankrupt under the act of congress of August 19, 1841, is conclusive upon all his creditors, in all suits which may be brought against him in any court, except where the discharge is impeached for fraud or willful concealment by the bankrupt of his property or rights of property, contrary to the provisions of that act. Tichenor v. Allen, 13 Gratt. 15.

Decree in Suit against Corporation Binding on Stockholders.—In a suit against a corporation, upon an officer of which process had been duly served, but to which stockholders were not made parties, a decree was entered making a call for unpaid subscriptions. It cannot be doubted in such case that the decree against the stockholders is in every respect valid, and should be so held in the courts of every jurisdiction, where it may be called into question. Nor can its validity be assailed because the stockholders were not in their individual capacities before the court as parties to the suit, as a corporation must sue and be sued in its corporate name and in its corporate capacity. Lewis v. Glenn, 84 Va. 947, 6 S. E. Rep. 866.

On Demurrer Dismissing Bill.—A decision on a demurrer dismissing a bill will be conclusive of every matter, whether specifically stated in the bill or not, provided it is clear that such matter was necessarily in controversy in the suit and was decided by it. Poole v. Dilworth, 26 W. Va. 583.

Foreign Attachment.—In a suit in the nature of a foreign attachment, the process was served upon the absent defendant, and there was a personal decree against him for the amount of the debt. When the plaintiff seeks to obtain satisfaction of this decree in another suit, the validity of the decree of the prior suit cannot be questioned. Burbridge v. Higgins, 6 Gratt. 119.

Of Former Term Inter Partes.—The court cannot examine the propriety of a decree made at a former term inter partes, nor set aside such decree of a former term, on the ground that it decided matters coram non judice at the term. Bank v. Craig, 6 Leigh 309.

C. OF DECREE OF PENDING SUIT.

Purchasers Pending Suit Bound by Decree.—Pendente lite purchasers of land, during the progress of a suit involving it, are as much bound by decrees entered therein as the parties to the suit. Lynch v. Andrews, 25 W. Va. 751.

"Ordinarily the decree of a court only binds the parties and their privies in representation or estate; but he, who purchases during the pendency of a suit, is held bound by the decree that may be made against the person, from whom he derives title. Such purchaser need not be made a party. This rule however is modified to a considerable extent in some cases by our statute in relation to recording lis pendens." Zane v. Fink, 18 W. Va. 693.

D. EXTERRITORIALITY.

For Partition—Sale—Conveyance.—It is a well-settled general rule that the court of one state has no jurisdiction to make a decree which will directly affect either legal or equitable titles to land situated in another state. But if the person to do the act decreed is within the jurisdiction of the court, and the act may be done without exercising any authority operating territorially within the foreign jurisdiction, the court may act in personam, and oblige the party to convey or otherwise to comply with its decree. But it is not competent for the court to decree touching a foreign subject, when the act to be done can be accomplished and perfected only by an authority operating territorially. Thus a conveyance may be decreed of lands abroad if the defendant is within the jurisdiction of the court, but neither a partition of lands nor a sale of lands lying in another state can be made by a court in this state. Poindexter v. Burwell, 82 Va. 507; Wimer v. Wimer, 82 Va. 890, 5 S. E. Rep. 536; Pillow v. Southwest, etc., Imp. Co., 92 Va. 144, 23 S. E. Rep. 32.

A decree of a court of a county, which requires a defendant residing within its limits to execute a conveyance for lands lying in another county, can be enforced upon the person only of such defendant, and does not of itself vest any legal title in the plaintiff. If this decree should be offered as evidence of title in such a case in an action of ejectment, it ought not to be received. Aldridge v. Giles, 3 H. & M. 186.

E. DIRECTING CONVEYANCE.

Decree of Partition Does Not Operate as Conveyance.

—It is a well-settled doctrine of the courts of equity that a decree of partition does not of itself operate as a conveyance of title. Such a decree does not purport to invest the parties with title to their several allotments. Hence the court in making partition usually requires that mutual conveyances shall be executed, and if necessary to carry its decree into effect will appoint a commissioner to execute proper deeds. Bolling v. Teel, 76 Va. 487.

Directing Title—A decree which directs that a title be made to a party in a suit does not of itself vest title in that party to whom it is directed to be made. The deed itself must be executed in order to pass the title. Nelson v. Triplett, 81 Va. 236.

Rule against Parties in Possession—Death of Defendant after Decree.—Where a final decree has been entered in a suit transferring title to land, and a rule has been issued against parties in possession of the land in controversy, the latter in response to the rule made an affidavit that one of the defendants in the cause under whom they held, had died since the final decree and before the rule was issued. The decree being made in the lifetime of the defendant, it was not necessary to suggest his death and revive the suit in the name of his heirs in order to proceed with the rule. Trimble v. Patton, 5 W. Va. 432.

f. RES JUDICATA.—See generally, monographic note on "Judgments."

General Rule.—In order that a fact tried by a court of competent jurisdiction be res judicata it must have been directly and not collaterally in issue, and it makes no difference whether it was decided by a court of law or chancery, if it had jurisdiction. This may be pleaded as an estoppel in either kind of court. It is not necessary that the same parties were plaintiffs or defendants in the two suits, provided the same subject in controversy between two or more of the parties, plaintiffs and defendants to the two suits respectively, has been directly in issue in the former suit and decided. Western, etc., Co. v. Va., etc., Co., 10 W. Va. 250. See McCoy v. McCoy, 29 W. Va. 794, 2 S. E. Rep. 809, and numerous cases there cited; also, monographic note on "Judgments."

Bars Subsequent Action on Matters Existing at Time of Decree.—It is a familiar doctrine in our jurisprudence that the decree of a court of competent jurisdiction directly on a point, is as a plea a bar, as long as it remains in force, and conclusive between the same parties upon the same matter directly in question in a subsequent action. This doctrine of res judicata applies to all matters which exist at the time of rendering the decree, and which the party had the opportunity of bringing before the court. Blackwell v. Bragg, 78 Va. 529; Corprew v. Corprew, 84 Va. 599, 5 S. E. Rep. 798; Fishburne v. Ferguson, 85 Va. 321, 7 S. E. Rep. 361; Foster v. City of Manchester, 89 Va. 92, 15 S. E. Rep. 497; Harrison v. Wallton, 95 Va. 721, 30 S. E. Rep. 372; Seabright v. Seabright, 33 W. Va. 152, 10 S. E. Rep. 265.

No Review by Cross Bill in Another Suit.—A final decree having been made in a cause, the plaintiffs afterwards bring another suit in another court against the same defendants, to have satisfaction of the decree. It is not competent for the defendants to file a cross bill in the second suit depending in one court, to review the decree of another court. Vanmeter v. Vanmeters, 3 Gratt. 148.

Contract of Partnership.—A decree upon a bill setting up a contract of partnership is a bar to a second suit upon this contract, where it was held in a previous suit that this contract was not a valid one, the matters alleged being sufficient to put the fact of such a contract in issue. McComb v. Lobdell, 32 Gratt. 185.

Payment Prior to Decree Ascertaining Liens.—Where a decree ascertains and fixes the amounts and priorities of liens upon real estate, and provides for the sale thereof unless such liens are paid by a certain day mentioned in the deed, this decree is appealable, and is res judicata as to all payments made prior to its date, on account of any claim therein decreed to be paid. Lehman v. Hinton, 44 W. Va. 1, 29 S. E. Rep. 984.

Construction of Fraudulent Deed.—A decree by a court of competent jurisdiction dismissing a bill upon the ground that the deed under which the complainant claimed was fraudulent, is a complete bar to another original bill to try the validity of the same deed; the proper remedy, if such decree be erroneous, being by appeal, writ of error, supersedeas, or a bill of review; not by original bill. Holliday v. Coleman, 2 Munf. 162.

Dismissal of Petition.—A decree which dismisses a petition filed in a chancery suit does not make the matters alleged therein res judicata.

Making Division of Estate a Bar.—It seems that a final decree in a suit by legatees, for the division of a testator's estate, is a bar to a bill exhibited by the same person, or their legal representatives, suggesting that the executor had kept back part of the property, but not averring that this was new matter since discovered, or that the decree was obtained by fraud. Legrand v. Francisco, 3 Munf. 83; Seamster v. Blackstock, 83 Va. 232, 2 S. E. Rep. 36.

Reservation of Right of Litigation—No Appeal.—When a decree is entered reserving the right to any party to further litigate any matter in controversy in a suit, such reservation may be reviewed on appeal by any party prejudiced thereby; and if no appeal is taken, such reservation becomes res judicata, and cannot be called in question by any party in another suit or proceeding. Bodkin v. Arnold, 45 W. Va. 90, 30 S. E. Rep. 154.

V. KINDS OF DECREES.

1. INTERLOCUTORY.

a. IN GENERAL.

Affirmation by Appellate Court Final.—An interlocutory decree affirmed on appeal by an appellate court cannot be reheard by the court in which it was pronounced. And an order of the appellate court dismissing an appeal for failure to have the record printed, is in effect, so far at least as a subsequent appeal is concerned, equivalent to an affirmation of the decree. Woodson v. Leyburn, 83 Va. 843, 3 S. E. Rep. 873. See Adkins v. Edwards, 83 Va. 301, 2 S. E. Rep. 435; Trevelyan v. Lofft, 83 Va. 146, 1 S. E. Rep. 901; Newberry v. Stuart, 86 Va. 967, 11 S. E. Rep. 880; Fultz v. Brightwell, 77 Va. 750; Staples v. Staples, 85 Va. 79, 7 S. E. Rep. 199; Rawlings v. Rawlings, 75 Va. 91; Wayland v. Crank, 79 Va. 604.

No Bar.—An interlocutory decree in a suit is no bar to a subsequent suit involving the same questions. Quarles v. Kerr, 14 Gratt. 48.

Bill of Review Improper.—Where a decree of sale was not final, but interlocutory, much remaining to be done to give completely the relief contemplated by the court, it was an error to treat an injunction bill as a bill of review for the purposes of modifying the decree of sale; a bill of review being the remedy when a final decree is to be corrected. Dellinger v. Foltz, 93 Va. 729, 25 S. E. Rep. 993.

May Be Excepted to at Any Time before Final Decree.—Where an interlocutory decree was entered and the court retained the cause and directed important inquiries essential to the final decree, disposing of the whole cause, it was competent for the appellees to except to the commissioner's report at any time before a final decree. Miller v. Cook, 77 Va. 806; Templeman v. Steptoe, 1 Munf. 839; Smith v. Blackwell, 31 Gratt. 291.

No Provision for Costs Immaterial.—In an interlocutory decree, it cannot be objected that no provision has been made for the payment of costs, as it will be time enough to do this when the cause is ready for final decree. Yost v. Porter, 80 Va. 853.

Uncertainty In.—A decree ought not to be reversed for uncertainty in matters as to which it is only interlocutory, and may be perfected by application to the court. Birchett v. Bolling, 5 Munf. 442.

Set Aside at Next Term.—When an interlocutory decree is entered at one term of the court of appeals, it may be set aside at a subsequent term. Com. v. Beaumarchais, 3 Call 122.

Alternate and Conflicting Statements In.—When an interlocutory decree merely confirms generally a report containing alternate and conflicting statements, it must be understood that the court has reserved to itself the power of selecting by its future decree between such statements, and of decreeing accordingly. McCandlish v. Edloe, 3 Gratt. 330.

b. WHAT CONSTITUTES.

Does Not Give Complete Relief.—When the further action of the court in a cause is necessary to give completely the relief contemplated by the court, there the decree upon which the question arises is to be regarded not as final, but interlocutory. Cocke v. Gilpin, 1 Rob. 20; Miller v. Cook, 77 Va. 806; Sims v. Sims, 94 Va. 580, 27 S. E. Rep. 436.

Same—Leave Reserved for Further Decree.—In a suit, the object of which was to make a partition of the lands among the cotenants thereof, a decree was entered which approved and confirmed the report making the partition. It provided in express terms that, "leave is given the parties to whom the several parcels of lands are allotted by that report, and their alienees, to have such decree as the parties may agree upon finally settling their respective interests entered in the causes in vacation." It is evident that further action by the court to complete the relief contemplated was provided for, and it does not change the nature of the decree that no application for the further decree was ever made. It was nevertheless a pending cause and open to such orders and decrees as might be necessary. The applications for rehearing are always addressed to the sound discretion of the chancellor, and even if the decree was interlocutory, it can be reheard at any time before final decree, even after the lapse of a great length of time. Wright v. Strother, 76 Va. 857.

Same—Remanding Cause for Commissioner's Report.—Where a decree in a suit brought to subject real estate to the lien of a judgment has not fully ascertained the liens upon such land, and the cause has been remanded to a commissioner for further inquiry and report, this does not constitute a final decree, as it does not decide the whole matter in controversy and leave nothing for the court to do. If the report of liens had been completed, and had been confirmed, and a decree for sale had been entered, it would not have been a final decree, for it would still be necessary for the court to act upon the report of the sale. Repass v. Moore, 96 Va. 147, 30 S. E. Rep. 458.

Leaves Something to Be Done in the Cause—Option.

—Every decree which leaves anything in the cause to be done by the court is interlocutory as between the parties remaining in the court. Hence when in construing a will, the court gave the devisee the option to hold in fee what he received under the will, or else to come into hotchpot and share in the rest of the estate, the boundaries and value of which had not been ascertained, this clearly constituted an interlocutory decree, and the fact that the principles of the cause were settled so far as the devisee was concerned, did not change its character. He was entitled to a petition to rehear, although more than a year had elapsed since the last decree. Noel v. Noel, 86 Va. 100, 9 S. E. Rep. 584.

Same—Account Directed.—In a suit involving the right of access to a well, a decree was entered which directed that the plaintiff should have uninterrupted access to the water of the well, unless and until otherwise ordered by the court; that the injunction before awarded, which was only until the rights of the complainants could be considered and adjudicated, should be continued; that an account should be taken by a commissioner to ascertain the amount of expenses incurred by the father of the defendant, from whom the defendant claimed, and by the latter in keeping the well in repair, and the amount paid by the plaintiffs; and that the account when taken should be reported. The rights of the parties were not finally adjudicated; the injunction was not perpetuated; the decree directed an account to be taken and reported; but it did not determine the question of costs nor direct their payment. The decree was merely interlocutory. Warren v. Syme, 7 W. Va. 474.

Same—Sale Decreed with Power Reserved to Confirm or Set Aside.—In a suit to subject land in the hands of the heirs to the payment of the debts of their ancestor, in the decree for sale the court reserved complete power over the sale, to confirm it or set it aside as the interest of the parties might require. No title could be made to the purchaser, without further action of the court, and what is most material to notice, no disposition is made of the purchase money; no directions given to the commissioner on the subject, so that the creditors could not receive a dollar of the proceeds, nor the heirs the surplus, without a further decree. If this be a final decree, the court has deprived itself of all control over the subject-matter in controversy, and ended the cause, without giving the parties the slightest relief. The very fact that no direction is given as to the proceeds of sale, and that the commissioners are required to report their proceedings to the court, is conclusive that further action of the court was not only contemplated, but actually necessary. According to the uniform decisions of this court, a decree, which disposes of the whole subject, gives all the relief that is contemplated and leaves nothing to be done by the court, is only to be regarded as final. On the other hand every decree which leaves anything in the cause to be done by the court, is interlocutory as between the parties remaining in the court. Ryan v. McLeod, 32 Gratt. 367.

Same—Conveyance Set Aside and Report Ordered.—In an action to set aside certain conveyances and to subject the lands conveyed therein to the satisfaction of a judgment, a decree that sets aside the conveyances and refers the cause to a commissioner for inquiry and report, with a view to further action in the cause, is an interlocutory and not a final decree, as it is a step preliminary to subjecting the land to the judgment. Welsh v. Solenberger, 85 Va. 441, 8 S. E. Rep. 91.

Further Action of Court Necessary.—A decree though deciding the right to the property in controversy, and awarding the costs of the suit, is still only interlocutory, if commissioners be appointed to carry it into effect, and the court has yet to act upon their report. Neither does it cease to be interlocutory in consequence of an order that the defendant be attached for failing to comply with it. Mackey v. Bell, 3 Munf. 523.

Decree for Sale and Report.—A decree empowering an executor to sell the lands of his testator, for payment of debts, and report his proceedings, in execution thereof, to the court, is not final but interlocutory. Goodwin v. Miller, 3 Munf. 42.

A decree which directs a sale of the defendant's land to satisfy the charges upon it is not a final decree. Spoor v. Tilson, 97 Va. 379, 33 S. E. Rep. 609. See also, Repass v. Moore, 96 Va. 147, 30 S. E. Rep. 458, and cases there cited.

A decree, which forecloses the equity of redemption in mortgaged property, and appoints commissioners to make the sale of it, is only interlocutory, and an appeal cannot be allowed by the county court from such decree even in term time. Allen v. Belches, 2 H. & M. 595.

A decree, foreclosing a mortgage and directing a sale of the mortgaged premises, is an interlocutory decree. Fairfax v. Muse, 2 H. & M. 557.

Directing an Account.—A decree, dismissing so much of a bill as claims one of two separate subjects in controversy, and as to the other, determining also the rights of the parties, but directing an account to be taken, is not final in any respect, between the parties retained in court, and their legal representatives; but is subject to revision in every part, at any time before a final decree, without the necessity of a bill of review. Templeman v. Steptoe, 1 Munf. 839.

For Conveyance with Condition.—In a suit by one partner against his copartner, for a settlement of the partnership accounts, and for a moiety of a tract of land purchased by the defendant in his own name, and paid for out of the partnership funds, a decree having been made declaring the land partnership property, and directing a settlement of the accounts, and the cause afterwards coming on to be further heard upon the report of the commissioner, the court decrees that the plaintiff pay to the defendant a sum of money appearing due by the report, and that the defendant thereupon convey to the plaintiff a moiety of the land; but if the plaintiff shall not, within six months from the date of the decree, pay the said money, that the marshal sell the moiety of the land, and out of the proceeds of sale, after defraying the expenses, pay to the defendant the money so decreed, and the residue, if any, to the plaintiff. And the court further decrees that the outstanding debts due to the firm be equally divided between the parties, and that the costs of the suit be equally borne by them. Held, this decree is interlocutory, and it may be reviewed upon an appeal, although there has been such lapse of time between the rendition of the decree and the appeal, as would preclude its being reviewed if the decree were final. Cocke v.

Gilpin, 1 Rob. 20; approved by Miller v. Cook, 77 Va. 808.

For Sale Unless Sum Due Is Paid—Leave Given to Apply to Court.—In a suit brought to subject land to the payment of notes given for its purchase price, the court ascertained the indebtedness of the defendants to the plaintiffs to be a certain sum and a certain other sum to become due at a future time. The court decreed that unless the sum then due be paid in 30 days, certain commissioners should sell the land, which was subject to the vendor's lien of the two named sums, to pay the one then due. In this decree leave was given the plaintiff to apply for a decree to enforce the payment of the sum not yet due, under an attachment of other property of the defendant, the sale of which had not been prayed for in the bill. This was an interlocutory decree, and it may be reviewed on appeal after five years from its date. Camden v. Haymond, 9 W. Va. 680.

C. EVIDENCE AFTER.

General Rule—Rest in Discretion of Court.—There is no rule of practice or of law which precludes the party from taking new evidence upon a question of fact passed upon by an interlocutory decree, even before a rehearing is obtained. The introduction of such evidence depends on the sound discretion of the court, and all the circumstances of each particular case. Summers v. Darne, 31 Gratt. 791, citing Dunbar v. Woodcock, 10 Leigh 628; Moore v. Hilton, 12 Leigh 1.

After an interlocutory decree upon a hearing has been rendered, deciding matters in issue between the litigant parties, neither of them has the absolute right of introducing new evidence in respect to the matter so decided, but the right to introduce and use such evidence, as ground for changing or setting aside such decree, depends on the sound judicial discretion of the court to which it is offered. Moore v. Hilton, 12 Leigh 1.

On Exceptions to Commissioner's Report.—An interlocutory decree in chancery, deciding a question of fact in litigation, pronounced in the progress of an account upon exceptions to a report, or instructions to a commissioner, as to the propriety of items of debit or credit, is not such a final decree as precludes a party from taking new evidence touching the same question of fact, without having obtained a review or rehearing of the decree, and without showing that the new evidence had been discovered since the decree. Dunbar v. Woodcock, 10 Leigh 629.

Under Va. Code of 1873—Foundation for Motion or Petition to Rehear.—Under Va. Code of 1873, ch. 172, § 36, where there has been an interlocutory decree in a chancery cause, a deposition taken thereafter cannot be read as to any matter thereby adjudicated, unless it be as a foundation for a motion or petition to rehear the cause. A deposition taken and returned before a final hearing, as to any matter not adjudicated, whether there be an interlocutory decree or not, may be read. Richardson v. Duble, 33 Gratt. 730.

When Error to Refuse to Open Decree—After-Discovered Evidence.—It was held in Roberts v. Cocke, 1 Rand. 121, to be an error for the chancellor to refuse an application to open an interlocutory decree, founded upon affidavits of a discovery of important matter since such decree was rendered.

D. REHEARINGS OF.

Discretionary with Court—On Bill Confessed.—It is well settled upon authority that where an interlocutory decree has been entered in a case on a bill taken for confessed, before a hearing on the merits, and there are other circumstances tending to excuse the default, the defendant may be allowed a rehearing of the decree in the discretion of the court, if he shows a meritorious defence. Spilman v. Gilpin, 93 Va. 698, 25 S. E. Rep. 1004.

Same—Confirming Commissioner's Report.—Whether an interlocutory decree confirming a commissioner's report shall be modified or wholly set aside, or not, is generally a matter resting in the sound judicial discretion of the chancellor, exercised according to the particular circumstances of each case. Newberry v. Stuart, 86 Va. 905, 11 S. E. Rep. 880, citing Kendrick v. Whitney, 28 Gratt. 646; Fultz v. Brightwell, 77 Va. 742.

By Petition.—An interlocutory decree may be reheard upon petition. Purdie v. Jones, 32 Gratt. 827; Fultz v. Brightwell, 77 Va. 742.

An interlocutory decree may be altered or reversed upon rehearing, without the assistance of a supplemental bill in the nature of a bill of review, if there is sufficient matter to reverse it appearing upon the former proceedings. When there is no defect to be supplied, the new investigation is usually brought on by petition for a rehearing. Hyman v. Smith, 10 W. Va. 298.

The appropriate method of applying for a rehearing of an interlocutory decree, rendered on the merits, to enable a party to introduce additional evidence, is by petition, which must not only allege that the matter sought to be introduced was discovered after the rendition of the decree, but it must appear by affidavit that this new evidence could not have been produced by reasonable diligence at the date of the decree. Trevelyan v. Lofft, 83 Va. 141, 1 S. E. Rep. 901.

Or Motion.—A bill of review ought not to be granted to an interlocutory decree, but if such decree be erroneous, it may be corrected by motion, or petition to the court. Banks v. Anderson, 2 H. & M. 20.

No Statutory Bar to Filing Petition.—There is no statutory bar to the time within which an error in an interlocutory decree may be corrected by filing a petition to rehear. Kendrick v. Whitney, 28 Gratt. 646; Todd v. McFall, 96 Va. 754, 32 S. E. Rep. 472; Wayland v. Crank, 79 Va. 602; Staples v. Staples, 85 Va. 76, 7 S. E. Rep. 199.

For Fraud, Surprise or Mistake—Original Bill.—Interlocutory decrees, not entered by consent, but procured by fraud, surprise or mistake of the parties, cannot be set aside by petition to rehear a bill in the nature of a bill of review, but only by an original bill. Anderson v. Woodford, 8 Leigh 316; Manion v. Fahy, 11 W. Va. 482.

E. APPEALS FROM.

Former Law—Statutory Change.—It was formerly the law of Virginia that no appeal lies from an interlocutory decree of the chancery court. Grymes v. Pendleton, 1 Call 54; Gibson v. Randolph, 2 Munf. 310.

For appeals from interlocutory decrees in certain cases, by statutory provision, see Code of Va., § 2454; Code of W. Va., ch. 185, § 1.

Time of Appeal from Interlocutory Decree.—When interlocutory decrees settle the principles of a cause parties thereby aggrieved might appeal therefrom, but they are not obliged to do so, but may wait until after a final decree. There is no limitation upon the time wherein an appeal will lie from such an interlocutory decree; such running only against a final decree. Jameson v. Jameson, 86 Va. 51, 9 S. E.

Rep. 480; Harper v. Vaughan, 87 Va. 426, 12 S. E. Rep. 785.

Statutory Provisions.—By virtue of § 3454 of the Va. Code, the right is given to a party to appeal from certain interlocutory decrees if he desires to do so, still he is not bound to appeal from such decrees at the time they are rendered, but he may do so at any time within a year after a final decree has been rendered in the cause, provided all the other requisites for an appeal exist. Southern Ry. Co. v. Glenn, 98 Va. 309, 36 S. E. Rep. 895, citing Jameson v. Jameson, 86 Va. 51, 9 S. E. Rep. 480; Harper v. Vaughan, 87 Va. 426, 12 S. E. Rep. 785.

Only in a chancery case is a party authorized to appeal from a decree or order which is not final, and then only from such decree or order as is provided in § 3454 of the Va. Code of 1887. Unless the decree or order, not being final, falls within this description, the court of appeals has no jurisdiction of appeal, because it has no jurisdiction to review any interlocutory decree in chancery, except what is given by statute. Elder v. Harris, 76 Va. 68. See ch. 139, § 1, of Code of West Virginia.

Kind of Interlocutory Decree That Is Appealable.—An interlocutory decree that is appealable as one adjudicating the principles of a cause is one which adjudicates, not some, but all the questions raised in the pleadings or otherwise, and so far adjudicates that it determines the principles and rules by which relief is to be administered to the parties, so that it is only necessary to apply such principles and rules to the facts in order to decree the relative rights of the parties in the subject-matter of the suit. Wood v. Harmison, 41 W. Va. 376, 23 S. E. Rep. 560.

Sustaining Exceptions.—An appeal does not lie from an interlocutory decree sustaining exceptions to an answer for insufficiency, and requiring a defendant to answer over. Pleasants v. Lorton, 2 P. & H. 8.

By Judge in Vacation.—A judge in vacation cannot grant an appeal from an interlocutory decree. Dawney v. Wright, 2 H. & M. 12; Fairfax v. Muse, 2 H. & M. 557.

Reinstating Injunction and Directing New Trial.—A decree of a superior court of chancery, which reinstates an injunction and directs a new trial of an issue at law, is not an interlocutory decree from which an appeal can be allowed. Price v. Strange, 2 H. & M. 615.

May Be Granted at Subsequent Term.—The power of chancery courts to grant appeals from interlocutory decrees in certain cases is not limited to the term of the court at which such decrees were rendered, but this authority may be exercised at any subsequent term. Wright v. Dawney, 3 H. & M. 259.

Court of Admiralty.—No appeal lies upon an interlocutory decree from a court of admiralty. Dawson v. Graves, 4 Call 127.

2. FINAL.

a. IN GENERAL.

Suggestions for Delay.—When the defendant in a cause, against whom final decree is about to be entered, suggests that the plaintiff is dead, which in the opinion of the court was done merely for the purpose of delay, the court may disregard such suggestion and render the final decree then ready to be entered. Gillespie v. Bailey, 12 W. Va. 70, 29 Am. Rep. 445.

Suspending Order to Final Decree.—At the conclusion of a decree, which was final in form and substance, a suspending order was attached, directing that the decree be suspended until a cause pending in the same court between the plaintiff and defendant of this suit and another party shall be decided. The object of this order was not to reserve any question in the first case for future decision, but to prevent the enforcement of the decree until the second suit was decided. This does not convert the decree into an interlocutory one, but it still remains final. Fleming v. Bolling, 8 Gratt. 292.

Cannot Be Part Final and Part Interlocutory as to Same Party.—A decree cannot be in part final, and in part interlocutory in the same cause, for or against the same parties who remain in court. Ryan v. McLeod, 32 Gratt. 367.

Final as to One and Not as to Another.—A suit was brought to construe a will and to divide the land among the parties entitled thereto. To this suit the father and the two surviving children were made parties defendant, and a decree was entered therein, adjudging that the land be divided between the two children and that the father had no interest in it. It was subsequently contended in a suit brought by a creditor to set aside a deed, made after the decree, on the ground of fraud, and subject the land to the payment of the father's debts, that the doctrine of res judicata had no application, because the decree of partition was not a final one. But as to the father the decree was final, though it was not as to the other parties. It settled the question that he had no interest in the land and that was the only question in which he was concerned. It has been repeatedly decided by the courts of Virginia that a decree may be final as to one party and not as to another. Gardner v. Stratton, 89 Va. 900, 17 S. E. Rep. 553. See Royall v. Johnson, 1 Rand. 421; Noel v. Noel, 86 Va. 109, 9 S. E. Rep. 584.

b. WHAT CONSTITUTES.

General Rule.—A decree, which settles all the principles of a cause, directs a disbursement of the fund in the hands of the administrator, directs the payment of costs, and leaves nothing else to be done in the cause, and upon its face declares that "this decree is final," is a final decree. There was nothing left to be adjudicated, and the finality of such a decree comes within the very definition of the authorities, as laid down by the Virginia court of appeals in repeated decisions. Thomson v. Brooke, 76 Va. 160; Parker v. Logan, 82 Va. 376, 4 S. E. Rep. 613; Tennent v. Pattons, 6 Leigh 196; Cocke v. Gilpin, 1 Rob. 20; Harvey v. Branson, 1 Leigh 108; Ruff v. Starke, 3 Gratt. 134; Vanmeter v. Vanmeters, 3 Gratt. 148; Fleming v. Bolling, 8 Gratt. 292; Ambrose v. Keller, 22 Gratt. 769; Rogers v. Strother, 27 Gratt. 417; Rawlings v. Rawlings, 75 Va. 76; Norfolk Trust Co. v. Foster, 78 Va. 413; Sims v. Sims, 94 Va. 580, 27 S. E. Rep. 436.

Executions—Leave Given for Future Aid of Court.—It is a general rule that a decree entered upon hearing, which settles all the matters in controversy between the parties, is final though much remains to be done before it can be completely carried into execution, and even though to effectuate such execution the cause is retained and leave is given to the parties to apply for the future aid of the court. Thorntons v. Fitzhugh, 4 Leigh 209; Davenport v. Mason, 2 Wash. 200; Harvey v. Branson, 1 Leigh 108; Vanmeter v. Vanmeters, 3 Gratt. 148; Ruff v. Starke, 3 Gratt. 134; Tennent v. Patton, 6 Leigh 196; Fleming v. Bolling, 8 Gratt. 292; Rogers v. Strother, 27 Gratt. 417; Core v. Strickler, 24 W. Va. 689; Rawlings v. Rawlings, 75 Va. 76.

Order of Dismissal.—A decree which dismisses a suit was in these words: "The plaintiff failing to prosecute his suit, it is ordered that the same be dismissed." This decree is final, and after the end of the term at which it was rendered, it can only be set aside on appeal, or by bill of review. These remedies, however, must be pursued within the time limited by statute. Jones v. Turner, 81 Va. 709.

Same—Payment of Costs.—A decree, dismissing a bill as to a defendant, is as to such defendant a final decree. Dick v. Robinson, 19 W. Va. 159. A decree which dismisses a suit and directs the payment of costs, is a final decree, and the fact that two suits were heard together, the parties to which were not, and could not have been originally bound in one controversy, will not affect the finality of the decree. Home Bldg., etc., Co. v. London, 98 Va. 152, 85 S. E. Rep. 862.

Omission of Unimportant Claim.—A decree which settles all matters of dispute in a cause, but which omits to decree upon a claim set up in the bill, which after circumstances render unimportant and which the plaintiff did not insist upon, is a final decree. Ruff v. Starke, 8 Gratt. 184.

Payment of Money.—A decree which provides for the distribution and payment of money is a final decree, and is subject to the statute of limitations relating to appeals, bills of review, and motions to correct nonappealable errors. Kearfott v. Dandridge, 45 W. Va. 673, 31 S. E. Rep. 947.

Reservation in Decree of Ended Cause.—A final decree was entered in a cause, whose object was for the sale of land for the payment of a legacy; it was stricken from the docket, and remained for more than twenty-eight years among the ended causes of the court. The said final decree provided that "any of the parties to this suit have leave reserved to them at the foot of this decree to ask any such further order as may be necessary to enforce the same." This was held insufficient to authorize the revival of the suit. Riely v. Kinzel, 85 Va. 480, 7 S. E. Rep. 907.

Directing Conveyance by One Defendant.—In a suit in chancery against several defendants, a decree was entered that the complainant recover from one of them the residue of the land claimed and owned by that defendant under the will of his father, after taking therefrom the portions sold by him to the other defendants, also that he give possession and execute a conveyance of the same in fee, "without which conveyance, however, the title is to be in the said complainant by force of this decree." This will not be a final decree until the suit is disposed of as to all the defendants. Chapman v. Armistead, 4 Munf. 383.

Allowing Amendment in Specified Time.—An order sustaining a demurrer to a bill, and giving the plaintiff leave to amend in a specified time, cannot be regarded as a final order, and as settling the principles of the cause, until after the time limited therein for the plaintiff to amend his bill has expired. London-Va. Min. Co. v. Moore, 98 Va. 256, 35 S. E. Rep. 722, citing Commercial Bank of Lynchburg v. Rucker (Va.), 24 S. E. Rep. 388.

Unauthorized Removal from Docket by Clerk.—Where a cause was removed from the docket, not by the order of the court, but by the clerk, and the decree was marked by him "final decree," because in his opinion there was nothing more to be done in it, this did not make it a final decree. The words marked on it do not determine its character and effect, the contents alone do this—and as there was nothing in the decree to show that the court intended to put an end to the cause, it was competent for the court to order it to be reinstated, and to take cognizance of the matters set forth in the petition filed in the suit. Ward v. Funsten, 86 Va. 359, 10 S. E. Rep. 415.

Confirmation of Accounts.—A bill was filed by the legatees and devisees of an intestate asking for a settlement of accounts of his administrator. A full and complete settlement was duly made and filed without exception, being subsequently confirmed by the court. This decree of confirmation was final as to the administrator, and will not be reviewed on petition after three years. Bradley v. Bradley, 83 Va. 75, 1 S. E. Rep. 477.

Arbitrators.—When the parties to a suit in equity agree to refer the matter in controversy to arbitrators, whose award is to be entered as the decree of the court, and the award is made and entered; this is a final decree, which can only be reversed or altered by bill of review. Davis v. Crews, 1 Gratt. 407.

Confirmation of Sale and Disbursement and Conveyance Ordered.—A suit was brought to recover $758, evidenced by negotiable notes, given for the purchase price of a tract of land, which was attached. The case was matured and after being heard a decree was rendered for $718. This was declared a lien on the land, and it was decreed to be sold. The sale was confirmed, the money ordered to be collected and disbursed, and the commissioner was ordered to execute a deed to the purchaser, and the sheriff was ordered to deliver possession. This was a final decree, the whole matter being disposed of and nothing remaining for the court to do. McKinney v. Kirk, 9 W. Va. 26.

Disposal of Whole Subject—Sale.—A decree in chancery, disposing of the whole subject, deciding all questions in controversy, ascertaining the rights of all parties, and awarding the costs, though it appoint a commissioner to sell part of the subject and account for and pay the proceeds to the parties, with liberty to them to apply to the court to add or substitute new commissioners, or for a partition of the subject directed to be sold in kind, is a final decree. Harvey v. Branson, 1 Leigh 108.

Cause "Stricken from the Docket."—Where land was sold by a commissioner as ordered, and the proceeds of the sale distributed and a final report was made, which showed a completion of his collections and a balance in his hands for final distribution, the cause was heard upon the papers formerly read and the report of the commissioner without exceptions. The court confirmed the report and decreed in conformity with it, and that "the cause should be stricken from the docket." This means that in the opinion of the court the cause is ended—that no further action of the court in the cause is necessary. That is the established definition of a final decree. It is, and in the nature of things must be an adjudication that everything has been done in the cause that the court intends to do, and there is no longer any necessity of retaining it on the docket. The unconditional order striking from the docket, appended to such a decree, absolutely and unequivocally imports judicial determination and a final disposition of the pending cause. The decree may be erroneous, but the error does not render it less final. The court by its order has put the cause beyond its control, and it cannot upon discovery of the error recall it in a summary way and resume a jurisdiction which has been exhausted. Battaille v. Maryland Hospital, 76 Va. 63.

Amendment and Continuation for Report.—A bill was filed against an administrator for the settlement of his account. A decree was rendered against him and his sureties in favor of a receiver, who was to execute a bond before he received any money thereunder. Subsequently this decree was amended, as to the amount and costs, and execution was directed to issue thereon, and the cause was continued for a report from the receiver. This was a final decree as nothing remained to be done in the cause. Series v. Cromer, 88 Va. 426, 18 S. E. Rep. 859.

Limitation of Appeal—Order of Application of Property to Debts.—A legatee brought suit against the purchaser of real estate from an executor, and the sons of the deceased surety of the executor on his bond, holding the estate of the surety. The testator bequeathed an annuity to the legatee and the residue of his estate, which was ample to satisfy all legacies, after the payment of debts, to his son, who was the executor. The latter sold the real property, wasted the personal, and died insolvent. It was decreed in this case that the sons of the surety should each pay one-half of the annuities in arrear, and the costs of the suit, reserving liberty to the plaintiff, if the decree should prove unavailing against either, to resort to the court for a further decree against the other, and ordering the cause to be retained for the purpose of taking further accounts as to the annuities to accrue in the future. Notwithstanding the reservation this was a final decree, from which no appeal can be taken after the lapse of three years, and although the legacy was charged both on the real and personal property, yet the latter was primarily applicable to the legacy, and the decree was correct in subjecting the surety of the executor, before the purchaser of the real estate. Thorntons v. Fitzhugh, 4 Leigh 209.

Inquiries Directed "In the Cause."—Where by a decree certain inquiries "in the cause" were directed to be made by a commissioner of the court, it was consequently not a final decree. Barker v. Jenkins, 84 Va. 895, 6 S. E. Rep. 459.

Where Rights of Others Not Affected.—Where the rights or responsibilities of several parties to a suit are perfectly distinct and several, and where a final disposition of the cause as to one, with a direction as to the payment of costs as between him and the adverse party, does not in any degree affect the rights or interests of any other party, and where nothing which can be brought into the cause by any other party or which can be done by the court as to the other party, can by possibility affect the rights or interests of the party as to whom such decree has been made, such decree has never been considered as interlocutory, but is final. Royall v. Johnson, 1 Rand. 421.

C. SUBSEQUENT PROCEEDINGS.

After Final Decree Subsequent Ones Erroneous and Void.—Where a final decree was entered in a suit, the cause was ended and the court could proceed no further. It had no further jurisdiction of the subject-matter or of the parties in that proceeding, and any subsequent decree was a nullity, where it was rendered in the absence of the defendant upon the mere motion of the plaintiff by attorney, and without notice to any one. Johnson v. Anderson, 76 Va. 766. See Camden v. Haymond, 9 W. Va. 680.

After a final decree has been entered in a cause, upon proceedings regularly had, and to which no exceptions have been taken, it is error to allow an answer to be filed, and after reversing the former decree, to hear the case de novo. Crim v. Davisson, 6 W. Va. 465.

After a final decree, which settles the rights of all the parties, and disposes of the whole case made by the pleadings, any subsequent decree in the same cause is not made in a pending cause, although it be retained on the docket, the final decree is not thereby made interlocutory, the subsequent decree is erroneous and void, and will be reversed. Nelson v. Jennings, 2 P. & H. 369; Battaille v. Maryland Hospital, 76 Va. 63; Johnson v. Anderson, 76 Va. 766; Smith v. Powell, 98 Va. 431, 36 S. E. Rep. 522; Ruhl v. Ruhl, 24 W. Va. 279.

Where a bill has been dismissed with costs upon the hearing by a decree, this must of necessity be final, and if rendered in vacation, under the statute, it takes effect from the time it is entered of record by the clerk. The judge pronouncing it cannot, by subsequent action impart to it a different character. Pace v. Ficklin, 76 Va. 292.

d. HOW REVERSED.

By Bill of Review.—Where a decree is final, a bill of review is the proper remedy to correct it, and where the decree is interlocutory, a bill in the nature of a bill of review and petition for a rehearing is proper. Hyman v. Smith, 10 W. Va. 298.

Or Appeal.—A final decree may be set aside by bill of review or by appeal. Battaille v. Maryland Hospital, 76 Va. 63.

Fraud—Original Bill.—Where a final decree has been procured by fraud, it should be annulled or modified, not by a bill of review proper, but by an original bill, or by an original bill in the nature of a bill of review. Anderson v. Woodford, 8 Leigh 316; Manion v. Fahy, 11 W. Va. 482.

No Reversal without Benefit to Appellant.—Because certain interlocutory decrees were not reheard and amended before a final decree was entered, which was inconsistent with them, the final decree will not be reversed for this technical reason where the appellant would not be ultimately benefited by such reversal. Booton v. Booton (Va.), 29 S. E. Rep. 823.

3. FOR ACCOUNT.—See monographic note on "Commissioners in Chancery" appended to Whitehead v. Whitehead, 23 Gratt. 376.

a. IN GENERAL.

Who May Take—Judicial Act.—An attorney in the case, a party to the suit or a creditor is not a competent person to take an account ordered by a decree, as the commissioner acts in a judicial capacity. Dillard v. Krise, 86 Va. 414, 10 S. E. Rep. 480; Etter v. Scott, 90 Va. 762, 19 S. E. Rep. 776; Bowers v. Bowers, 29 Gratt. 697; Davis v. Beazley, 75 Va. 491; Smith v. Mayo, 83 Va. 910, 5 S. E. Rep. 276; Shipman v. Fletcher, 91 Va. 481, 22 S. E. Rep. 458; Fayette Land Co. v. Louisville, etc., R. Co., 93 Va. 274, 24 S. E. Rep. 1016; Findley v. Smith, 42 W. Va. 299, 26 S. E. Rep. 370.

No Account without Issue.—In a chancery cause, where a replication has been entered, and afterwards withdrawn, it is an error for the court to order an account before a new issue is made up. Clarke v. Tinsley, 4 Rand. 250.

Decree against Plaintiff.—On a settlement of accounts in a court of equity, a decree will be rendered against the plaintiff for a balance of account appearing to be due to the defendant. Fitzgerald v. Jones, 1 Munf. 150; Hill v. Southerland, 1 Wash. 128.

Decree for General Account.—After a decree for a general account in a creditors' suit, all the other creditors may come in and prove their debts before the commissioner to whom the cause is referred. Simmons v. Lyles, 27 Gratt. 922; Piedmont, etc., Ins. Co. v. Maury, 75 Va. 508; Beverly v. Rhodes, 86 Va.

415, 10 S. E. Rep. 572; 1 Barton's Ch. Pr. (2d Ed.) 286 et seq. It is the duty of the creditor or some one authorized by him to lay his claim before the commissioner in order that it may be reported. The usual practice in such cases is to require the creditor to accompany the claim with an affidavit that the debt is due. Conrad v. Fuller, 98 Va. 16, 34 S. E. Rep. 898.

b. WHEN IMPROPER.

As to Improvements When None Are Claimed.—In a suit for partition, and also for the rents and profits of land, the defendant does not claim in his answer that he has made any improvements on the land, nor is there any evidence to that effect. It was not an error for the court to refuse to direct a decree for an account of the improvements. Ogle v. Adams, 12 W. Va. 213.

Where Executor Admits Assets Sufficient to Pay Demands.—Where in a suit against an executor it appears that he was properly chargeable with, and admitted in his answer assets more than sufficient to pay all the legatees, it is not necessary to order an account before rendering a decree against the executor. McRae v. Brooks, 6 Munf. 157. It would have been error to decree against the executor in the absence of an account, or an admission showing sufficient assets to satisfy the decree. Wills v. Dunn, 5 Gratt. 384. In this case there was an admission. Sharpe v. Rockwood, 78 Va. 24.

Bill Not Sustained by Proof.—In a creditors' suit where the answer is responsive to the bill, and denies all of its material allegations, and there is no proof to sustain the bill, the suit ought to be dismissed, since a court of equity will never decree an account for the purpose of furnishing evidence to support the bill. But the rule is not applicable to a case where the answer is not sufficiently responsive to the bill, as where it sets up new and affirmative matter, which it is incumbent on the defendant to sustain by proof. Porter v. Young, 85 Va. 49, 6 S. E. Rep. 803.

c. EFFECT.

Suspends Statute of Limitations.—A decree for an account of liens entered in a suit stops the running of the statute of limitations against the demands only of such creditors as come in under the decree, or otherwise become parties to the suit; as to all others the statute continues to run. Callaway v. Webster (1901), 7 Va. Law Reg. 40, and cases cited. But see Repass v. Moore, 96 Va. 147, 30 S. E. Rep. 458.

In Creditors' Bill—Suspends Other Pending Suits.—It is well settled that in a creditors' suit an order of reference operates to suspend all other suits of creditors, who must come in under the decree, and this order may be made in the first case ready for hearing, although it is not the first suit brought. Paxton v. Rich, 85 Va. 378, 7 S. E. Rep. 531; Stephenson v. Taverners, 9 Gratt. 398; Kent v. Cloyd, 30 Gratt. 555; Woodyard v. Polsley, 14 W. Va. 211; Laidley v. Kline, 23 W. Va. 565.

Lien Begins from Entry.—Where a suit is brought by one judgment creditor for the purpose of enforcing his lien upon the real estate of the defendant, such becomes a lien creditor's bill from the date of the entry of the decree, referring the cause to a commissioner for an account of the real estate of the defendant, the liens thereon and the order of priority. Repass v. Moore, 96 Va. 147, 30 S. E. Rep. 458.

4. BY CONSENT.

a. WHAT CONSTITUTES.

Complainants "Assented" to Decree Asked by Defendants.—In a suit where the question was whether land should be sold or rented to pay the debts chargeable on it, in the decree for rental it was "asked to be done" by the defendants, and the complainants "assented thereto," this is a consent decree to that question. Rose v. Brown, 17 W. Va. 649.

Appearing before Commissioner of Accounts.—When the parties to a suit in response to a decree of the court, appear before a commissioner and make a statement of their accounts, this does not amount to an acquiescence in the settlement, and does not justify the entering of a decree, based on such settlement, if it would not be authorized to do so, unless by consent of parties. Hall v. Taylor, 18 W. Va. 544.

Endorsement "Submitted to Us."—A decree was endorsed by the counsel in a cause, "submitted to us." All that this means is that it has been shown to counsel. It does not follow that they have not opposed or do not oppose it in every way they can, and it was not regarded at all as a consent decree. Gibson v. Burgess, 82 Va. 650.

b. VALIDITY AND EFFECT.

Infants Cannot Consent.—It is an error to give a joint decree in favor of all the plaintiffs, some of whom are infants, for the aggregate of all their debts against the defendants, notwithstanding it is stated to have been by consent of complainants, because infants are incapable of giving consent for want of discretion, and such consent decree is invalid; nor can their next friend give consent for them. Armstrong v. Walkup, 9 Gratt. 373; Dalingerfield v. Smith, 88 Va. 81, 1 S. E. Rep. 599.

By Counsel Adverse to Infants.—It is an error to allow counsel who represent interests adverse to infant parties to consent to a decree for them, and in such case a decree will be held invalid. Walker v. Grayson, 86 Va. 388, 10 S. E. Rep. 51.

Decree for Sum in Lieu of Dower.—It was held in Blair v. Thompson, 11 Gratt. 441, that there cannot be a decree for a specific sum in lieu of dower without the consent of all the parties interested.

Dismissing Bill with Costs.—A consent decree which dismisses a bill with costs, with no saving therein as to the right to bring another suit, is an adjudication of the merits of the cause. Lockwood v. Holliday, 16 W. Va. 651.

Consolidation—Decree for Sale—Irregularities Not Cured.—Where two cases were amalgamated by consent, and a decree for sale entered in the first case is made a decree for both cases by like consent, any error in decreeing a sale will not be cured thereby, as that consent merely cured any irregularities in the formalities of bringing the cases, consolidating the same and in making the decree. Buchanan v. Clark, 10 Gratt. 164.

Insufficiencies Cured.—The insufficiencies in a bill may be cured by consent decrees. Scott v. Dameron (Va.), 32 S. E. Rep. 415.

c. HOW SET ASIDE.

By New Suit.—A decree which has been entered in a cause by consent of parties is binding, and can only be set aside by a new suit, alleging improper procurement by surprise, fraud, or mistake of parties, and in a suit where a consent decree by some of the parties has been entered as by consent of all, leave should be given to any of the parties who did not consent thereto to bring a suit in a reasonable time to nullify it. Estill v. McClintic, 11 W. Va. 399.

After Term Only by Consent in Same Cause—By Original Bill.—After the close of a term at which a consent decree is entered, it can never be set aside by any proceedings in the cause except by consent, though it had been entered by mistake or by the fraud of one of the parties; an original bill is necessary and proper to annul such consent decree whether it be interlocutory or final. Armstrong v. Wilson, 19 W. Va. 108; Rose v. Brown, 17 W. Va. 649; Manion v. Fahy, 11 W. Va. 482; Seller v. Union Mfg. Co. (W. Va.), 40 S. E. Rep. 547.

Clerical Mistakes Corrected by Bill of Review or Petition to Rehear.—From the very nature of the consent decree it cannot be altered or modified except by consent, unless there has been a clerical mistake, which mistake is corrected by a bill of review if the decree is final, or by a petition to rehear if it be interlocutory. Manion v. Fahy, 11 W. Va. 482; Morris v. Peyton, 29 W. Va. 201, 11 S. E. Rep. 954; Stewart v. Stewart, 40 W. Va. 65, 20 S. E. Rep. 862; Seller v. Union Mfg. Co. (W. Va.), 40 S. E. Rep. 547.

Fraud—By New Suit.—A consent decree may be annulled, when it was obtained by fraud of the other party or by his mistake, by a new suit brought for that purpose. Manion v. Fahy, 11 W. Va. 482.

Consent by Some of Parties—Rest May File Original Bill.—In a suit to settle a decedent's estate, and to charge it with the payment of his debts, a consent decree which was entered by the plaintiffs, the administrator and a preferred creditor, none of the other creditor parties to the suit being consulted, cannot be modified by subsequent proceedings in the cause, but leave should be granted to those parties who did not consent to file an original bill to set it aside. Manion v. Fahy, 11 W. Va. 482.

Court Cannot Set Aside in Construing Decree.—The court in its decrees carrying into execution a consent decree may construe the same when necessary, but it cannot set aside such consent decree, and enter one totally different therefrom, under the guise of construing it. Seller v. Union Mfg. Co. (W. Va.), 40 S. E. Rep. 547.

5. BY DEFAULT.

a. APPEALS FROM.

Motion to Correct Must Be Refused in Lower Court.—The defendant, before appealing from a decree which was rendered by default, should apply to the court in which the decree was rendered, or to the judge thereof to correct the errors, before appealing to an appellate court. He has no right of appeal until a motion is made in the lower court, and is refused, either in whole or in part. As this was not done no appeal can be entertained, and will be dismissed as being improperly taken. Baker v. Western M., etc., Co., 6 W. Va. 196; Forest v. Stephens, 21 W. Va. 316; Bock v. Bock, 24 W. Va. 586. See §§ 5 and 6, ch. 134 of the W. Va. Code.

Variance between Process and Bill.—Where neither the subpoena nor the decree nisi required the defendants to answer any such bill as was exhibited, and the parties named in the decree nisi are different from those between whom the decree was made and a decree by default was entered against those parties, they were not in contempt by any proper process, and such decree will be reversed on appeal. Frazier v. Frazier, 2 Leigh 642.

b. RELIEF FROM.

Neglect of Case by Defendant.—A defendant upon whom process has been served, and who neglects his defence, or contents himself with merely writing to a lawyer who practices in the court to defend him, without giving him any information about his defence, or inquiring whether he is attending to the case, is not entitled to relief from a decree by default, on the ground of surprise, however grossly unjust the decree may be. Hill v. Bowyer, 18 Gratt. 364. See also, Hubbard v. Yocum, 30 W. Va. 755, 5 S. E. Rep. 875; Post v. Carr, 42 W. Va. 72, 24 S. E. Rep. 585.

False Return by Officer.—As to whether a court of equity can grant relief from a judgment procured on a false return by the officer, where it appears from the process and the record to have been duly served, has been the subject of much judicial contention, and the arguments and discussions on both sides of the question appear to be equally balanced. But the Virginia court in Preston v. Kindrick, 94 Va. 760, 27 S. E. Rep. 588, has adopted the view that a court of equity cannot give relief from a decree by default against a defendant, where such decree was entered on a false return by the sheriff, unless such return was procured or induced by the plaintiff, or he can in some way be connected with the deception. For a full collection of the authorities upon this point, see note appended to the above case in 3 Va. Law Reg. 435.

Set Aside for Good Cause.—A final decree by default may be set aside at a subsequent term for good cause shown, in a case where relief cannot be given by bill of review, or bill to impeach the decree for fraud in obtaining it. Erwin v. Vint, 6 Munf. 267.

One Party Cannot Object Where No Process Was Served on the Other.—A decree by default is entered against a guardian and his sureties although process had not been served upon one of the sureties. Upon a bill by the guardian and the other sureties to open the decree, no objection can be raised by them to the decree on this ground. Hill v. Bowyer, 18 Gratt. 364.

6. PRO CONFESSO.

a. IN GENERAL.

Proof Necessary for Final Decree.—In equity if the defendants make default, and a decree pro confesso is entered against them, yet the plaintiffs cannot have final decree without proof. Anonymous, 4 H. & M. 476.

Answer Not Responsive—Motion.—Where an answer is not responsive to a material allegation of the bill, the plaintiff may except to it as insufficient, or may move to have that part of the bill taken for confessed. But if he do neither, he shall not on trial avail himself of any implied admission by the defendant, for where the defendant does not answer at all, the plaintiff cannot take his bill for confessed without an order of the court to that effect, and have it served upon the defendant, and this is the only evidence of his admission. Dangerfield v. Claiborne, 2 H. & M. 17.

b. WHEN PROPER.

Statutory Rule in West Virginia.—The Code of West Virginia, ch. 125, § 30, provides: "If a demurrer be overruled, there shall be a rule upon the defendant to answer the bill. And if he fail to appear and answer the bill on the day specified in the order, the plaintiff shall be entitled to a decree against him for the relief prayed for therein." In a suit in which a demurrer was overruled, on motion of the plaintiff a rule was awarded against the defendant to file his answer, but no specified day was named. A decree entered afterwards, settling the merits of the case, must be overruled and annulled. A decree of this kind can only be entered after the statute has been complied with, and the defendant has failed to answer on the day specified. Moore v. Smith, 26 W. Va. 379.

Dismissal of Both on Defence by One.—Upon a bill in chancery by a distributee against an administrator and his surety, alleging that the administrator has not duly accounted, and praying an account, a decree pro confesso is taken as to the administrator, but the surety answers, and proves, that the plaintiff, in a full and final settlement, has released the administrator, and so is not entitled to an account; upon which the chancellor dismisses the bill with costs as to both defendants. Held, the bill was properly dismissed as to both defendants. Cartigne v. Raymond, 4 Leigh 579.

In a creditors' bill, the administrator of the decedent was made party defendant, and called upon to answer under oath the allegations of the bill. All the defendants made default, except the administrator, who demurred, and answered under oath denying the charges of fraud, and averring that the transactions complained of were bona fide, and founded upon a valuable consideration. The plaintiff was not entitled to the decree pro confesso taken as to the other codefendants, as the answer of the administrator enures to their benefit, and it would be without reason, and doubtless without a precedent to enter a decree for the plaintiff, when the record shows he is not entitled to one. Terry v. Fontaine, 83 Va. 451, 2 S. E. Rep. 743, citing Anon., 4 H. & M. 476; Findlay v. Sheffey, 1 Rand. 73; Cartigne v. Raymond, 4 Leigh 579; Ashby v. Bell, 80 Va. 811.

Allegations Not Controverted.—Every material allegation of a bill not controverted by an answer shall for the purposes of the suit, be taken as true and no proof thereof shall be required. Sec. 36 of ch. 125 of Code of West Virginia; Gardner v. Landcraft, 6 W. Va. 86.

Implied Admissions—Motion Necessary.—It is not proper to enter a decree pro confesso as to allegations in a bill, which are not denied in the answer. In this case the plaintiff may except to the answer as insufficient, or may move to have that part of the bill taken for confessed; but if he does neither he shall not avail himself of any implied admission, without an order of the court to that effect, served on the defendant. Clinch River Mineral Co. v. Harrison, 91 Va. 122, 21 S. E. Rep. 660.

Same—Old Rule.—It was formerly held that when an answer controverts part of the plaintiff's claim, and does not deny the residue, a decree pro confesso may be entered for that part, and the rest set aside. Thompson v. Strode, 2 H. & M. 19.

Demurrer Overruled—No Answer—Rule Necessary.—In equity the court never pronounces a decree against a defendant on overruling his demurrer, there being no answer in, but must award a rule to answer before the bill can be taken for confessed. Hays v. Heatherly, 36 W. Va. 613, 15 S. E. Rep. 223.

C. RELIEF FROM.

West Virginia Rule—Motion under Statute.—The West Virginia courts have repeatedly decided that a defendant, as to whom a decree has been entered upon a bill taken for confessed, cannot have such decree reviewed, until he shall have first applied to the court below to have such decree corrected in the manner prescribed by section 5, of ch. 134 of the Code. McKinney v. Hammett, 26 W. Va. 623, citing Baker v. W. M. & M. Co., 6 W. Va. 196; Dickinson v. Lewis, 7 W. Va. 673; Bock v. Bock, 24 W. Va. 586; Steenrod v. R. Co., 25 W. Va. 133.

Petition to Rehear.—If in a suit in equity against an absent defendant, alleged to be indebted to the plaintiff, and a home defendant having effects in his hands, a decree pro confesso be entered against the absent defendant, without any proof that the plaintiff is his creditor, there can be no redress obtained by appealing from the decree; he must seek it in the mode prescribed by the statute, that is, he must petition to have the cause reheard in the court which pronounced the decree. The decree will not be set aside as soon as answer is filed, but upon rehearing such decree will be made as may be just. Platt v. Howland, 10 Leigh 507.

Reversal on Motion—Statutory.—Under the Virginia Code of 1873, ch. 177, § 5, it is provided that the court which renders any decree as confessed, may upon motion reverse it for any error for which an appellate court might reverse it. This section requires that every motion under this chapter shall be after notice to the other party, but it is nowhere required that the notice shall specify the errors on the face of the record for which the reversal is asked. Saunders v. Griggs, 81 Va. 506.

Qualified Consent to Decree on Bill Taken as Confessed—Remedy.—There was no appearance in a cause except to make a qualified consent to a decree, which was on a bill taken for confessed. No appeal can be taken from that which is consented to, and all matters not consented to may be remedied in the lower court upon notice and motion, being on a bill taken for confessed. Hunter v. Kennedy, 20 W. Va. 843.

Construction of West Virginia Statute.—For a construction of §§ 5 and 6, of ch. 134, of W. Va. Code, in reference to appeals from decrees on bills taken for confessed, see Watson v. Wigginton, 28 W. Va. 533.

VI. IN PARTICULAR CASES.

1. AGAINST INFANTS.—See monographic note on "Infants" appended to Caperton v. Gregory, 11 Gratt. 505.

a. IN GENERAL.

May Set Aside Decree before Majority.—A suit was brought by an infant through his next friend before he had attained the age of twenty-one years, in order to set aside a decree adverse to him which had been rendered in the proceeding, which he set out in his bill. It was claimed that this suit was prematurely instituted and that the plaintiff should have waited until he had attained the age of twenty-one years. This question was disposed of by the supreme court of Virginia in Harrison v. Wallton, 95 Va. 731, 30 S. E. Rep. 372, where it was held that when an infant was aggrieved by a decree which was adverse to his interest, it was not necessary for him to wait until he reached his majority before he might seek to set aside the decree. Lockhart v. Vandyke, 97 Va. 356, 33 S. E. Rep. 613.

Guardians Cannot Waive Benefit.—It is not competent to guardians of infant parties to waive any benefit to which the infants are entitled in a decree; and it is error to decree on such consent. Hite v. Hite, 2 Rand. 409.

Guardian Ad Litem Necessary.—It is error to enter a decree against infant defendants, without assigning them a guardian ad litem; and though the infancy did not appear in the original proceedings, yet, if it be alleged in a petition for a rehearing, the decree being interlocutory, a guardian ad litem ought to be appointed. Roberts v. Stanton, 2 Munf. 129.

b. RESERVATIONS.

Of Day to Show Cause.—It was formerly held that a decree against infants, which did not reserve for them a day after the attainment of full age, in which they might show cause against the decree, was erroneous. Lee v. Braxton, 5 Call 459; Brax- ton v. Lee, 4 H. & M. 376; Jackson v. Turner, 5 Leigh 137; Tennent v. Pattons, 6 Leigh 196.

Same—Statutory Change.—It is now provided in both Virginia and West Virginia by statutory provisions that it is not necessary to insert in any decree or order a reservation to an infant in which he might show cause against it, but in any case in which such provision would have been proper, the infant may, within six months after attaining his majority, show cause in the same manner as if the decree or order had contained the provision. Va. Code, § 3424; W. Va. Code, ch. 182, § 7.

Limitations of Cause.—The right of an infant to show cause against a decree which affected his interest, after he arrived at age, must be limited to this extent, to show cause existing at the rendition of the decree, and not such as arose afterwards. The question always must be, can any cause be shown why the decree, at the time it was rendered, was not a legal and binding one. Lafferty v. Lafferty, 42 W. Va. 783, 26 S. E. Rep. 262; Walker v. Page, 21 Gratt. 636; Durrett v. Davis, 24 Gratt. 308; Zirkle v. McCue, 26 Gratt. 531; Morris v. Va. Ins. Co., 85 Va. 588, 8 S. E. Rep. 383; Lancaster v. Barton, 92 Va. 623, 24 S. E. Rep. 251.

C. EFFECT.

When Decree is Beneficial.—Although it is a general rule that an infant defendant is not bound by a decree, if he can show error in it when he becomes of age, yet, where a decree is obviously for his benefit, his rights may be absolutely bound by it. Brown v. Armistead, 6 Rand. 503; Harman v. Davis, 30 Gratt. 461; Morris v. Va. Ins. Co., 85 Va. 588, 8 S. E. Rep. 383.

Same as against Adults.—The law recognizes no distinction between a decree against an infant and a decree against an adult. An infant can impeach a decree only upon grounds which would invalidate it in the case of another person—such as fraud, collusion, or error. The mere fact of infancy confers in such a case no special rights or privileges. Therefore the same general presumption and inference which applies in favor of decrees against adults, applies in favor of decrees where the rights of infants are involved. Pennybacker v. Switzer, 75 Va. 688; Zirkle v. McCue, 26 Gratt. 517; Harrison v. Wallton, 95 Va. 721, 30 S. E. Rep. 372; Turk v. Skiles, 38 W. Va. 404, 18 S. E. Rep. 561; Dickel v. Smith, 38 W. Va. 685, 18 S. E. Rep. 721; Lafferty v. Lafferty, 42 W. Va. 785, 26 S. E. Rep. 263.

2. AGAINST EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS.—See generally, monographic note on "Executors and Administrators."

a. IN GENERAL.

For Payment at Future Periods.—It is error to decree against an executor absolutely, that he shall pay money at fixed future periods, in respect to funds not in hand, but which shall then come into his hands. Hite v. Hite, 2 Rand. 409.

For Rents and Profits Received by Testator.—A decree against an executor for rents and profits, received by the testator, ought expressly to direct that he pay the sum in question out of the assets in his hands to be administered; otherwise it will be understood as against him personally and therefore erroneous. Hite v. Paul, 2 Munf. 154.

Against One Only.—In a suit brought against two administrators, a decree may be rendered against only one, if it appear that only one has the assets. Templeman v. Fauntleroy, 3 Rand. 434.

b. EFFECT.

Decree against Administrator d. b. n. of Heir of Executor.—In a suit by legatees against the administrator d. b. n. of the heir of the executor of the decedent, a decree against the administrator d. b. n. conclusively establishes against the heir and all his representatives, the indebtedness of the executor's estate to the legatees of his testator, that they had a right to follow the assets in the hands of the heir, that a sufficiency of such assets came to his hands, and that his representatives, who had received his assets, are accountable to said legatees for the assets so received. Sheldon v. Armistead, 7 Gratt. 264.

Against Executor on Heir or Devisee.—When the lands of an ancestor are charged by his will or bond, in equity the creditors must exhaust the personal estate before they can resort to the lands, and in such case, a decree against the executor is not conclusive, but prima facie only against the heir or devisee. Garnett v. Macon, 6 Call 308.

On Suit for Contribution against Legatees.—After a decree is rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction without fraud or collusion against an executor, he may bring a suit in equity against the legatees for contribution to satisfy such decree, without paying the money himself and without appealing to a higher court, although requested and advised to do so. Bower v. Glendening, 4 Munf. 219.

Estoppel.—In a suit by an administrator d. b. n., against the representative of the first administrator, for the settlement of the first administrator's accounts, it is irregular to decree payment to the administrator d. b. n. But if the distributees are parties to the suit and do not complain, so that a payment to the administrator d. b. n. would be a valid discharge to the representative of the first administrator, he will not be heard to complain of irregularity in an appellate court. Morris v. Morris, 4 Gratt. 293.

C. PERSONAL DECREES.

Receipt of Depreciated Money.—Where one of two joint executors received in payment of bonds of his intestate depreciated money, it was error to decree against both for the amount of loss to the estate, but the decree should be against him only who received it. Myrick v. Adams, 4 Munf. 366.

On Confession of Sufficient Assets.—Where a decree is entered against executors for a legacy, upon their confession of assets sufficient to satisfy the same, without specifying whether such assets consist of money or other property, such decree may direct that they pay the legacy and interest, with the costs of the suit, out of the said assets, if so much thereof they have; and if they have not, then out of their own estates. McRae v. Brooks, 6 Munf. 157.

Where suit is brought against an executor and his sureties, and the executor confesses assets, it is competent for a court of equity to decree immediately against the executor; and liberty should be reserved to the creditor to proceed against the sureties by motion, if necessary. Jones v. Hobson, 2 Rand. 483.

Improper Payment of Assets.—Where a decree is made against an executor for having paid the assets improperly, he may be subjected in the first instance, without resorting to those who have so improperly received the assets. Ruth v. Owens, 2 Rand. 507.

Decree for Balance De Bonis Propriis.—When a balance is found in the hands of an executor or administrator, the decree should be de bonis propriis, and an acknowledgment of assets, with other circumstances, will have the same effect. Templeman v. Fauntleroy, 3 Rand. 484.

A decree and execution thereupon against an executor, or administrator for a balance due on his administration account, should not be against the goods and chattels of the decedent in his hands to be administered, but against his own goods and chattels. Moore v. Ferguson, 2 Munf. 421; Sheppard v. Starke, 3 Munf. 29.

When Personal Decree against Administratrix Proper.—An administratrix entered into a personal agreement, whereby she bound herself to sell a portion of her intestate's land to the plaintiff for a valuable consideration, which, by said agreement under seal, she acknowledges to have been paid to her, and possession was delivered in pursuance of the agreement. Subsequently finding herself unable to carry out said illegal agreement, she assumes to take the land back, and enters into possession of it, and promises to return the purchase money. Held, there is no error in rendering a personal decree against her for said purchase money, with interest. Hall v. Wilkinson, 35 W. Va. 167, 12 S. E. Rep. 1118.

Improper When Sued in Representative Character.—A personal decree against an executor or administrator, who is sued in his representative character only, is fatally erroneous. Jones v. Reid, 12 W. Va. 350, citing Spotswood v. Price, 3 H. & M. 123; Humphreys v. West, 3 Rand. 516; Pugh v. Jones, 6 Leigh 299; Wills v. Dunn, 5 Gratt. 384.

Charging with Debts When Due—Receipt—Interest—Negligence.—A decree is erroneous which charges the executor with debts, either old or new, due to the estate at the time when they became due, except in those cases where the debts were lost by his negligence or improper conduct. They should be charged to him at the time when actually received. It is also erroneous if it charges the executor with interest from the time the debts became due, without any proof of having been then received. An executor, except as to debts lost by his negligence or improper conduct, is chargeable with interest only on his actual receipts. Cavendish v. Fleming, 8 Munf. 198.

d. TAKING ACCOUNTS.

Object—Unnecessary When Sufficient Assets Appear.—The only object of taking an account in a suit against an administrator, is to show that sufficient assets have come into his hands to meet the debts of his intestate. Hence it is not error in such a suit to decree against the sureties of an administrator before accounts have been taken, where it appears that he has already received sufficient assets for that purpose. Morrison v. Lavell, 81 Va. 519.

No Decree against an Administrator Prior to Account.—Where a bill was brought against the administrators of a guardian asking for an account and a personal decree was entered against them, it was error to do so without first having ordered an account of their testator's estate. Lincoln v. Stern, 23 Gratt. 816.

In a suit in equity against executors it is not regular to enter a decree against them to be levied out of the goods of the testator without an account. McRae v. Bates, 4 H. & M. 400.

Of Intestate's Receipts.—A decree is erroneous which directs an account to be taken of money received by an intestate, unless his personal representative has been properly brought before the court. Donahoe v. Fackler, 8 W. Va. 249.

3. IN JUDICIAL SALES.—See monographic note on "Judicial Sales" appended to Walker v. Page, 21 Gratt. 636.

a. IN GENERAL.

When Commissioner May Use Discretion.—Where a decree directs real property to be sold or rented, without directing whether it shall be offered as a whole or in parcels, the commissioner must in the interest of the parties in his discretion offer it for sale or rental in that manner, which will in his judgment bring the most money. Rose v. Brown, 17 W. Va. 649.

Two Decrees on Same Day against Same Land.—If there be two decrees on the same day against the defendant's land, the whole and not a moiety only of it ought to be directed to be sold. Coleman v. Cocke, 6 Rand. 618.

Currency in Which Deferred Payments Are Payable.—Land is sold at a judicial sale and it is contended that the notes of the defendants for the deferred payments are payable in the currency of the time of the contract. But it was held that in the absence of express stipulation the notes should be paid in the currency of the time when they fell due. Kraker v. Shields, 20 Gratt. 377.

Sale Decreed When Part of Purchase Money Not Due.—It was not erroneous in a decree of sale to enforce a vendor's lien, to state that a part of the purchase money was not yet due. And this is especially true if when a resale is ordered the whole of the amount had then become due, because this does not constitute an error to the prejudice of the appellants. Moore v. Green, 90 Va. 181, 17 S. E. Rep. 872.

Dower Rights.—It is not an error to decree the sale of land, without ascertaining the right of dower therein. There is nothing to prevent the widow from bringing her suit against the proper parties, claiming their lands, and having her dower set out in them. Hunter v. Hunter, 10 W. Va. 331.

b. JURISDICTION.

Trustee Necessary in Suit to Enforce a Trust.—In Conrad v. Fuller, 98 Va. 16, 34 S. E. Rep. 893, it was held to be error to enter a decree directing the sale of a decedent's real estate before the trustee in a deed of trust conveying the same land to secure a debt had been made a party to the suit. He was a necessary party, and the court ought not to have entered a decree for sale until he was brought before it.

Land Chargeable in Equity—Amount of Debt.—A court of chancery ought not to direct the sale of land for the payment of debt, unless the creditor asking the sale shall show that the land is legally chargeable in equity, for such payment, and not even then until the amount of the debt shall be ascertained. Smith v. Flint, 6 Gratt. 40.

All Persons in Interest Must Be Parties.—It is error to decree land to be sold, in which a person not a party to the suit has an interest, legal or equitable. Barrett v. McAllister, 33 W. Va. 738, 11 S. E. Rep. 220.

Equitable Title Should Not Be Sold.—It is a general rule that a court of equity ought not to decree a sale of an equitable title in land, but if a decree for sale of the land be proper, it should first direct that the legal title be perfected, and then decree a sale of that. Goare v. Benhring, 6 Leigh 585.

c. LIENS AND PRIORITIES.

No Decree Prior to Fixing of Liens and Priorities.—It is the established rule in Virginia and West Virginia that no decree for the sale or rental of real estate should be entered, until the liens thereon, with their priorities, are fixed and determined, so that the land may bring a better price, in that the prospective buyers may make intelligent bids, without fear of subsequent litigation. Scott v. Ludington, 14 W. Va. 387; Cole v. McRae, 6 Rand. 644; Daingerfield v. Smith, 83 Va. 81, 1 S. E. Rep. 509; New v. Bass, 93 Va. 383, 23 S. E. Rep. 747. See monographic note on "Judicial Sales" appended to Walker v. Page, 21 Gratt. 636, for full list of authorities. Nor will the defect be cured by the creditor, whose lien was not ascertained, consenting to the decree, as the debtor and other creditors are interested in having the amount of liens and their priorities fixed before a sale. Beard v. Arbuckle, 19 W. Va. 135.

And if a decree of sale has been entered, and subsequently, before advertisement under this decree, it was suggested that there were other liens than those reported, a decree then entered referring the cause to a commissioner for a further account of liens, operated to suspend the decree of sale. Harris v. Jones, 96 Va. 658, 32 S. E. Rep. 455.

In Beard v. Arbuckle, 19 W. Va. 135, it was held to be an error to leave the amounts of liens on a tract of land in uncertainty before the sale, by recommitting the report to the commissioner with leave to the debtor within 60 days to reduce the amounts of any of the liens by proving payments.

What Land Is Liable.—There should not be a decree for sale in an action brought for the purpose of subjecting lands to satisfy a judgment, until the priorities of the parties are adjusted, and until it has been ascertained what portion of lands appearing by deeds filed with the bill to belong to the debtor, was included in a certain deed of trust. Buchanan v. Clark, 10 Gratt. 164.

Other Liens Must Be Provided for.—It is error to decree the sale of land to pay the judgment of the plaintiff, without at the same time providing for the payment of other judgment liens, appearing in the record, although these lienors have not answered the bill, and have not asked to have the land sold to pay these judgments. Scott v. Ludington, 14 W. Va. 387.

It is error to decree the sale of land, which is subject to prior encumbrances. Scott v. Ludington, 14 W. Va. 387.

Plaintiff's Rights Should Be First Ascertained.—It is error for the court to provide, in its decree for sale, for further relief, should it appear that a certain reduction in the judgment was incorrect. It is the duty of the court to definitely fix the amount to which the plaintiff is entitled before ordering a sale. Scott v. Ludington, 14 W. Va. 387.

d. RENTS AND PROFITS.

Sufficient to Pay Interest—No Sale.—Where the annual rental of land descended is more than sufficient to pay the interest on the bond debt of the ancestor, a court of equity will not decree a sale of such land in possession of his heirs to satisfy the debt, the land not being subject to any specific lien or encumbrance in favor of the creditor. Wilders v. Chambliss, 6 Munf. 432.

Inquiry as to Rent before Sale.—In a suit in equity to enforce the lien of a judgment, there was no averment in the bill, nor admission, nor proof that the rents and profits of the lands of the debtor would not pay the debt in five years. It was error to decree a sale of the land before this inquiry had been made. But as the decree appealed from in this case was interlocutory, it will be amended and affirmed. Price v. Thrash, 30 Gratt. 515; Southwest Va. M. Co. v. Chase, 95 Va. 56, 27 S. E. Rep. 826.

Sale of Land Improper if Rent Will Satisfy in Short

Time.—Upon a bill by creditors of a decedent against his administrators and heirs to marshal the assets, the court may decree a sale of the lands descended to the heirs; but it is not bound, and ought not to decree such sale, if the rents and profits of the lands will satisfy the debts in a reasonable time, especially if the heirs be infants. Tennent v. Pattons, 6 Leigh 196.

e. PERSONAL DECREES.

Where Vendor's Lien.—In a suit brought to enforce a lien reserved on land for the purchase price thereof, there may be a personal decree for the purchase money before the sale, and not merely for the balance remaining due after crediting the proceeds from the sale of the land. Dellinger v. Foltz, 93 Va. 729, 25 S. E. Rep. 998; Fayette Land Co. v. L. & N. R. Co., 93 Va. 274, 24 S. E. Rep. 1016.

When Personal Decree and Decree for Sale Both Proper.—In a suit brought to enforce a vendor's lien, it is plainly within the jurisdiction of the court of equity, to enter a personal decree against the defendant, and also a further decree for the sale of the land, if the personal decree be not satisfied. Fayette Land Co. v. L. & N. R. Co., 93 Va. 274, 24 S. E. Rep. 1016.

Purchase by Tenant in Common.—At a sale of property held by tenants in common, one of them becomes the purchaser, but fails to comply with his contract. In a suit for specific execution of his contract there is a personal decree against him, and for a sale of the whole property, but it was held on appeal that the purchaser at the sale bought only the moiety of the other tenant in common, and the lien of the decree only extended to that moiety though the whole property was sold under the decree. Johnson v. Bank, 33 Gratt. 473.

Personal Decree for Balance Due—Enforcement.—It is proper in a suit to enforce a vendor's lien to give the plaintiff a personal decree against the purchaser for the balance due, and the court in its discretion may authorize the enforcement of this decree before subjecting the land to the lien. Carskadon v. Minke, 26 W. Va. 729.

Same—Reservation for Sale under Deed of Trust.—The sale of a house and lot under a deed of trust to secure the deferred payments was enjoined on the ground that the sale was made with reference to Confederate States currency. The bill was dismissed and a personal decree entered. It was irregular to dismiss the bill. The decree should reserve liberty for application to the court for sale under the deed of trust, if the personal decree fail to produce the money. Kraker v. Shields, 20 Gratt. 377.

f. ERRORS AND OMISSIONS.

Sale Must Follow Decree.—A decree for the sale of lands was made against adult and infant defendants. The marshal to make sale was instructed by the adults to sell in a different manner from the decree, and obeyed these instructions, and not the decree. The sale was irregular. Tennent v. Pattons, 6 Leigh 196.

Confirmation Cures Unauthorized Execution of Deed.—Where a decree, which directs commissioners to sell land, did not authorize them to execute a deed to the purchaser, yet as they did execute the deed and a final decree subsequently entered, ratified and confirmed it, this order of confirmation gave full effect and validity to such deed, and related back to its date, so as to invest the purchaser with the legal title of the original owner. Evans v. Spurgin, 6 Gratt. 107.

Errors Should Be Objected to in Lower Court.—A decree confirming a sale of real estate will not be reversed for an error in the decree ordering the sale, when no steps have been taken in the court below before the confirmation to reverse said decree. This rule applies in some cases to a party to the suit, who is a purchaser of land sold under a decree, as well as to a stranger. Dick v. Robinson, 19 W. Va. 159.

Sale Improper—Cloud on Title.—When a decree directs property in which absent defendants are interested to be sold, and these defendants have not been summoned by due process, this objection may be made by other defendants, who may also be affected by this decree, because the property would be placed under a cloud, and would not sell to the advantage it would have done if no such cloud rested upon it. McCoy v. McCoy, 9 W. Va. 443, citing Craig v. Sebrell, 9 Gratt. 133.

Same—When Payments Thereunder Due before They Were under the Contract.—A decree is erroneous by which the last payment on the property when sold, might become due before the last instalment of the purchase money due the complainants; it is error to decree the sale of land on terms in any case which would have this result. Gates v. Cragg, 11 W. Va. 300.

Same—Of Land in Hands of Receiver before an Account.—In a creditors' suit, where the lands of the defendant have been for some time in the possession of receivers, statements of their transactions should be completed before a decree is entered, and it is error to decree a sale of the land for the payment of debts before the amount received in their transactions as receivers had been fully ascertained and credited on the debts. Strayer v. Long, 83 Va. 715, 3 S. E. Rep. 372.

Same—Rights of Tenant in Possession Unascertained.—In a chancery suit for the sale of land, it is an error to decree a sale thereof before the rights of a tenant who is in possession has been ascertained and before any provisions have been made for his protection. Moore v. Bruce, 85 Va. 139, 7 S. E. Rep. 195.

Exceptions to Decree for Sale.—If a decree direct the sale of real estate under circumstances which injure the sale, the parties injured should except to the report of the commissioner, and apply to the court to set aside the sale. A bill of review after a final decree is not the proper remedy. Vanmeter v. Vanmeters, 3 Gratt. 148.

4. AGAINST MARRIED WOMEN.—See monographic note on "Husband and Wife."

When Personal Decree Erroneous.—A personal decree against a married woman for a debt contracted during coverture is erroneous and void, and a clause in the decree that it is to be levied of her separate estate and goods and chattels, not limiting it to the property before the court in the suit, does not cure the error. This was before ch. 3, § 15, Acts 1893. Turk v. Skiles, 38 W. Va. 404, 18 S. E. Rep. 561.

For Specific Performance.—When a married woman contracts in writing for the sale of her separate estate in land, a personal decree for specific performance may be enforced against her under § 2289 of Va. Code. Gentry v. Gentry, 87 Va. 478, 12 S. E. Rep. 966.

5. AGAINST NONRESIDENTS.

No Appeal by Nonresident—Petition Proper.—It is well established that if a judgment or decree has been obtained against a nonresident by publication, his remedy is not by appeal or supersedeas to an appellate court, but he must file his petition and make defence in the court in which the judgment or decree was rendered. Meadows v. Justice, 6 W. Va. 198.

Statutory Remedy from Decree against Nonresidents.—It is well settled that a nonresident defendant, against whom a decree has been rendered upon publication, is confined to the remedy prescribed by the statute and that he cannot in the first instance appeal from such decree. Vance v. Snyder, 6 W. Va. 24; Meadows v. Justice, 6 W. Va. 198; Lenows v. Lenow, 8 Gratt. 349; Handy v. Scott, 26 W. Va. 710.
